THE HISTORY OF THE INTER-REGNUM,

From the Death of CHARLES I, to the Reſtoration of CHARLES II.

BOOK XXII.

The Hiſtory of the INTER-REGNUM contains three principal PARTS. The firſt, what fell out, during the Democracy of England. The ſecond, what paſſed, under the Protectorates of Oliver and Richard Cromwell. The third what happened, from the Deprivation of Richard Cromwell to the Reſtoration of CHARLES II.

PART I.

The COMMON-WEALTH of ENGLAND.

INTER-REG. AN' 1649.

FOR underſtanding the revolutions in England, after the death of Charles I, it is neceſſary to remember ſome important matters already related in the preceding reign, and of which it will be expedient to make here a brief recapitulation.

Recapitulation of ſome material matters.

Firſt, The parliament now ſiting was properly no more than a houſe of commons, who refuſed to acknowledge the negative voice of the lords. This they had evidently ſhewed, in erecting a court of juſtice to try the King without the conſent of the peers, which was voted unneceſſary.

Secondly, There was in this houſe of commons a ſmall number of members, all Independents, Anabaptiſts, or other ſectaries. All the Preſbyterians (who ſat in the houſe, the ſixth of December) were expelled by the army; and the abſent, whoſe principles diſagreed with thoſe of the Independents, durſt not reſume their places. If there ever was an uſurpation, it was the government of this maimed parliament, ſolely founded in violence, and intirely ſupported by the army; for, tho' the houſe of commons pretended to repreſent the people of England, it is very manifeſt few perſons of the nation were pleaſed to ſee the ſovereign power lodged in ſuch hands.

INTER-REG. AN' 1649.

Thirdly, The Independents, of whom this houſe chiefly conſiſted, were diſtinguiſhed by two principles, the one relating to the civil, the other to the eccleſiaſtical government. By the firſt, they maintained that a common-wealth was not only the moſt perfect form of government, but even abſolutely neceſſary for the Engliſh, after ſo many oppreſſions from their Kings, who had transformed, the government into a real tyranny. As to religion, tho' tho' they ſtiled themſelves Proteſtants, they held, that every particular church was independent, and might be governed as the members thought fit. Their notions were likewiſe extremely ſingular, with regard to the vocation of the miniſters of the goſpel; as they aſſerted that, without any other call, any man might diſcharge the miniſterial office, and exerciſe the talents given him by God. The other ſectaries, who had joined the Independents, on account of their allowing full toleration, were united with them in the firſt of theſe principles, and had declared for a common-wealth. But they differed from one another in ſome points of religion, which the Independents regarded the leſs, being deſirous to increaſe their adherents, and moreover believing that toleration was abſolutely neceſſary in matters of religion.

Inter-reg. An' 1649.

Fourthly, A remnant of Levellers was ſtill in the army, adherents to their principle, who were always in readineſs for any attempt to retrieve their credit. It is certain Cromwell, tho' he himſelf raiſed this faction, had in ſome degree diſperſed, but not utterly deſtroyed it. A powerful head might ſtill have rendered it as formidable as ever.

Fifthly, The Preſbyterians were extremely concerned to ſee the Independents in poſſeſſion of ſovereign power. This diſconcerted all their meaſures: their progreſs for eight years proved abortive, and the ſtorm, they had raiſed againſt the King, fell upon themſelves, or at leaſt it appeared they had all that time labored for others, without gaining any advantage; for the truth is, the Independents were equally averſe to the Preſbyterian as to Epiſcopal juriſdiction. As to civil government, it is evident the Preſbyterians were not enemies to royalty in general. If they had attempted to reſtrain its power, they were far from believing that the thing was evil in itſelf, as eſtabliſhed by the laws of the land, but becauſe the two laſt Kings had imployed their power to deſtroy Preſbyterianiſm; ſo that all their proceedings againſt Charles I were more pointed at his perſon than his dignity, becauſe they apprehended him to be their enemy, and deſpaired of eſtabliſhing Preſbyterian government in the church, while he was in a condition to prevent it. However, in all probability, many of them would have complied with a common-wealth, notwithſtanding the covenant, had not that government been lodged in the Independents, who were by no means inclined to ſupport Preſbyterianiſm, and whoſe principles upon toleration were wholly rejected by the Preſbyterians: and therefore an union between theſe parties was morally impoſſible.

Sixthly, The Royaliſts, equally enemies to both, could join with neither of the ſectaries, ſo great was the oppoſition between their principles. The Independents were for a common-wealth, which could not be agreeable to the Royaliſts. On the other hand the Preſbyterians were deſirous of maintaining their government in the church, and moſt of the Royaliſts could ſcarce believe the Preſbyterian churches to be true Chriſtian churches, ſince they wanted biſhops. Thus the Royaliſts, tho' perſecuted by both parties, were far from uniting with either: on the contrary they entertained ſome hopes, that the diviſions among their enemies would pave the way for them to reſtore the monarchy to its former ſtate. Wherefore, they labored to foment this diviſion, expecting the Preſbyterians would at length be obliged to quit their projects, and join with the Royaliſts, to free themſelves from the perſecution they ſuffered.

Inter-reg. An' 1649.

Theſe were the intereſts of the parties which divided the Engliſh nation, preſently after the death of Charles I. The remembrance of all this is abſolutely neceſſary to underſtand the tranſactions during the Inter-regnum.

An act to prohibit proclaiming the King's ſon, Jan. 30. Ruſhworth, Vol. VII. p. 1431. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 201. Whitelock.

Immediately after the King's death, the houſe of commons publiſhed an act to prohibit the proclaiming of Charles Stuart, the late King's eldeſt ſon, or any other perſon, on pain of high-treaſon. This was, as it were, the foundation of the common-wealth, which the Independents intended to erect in England. The ſame day, the peers deſired a conference with the commons, to ſetle the government, and the adminiſtration of juſtice, as the judges commiſſions were determined by the death of the King. The commons, regardleſs of the meſſage, voted the houſe of lords to be uſeleſs and dangerous, and therefore to be aboliſhed. They only left the peers the power of being choſen members of parliament, as well as other ſubjects. This privilege was accepted by a few (1), but rejected by moſt of the lords; nay, ſome publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the power aſſumed by the commons, tho' to very little purpoſe. Thus, the parliament, at firſt conſiſting of the King, ſix-ſcore peers, and five hundred and thirteen commoners, was reduced to a houſe of commons compoſed of about eighty members, of whom very few, at the begining, had five hundred pounds per annum: and yet theſe members, tho' their number was ſo ſmall, aſſumed the name of Parliament, and acted as if in them had been united the power, which formerly reſided in the King, lords and commons. This might ſeem extremely ſurpriſing, were it not for the preceding tranſactions, and the univerſal terror inſpired by the army. Hence appears the care and ability of Cromwell and his aſſociates, upon the ſelf-denying ordinance, in filling the army with their creatures. Doubtleſs, without an army intirely Independent and Republican, ſuch exceſſive and extraordinary power could not have been procured to ſo inconſiderable a number of members of parliament: but it muſt likewiſe be confeſſed, that ſome of theſe new governors had a great genius and uncommon capacity; and that, if they erred in their principles, they were ſkilful enough to purſue the conſequences.

The commons abolish the houſe of peers. March. 9. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 201. Whitelock, p. 377, 390. Phillips. Some peers proteſt. Phillips. Heath. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 203.

The princiſples of the commons concerning government. Heath, p. 225.

Their principle was, that the ſovereign authority originally reſided in the people, who commited a part of it to the Kings, choſen to rule them according to law. That the King abuſing his truſt had violated the original contract between King and people, by which means, the obligation being diſſolved, the ſovereign power returned to the people, as the fountain of it: ſo, looking upon themſelves as the peoples repreſentatives, they believed they had a right to change the form of government, without regarding the original contract annulled by the King, in his violation of the laws.

They aboliſh monarchy. Feb. 7. March 17. Clarendon, Whitelock, p. 377. Several alterations. Ibid. Phillips.

Purſuant to this principle the commons, aſſuming the name of parliament, voted, and afterwards inacted, that the regal office ſhould be aboliſhed as unneceſſary, burdenſome, and dangerous; and that the ſtate ſhould be governed by the peoples repreſentatives in a houſe of commons without King or lords, and under a Republican form. This grand change in the government introduced many others, in things inconſiſtent with a common-wealth, tho' not with monarchy. The oaths of allegiance

(1) The earl of Saliſbury and the lord Edward Howard of Eſrick ſigned the ingagement, "to be true and faithful to the "common-wealth, as it was eſtabliſhed without a King or houſe of lords," and ſat in parliament by virtue of an election from the people. Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 293.

——— Likewiſe, April 16, 1649, a writ being iſſued out for a new election, upon the death of ſir Francis Pile, the earl of Pembroke, with all his titles, was returned knight of the ſhire for Berks, "primæ impreſſionis," who was admited into the houſe with great reſpect. Whitelock, p. 396.

and ſupremacy were to be aboliſhed (1), juſtice was not any longer to be adminiſtered in the King's name (2), a new great-ſeal was to be made, new money to be coined; in a word, nothing to remain which had any marks of royalty. A great-ſeal was therefore made, having on one ſide the parliament ſiting, with this inſcription, "The "great-ſeal of the parliament of the common-"wealth of England;" on the other ſide, the arms of England and Ireland, with the following words, "The firſt year of freedom by God's "bleſſing reſtored" (3). This ſeal was commited to a certain number of perſons, ſtiled, Keepers of the liberties of England. And it was ordained that, henceforward, all public orders ſhould be diſpatched in the name of theſe keepers, under the direction of the parliament (4). Laſtly, the parliament choſe thirty-nine perſons to form a council of ſtate, to adminiſter public affairs under the parliament (5). Theſe changes were projected in February, but the execution of them all required ſome months.

Council of ſtate. Whitelock, p. 381. Dugdale's View.

In the begining of March, the parliament erected a new high-court of juſtice, to try ſome perſons of quality in their power. It ſeems, as there was no houſe of peers, the lords of the kingdom were deprived of their privileges under this new democracy, and that conſequently the impriſoned lords might have been tried by a jury, in one of the courts of juſtice. Doubtleſs, the parliament was apprehenſive that a jury, impanneled in the uſual form, would never find perſons of diſtinction guilty of death, for ſupporting the cauſe of their Royal maſter. The Independents were not ſo numerous among the people, as to be ſure of a jury of their party. Moreover, they were not aſſured of the judges, ſix of whom had refuſed commiſſions from the commonwealth. But, in erecting a court of juſtice, the parliament could nominate ſuch judges as would obey their orders.

A new High-court of Juſtice. Bates. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 204. Whitelock, p. 377.

Before this new court, of which Bradſhaw was preſident, as he had been of that which condemned the King, were brought duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the lord Goring, lately made earl of Norwich, the lord Capel and ſir John Owen, all for the ſame crime, viz. for appearing in arms againſt the parliament. When the King, in the begining of the civil wars, would have put to death priſoners taken at Edge-hill and Colebrook, the parliament, judging it unjuſt, declared they would puniſh their captives in the ſame manner, if the condemned perſons were executed. But, upon their proving victorious, it was found very conſiſtent with juſtice, to take away the lives of thoſe who had fought for the King. This will not appear ſo ſtrange, if it be remembered that the King himſelf ſuffered death, for making war upon the parliament.

Some noble priſoners brought before it. Feb. 10. State-trials. Burnet's Mem. Whitelock, p. 380.

The duke of Hamilton alleged, That, being a ſubject of Scotland, he had entered England with an army as a declared enemy, by virtue of a commiſſion from the parliament of Scotland, which he was obliged to obey, and therefore could only be treated as a priſoner of war. This objection having been foreſeen; he was told, they did not proceed againſt as duke Hamilton of Scotland, but as earl of Cambridge in England; and, ſeeing he had accepted that title, and as ſuch ſat in parliament, in ſo doing he became a ſubject of England; that if the title of duke of Hamilton bound him to obey the parliament of Scotland, that of earl of Cambridge ſhould have ingaged him to refuſe the commiſſion. Beſide, it appeared that his accepting the command of the Scotiſh army was not merely the effect of his obedience, but of his own ſollicitation, and that he had been the chief author of the war.

The earl of Holland ſaid little in his defenſe. Moreover, the meaſures he had taken, and his frequent ſhifting ſides, did not much favor his cauſe.

Earl of Holland. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 205.

The lord Goring, earl of Norwich, repreſented, That he was educated in the court from his infancy, having been a page to King James I: that he had never ſerved any maſter but the King, whom he had followed, without canvaſing the juſtice or injuſtice of his cauſe, having had no opportunity to be informed in ſuch points, which were above his capacity.

Earl of Norwich.

The lord Capel (ſteady to his principles, and a zealous adherent to his Sovereign's cauſe) made a more courageous and reſolute defenſe. He, at firſt, diſowned the authority of the court, alleging, That, if he had been guilty of any crime, he ought to be tried in the uſual way, and not before a court unſupported by any law. But the condemnation of the King himſelf, by ſuch a court, might have taught him, that this allegation would do him no ſervice. His next plea was, that, as he ſurrendered himſelf priſoner at diſcretion, the law of nations exempted him from death, if not inflicted within ſo many days, which were long ſince expired. He urged, that when, after Colcheſter was taken, the council of war had condemned Lucas and Liſle to be ſhot, general Fairfax promiſed life to the other priſoners, wherefore he claimed the benefit of that promiſe. The court, being ſomewhat imbaraſſed, ſent to the general to know the nature of his promiſe to the lord Capel. He replied, That, as general, he had promiſed to exempt the priſoners from military execution, to which three had been condemned, and that his intent extended no farther. Upon this anſwer it was decided, that the general's promiſe did not amount to an exemption of the priſoner from the juſtice of the parliament.

Sir John Owen only ſaid, his oath of allegiance obliged him in conſcience to ſerve the King.

Sir John Owen.

Notwithſtanding their defenſe, they all received ſentence of death (6). But, having many friends, petitions were preſented to the parliament in their name for a pardon. Theſe petitions being examined in the houſe, thoſe of duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, and lord Capel were rejected. The votes were equal upon that of the earl of Norwich; but as, according to cuſtom, the ſpeaker's vote was deciſive, he declared in his favor, ſaying, the earl had formerly ſhewed him ſome civilities, and therefore he voted for his pardon (7). execution was ſuſpended, becauſe, as a commoner, he ſhould have been tried in an inferior court. This preſerved his life. The three former were executed on a ſcaffold, erected before Weſtminſter-hall.

Duke Hamilton's execution. Burnet's Mem. p. 204. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 209. Whitelock. Phillips. Dugdale's View, p. 388.

Duke Hamilton complained, on the ſcaffold, that he loſt his life for obeying the parliament of Scotland, which if he had not done, he muſt have ſuffered death there. But he had no grounds to inſinuate a danger of being put to death in Scotland, for refuſing the command of an army raiſed by his intrigues and authority. He intimated, that, if he would have diſcovered who invited the Scots army into England, it would probably have ſaved his life. Before his proceſs, he had been urgently ſollicited to make this diſcovery, but to no purpoſe. It is difficult to conceive the duke's character. All that has been offered for or againſt him only proves, that he knew how to adapt himſelf to the times. And the earl of Clarendon evidently inſinuates, that the duke, when imployed by the King, ſecretly made friends in the contrary party, in caſe affairs ſhould turn to the King's diſadvantage.

Lord Capel is executed. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 209, 210.

The lord Capel maintained, that he had done nothing contrary to the laws, and conſequently was unjuſtly ſentenced to ſuffer death. He ſaid that King Charles I was a ſaint, and inlarged on the great underſtanding, ſingular good-nature, and exemplary piety of the Prince, whom he ſtiled King, declaring, he would never be ſhaken in his religion. In all probability, the lord Capel ſpoke ſincerely. But the ſequel ſhewed, either that he did not fully know Charles II, or that Prince had, at his reſtoration, principles different from thoſe he imbibed in his youth.

Other executions. Phillips. Whitelock.

At or about this time, many others were executed for the ſame crime in ſeveral parts of England; among whom were Morrice and Blackbourne, who had ſurpriſed the caſtle of Pontefract for the King. Powyer, Powel and Langhorn, who drew into a revolt from the parliament the principality of Wales, caſt lots for their lives, and the firſt was executed.

The abſent members are excluded the houſe. Ludlow, Vol. I. p. 288. Whitelock.

When the army expelled from the houſe above a hundred members, unacceptable to them, thoſe only, who were then preſent, were expreſly excluded: but nothing had been determined, as to many who were abſent. Indeed, the latter had never ſince ſat in the houſe, being afraid of the ſame fate. But perhaps they might return in great numbers, when a favorable juncture offered. To prevent this, the houſe reſolved to paſs an act, to exclude for ever all, who had not ſat ſince the King's trial, unleſs they gave the houſe intire ſatisfaction. At the ſame time, they appointed a commitee to examine ſuch as ſhould offer themſelves. This commitee did not ſcruple to receive thoſe who were Independents, and found reaſon to reject their enemies. This was indeed an effectual means to prevent diviſions in the houſe, becauſe all the members were of one party: but it occaſioned an inconvenience, which required other meaſures. The parliament had ſo few members, that they ſaw it was ridiculous to ſtile themſelves the Repreſentative of the Common-wealth. Indeed, the vacant ſeats might be ſupplied by new elections, but the houſe was unwilling to run that riſque, their party not being yet ſo numerous, as to expect new members of their own principles. The houſe therefore reſolved, in order to inlarge their authority by a greater number of members, to admit all who had ſat in the preſent parliament, provided they would ſign an inſtrument, called the Ingagement, whereby "they rejected all conceſſions made by the King "in the treaty of Newport; approved of all the "proceedings againſt him; and ingaged themſelves "to be true and faithful to the common-wealth, as "eſtabliſhed without King or houſe of lords." This ingagement excluded all the Royaliſts, and the Preſbyterians, who were the ſtricteſt obſervers of the covenant. However, a conſiderable number of the latter ſigned, and ſat in the houſe, either not being ſo ſcrupulous as their brethren, or with a view of recovering ſome influence in the parliament. But thoſe, who were moſt incenſed againſt the Independents, were excluded by the commitee. Edmond Ludlow, a member of the commitee, ingenuouſly owns, in his Memoirs, that an expedient was found to reject thoſe, from whom it was believed there was any danger (1).

The Prince of Wales, receiving at the Hague the melancholy news of the tragical death of his father, immediately aſſumed the title of King, being then eighteen years old. Within two or three days, the States-general, the ſtates of Holland, and the miniſters of the Hague (2), paid him their compliments of condolence. He ordered thoſe of his father's council, who attended him, to be ſworn of his privy-council, adding only one perſon. He had no ſooner formed his council, than he received a letter from the Queen, his mother, who, after expreſſing her extreme affliction, adviſed him to come to France, and eſtabliſh no council 'till ſhe had a conference with him, but her advice was too late. Probably, the Queen intended to govern her ſon, as ſhe had done his father, tho' the new King's power was inſignificant. His circumſtances were deplorable, not having ſufficient to maintain his houſhold, or any table but that of the Prince of Orange, his brother-in-law, and intirely ſubſiſting by his aſſiſtance, which could not be of a very long duration. The ſtates of Holland, perceiving the parliament would ſhortly ſollicit the King's removal out of their dominions, could have been extremely glad to be freed, by his voluntary retreat, from being obliged to deſire his departure. Some of the ſtates deputies were even inclined to prevent the deſires of the parliament. The King, hearing of this diſpoſition, wiſhed to retreat, but he knew not whither. He had met with an ill reception in France, while his father was alive, and had now no proſpect of better uſage. He was too well acquainted with the Queen-regent and cardinal Mazarine, to expect they would prefer his friendſhip to that of the new common-wealth of England: ſo that, tho' he ſhould retire into France, it could have been but for a very ſhort ſpace. Beſide he did not much deſire to be with the Queen, his mother, being ſenſible ſhe would hold him in a ſort of ſervitude, which he could neither bear nor prevent without a quarrel. Ireland ſeemed to promiſe him an honorable retreat, on account of the poſture of affairs in that kingdom, which it is neceſſary to explain.

In the year 1646, the marquis of Ormond, by the King's expreſs orders, concluded a peace with the Iriſh rebels, hoping to receive ſufficient forces to expel out of that iſland the Engliſh parliamentarians and the Scots. But, however advantageous this treaty was to the Catholics, the Pope's nuncio did not think proper to conſent to it. His pretenſe was, that it did not afford the Catholics ſufficient advantages, nor ſecurity. But the truth is, by this peace he would have loſt all his credit, ſince the marquis was to be owned by the Iriſh as governor. He therefore caballed ſo ſucceſsfully among the people, that they not only deſerted the marquis, but likewiſe obliged him by their inſults to retire to Dublin, deſtitute of all neceſſaries to defend that capital, which they were preparing to beſiege. In this extremity, he rather choſe to ſurrender Dublin and Drogheda to the parliament, than let them fall into the hands of the rebels. He therefore capitulated with the parliament, and delivered both theſe places to colonel Jones, who took poſſeſſion June the ſeventeenth, 1647. After this the marquis retired into England, where he was often permited to viſit the King, then the army's priſoner, 'till at length he was forced to paſs into France.

After the marquis left Ireland, the nuncio exerciſed a tyranny, which became intolerable to the Iriſh. They therefore acquainted the Queen and Prince, then at Paris, that they were inclined to ſhake off the nuncio's yoke, and, if the marquis of Ormond were ſent to them with a ſupply of arms and ammunition, they would place him at the head of an army capable of driving all the King's enemies out of the iſland. The nuncio, being informed of this plot, excommunicated the authors, but, for once, he proved the weakeſt. He was abandoned by all his adherents, and even conſtrained to beg, as a favor, leave to withdraw.

The marquis of Ormond long waited at Paris for the performance of the cardinal's promiſe, to ſupply him with money, arms and ammunition. But perceiving, at laſt, he was only amuſed, he returned without any aſſiſtance to Ireland, where he arrived, the begining of October, 1648. Three months after, he entered into a new treaty with the grand council of the Iriſh aſſembled at Kilkenny (1). At this time the proceſs was forming in England againſt the King. But the foreſaid peace was not general. Owen Roe O Neale, who commanded in Ulſter, rejected it, pretending it was not ſufficiently advantageous to the Catholic religion. Much time was ſpent to gain him, but to no purpoſe. At laſt the marquis of Ormond, to take the opportunity of making progreſs in Ireland, while the parliament was erecting their new common-wealth, reſolved, without any farther regarding O Neale, to act ſingly, with an army which was at the council of Kilkenny's diſpoſal. He therefore put himſelf at the head of this army, and, marching towards Dublin, took Dundalk, Newry, Trim, Drogheda, and ſome other towns and caſtles, which facilitated his intended ſiege of Dublin. On the other hand, Prince Rupert, the King's admiral, being purſued by the parliament's fleet, put into Kinſale, where he was ſafe, and in a condition to forward the marquis of Ormond's deſigns. This ſituation of affairs made the King judge, that Ireland was a proper retreat, where, at the head of an army, he might become maſter of Dublin, and then of the whole iſland. After which he hoped, with his Iriſh ſuccors and friends in England, to recover his throne. But, upon news from Scotland, he ſuſpended his reſolution of going into Ireland. And this it is neceſſary to deſcribe.

Since Cromwell's expedition into that kingdom, after the duke of Hamilton's defeat, there was an intire change in the poſture of affairs. The marquis of Argyle, with all the rigid covenanters who oppoſed the war againſt England, had recovered the advantage they had loſt. Thoſe, who had been concerned in the duke of Hamilton's ingagement, were by the parliament declared incapable of all imployments, and excommunicated by the kirk: ſo that they were conſidered as enemies to God and the ſtate. Among theſe were William, earl of Lanerick, duke Hamilton's brother, the earl of Lauderdale, and many others, who formed a faction I ſhall call Hamiltonian, and which was intirely cruſhed. Scotland by this revolution continued to be united with England, while the Engliſh parliament remained Preſbyterian, that is, to the ſixth of December, 1648.

The revolution in England, upon the army's expelling the Preſbyterian members out of the parliament, to leave only Independents, altered the intereſts of Scotland. The Independents mortally deteſted the Scots, becauſe of their attachment to the covenant; and theſe again conſidered the Independents as enemies, no leſs formidable than the Royaliſts. This might have ſunk Argyle's credit, which partly ſubſiſted upon his friendſhip with Cromwell and Vane, the chiefs of the Independents. But the Scots confided in him, becauſe in religion he was an approved Preſbyterian, tho' in politics he inclined to the republican ſcheme. The parliament no ſooner erected a court of juſtice for the King's trial, than the Scots were extremely imbaraſſed. To permit the Independents to continue maſters of England, after the King's death, muſt neceſſarily prove highly diſadvantageous to them. They foreſaw that ſuch a parliament would diſregard Scotland, and inevitably ruin the covenant between the two kingdoms, which it was of the greateſt importance for the Scots to maintain, becauſe the Preſbyterians might poſſibly one day regain the ground they had loſt. But, on the other hand, there was a manifeſt danger in their taking up arms for the King. Their late loſs rendered them ſcarce able to raiſe another army; and, if this had been done, they could not have ſaved the King's life. They therefore determined to demonſtrate to the Engliſh and all Europe, that they utterly diſapproved the proceedings of the parliament, which was all they could do on the preſent occaſion.

Upon this reſolution, commiſſioners were ſent to London, where they arrived, the beginning of January, 1648, and preſented a memorial, repreſenting reaſons to divert them from their deſign of trying the King. But this memorial proved ineffectual. At laſt, the King having been twice brought before the high-court of juſtice, they gave in their proteſtation, in which they reminded them, "That they had, near three weeks before, "repreſented to them, what indeavors had been "uſed for taking away the King's life, and for "the change of the fundamental government of "the kingdom, and introducing a ſinful and ungodly toleration in matters of religion; and that "therein they had expreſſed their thoughts, and "fears, of the dangerous conſequences that might "follow thereupon; and that they had alſo earneſtly "preſſed, that there might be no farther proceeding againſt his Majeſty's perſon, which would "certainly continue the great diſtractions of the "kingdom, and involve them in many evils, "troubles and confuſions; but that by the free "counſels of both houſes of parliament in England, and with the advice and conſent of the parliament of Scotland, ſuch courſe might be taken, "in relation to the King, as might be for the "good and happineſs of both kingdoms; both "having an unqueſtionable and undeniable right "in his perſon as King of both; which duly conſidered, they had reaſon to hope, that it would "have given a ſtop to all farther proceedings "againſt his Majeſty's perſon. The parliament anſwered this proteſtation, but after the King's death, ſaying, " They had " heretofore told them, what power this nation " had in the fundamentals of government: That if " Scotland had not the ſame power and liberty, as " they went not about to confine them, ſo they " would not be limited by them; but leaving them " to act in theirs as they ſhould ſee cauſe, they re- " ſolved to maintain their own liberties, as God " ſhould inable them. They ſaid, " The anſwer they made to their firſt " and ſecond letter was, that after a long and ſe- " rious deliberation of their own intrinſical power " and truſt (derived to them by the providence of " God, through the delegation of the people) " and upon the like conſiderations, of what them- " ſelves and the whole nation had ſuffered, from " the miſgovernment and tyranny of that King, " both in peace and by the wars; and conſidering, " how fruitleſs and full of danger and prejudice " the many addreſſes to him for peace had been, " and being conſcious how much they had pro- " voked and tempted God, by the neglect of the " impartial execution of juſtice, in relation to the " innocent blood ſpilt, and miſchief done, in the " late wars, they had proceeded in ſuch a courſe " of juſtice againſt that man of blood, as they " doubted not the juſt God (who is no reſpecter " of perſons) did approve, and would countenance " with his bleſſings upon the nation; and tho' per- " haps they might meet with many difficulties, be- " fore their liberties and peace were ſetled, yet " they hoped they ſhould be preſerved from con- " fuſion, by the good will of him who dwelled in " the buſh, which burned and was not conſumed; " and that the courſe they had taken with the late " King, and meaned to follow towards others, the " capital enemies of their peace, was, they hoped, " that which would be for the good and happineſs " of both nations; of which, if that of Scotland " would think to make uſe, and vindicate their " own liberty and freedom (which lay before " them, if they gave them not away) they would " be ready to give them all neighborly and " friendly aſſiſtance, in the eſtabliſhing thereof; " and deſired them to take it into their moſt ſe- " rious conſideration, before they eſpouſed that " quarrel, which could bring them no other ad- " vantage, than the intailing upon them and their " poſterities a laſting war, with all the miſeries " which attended it, and ſlavery under a tyrant " and his iſſue."

Soon after, the Scotiſh commiſſioners were recalled. But, juſt after their departure, a reply in their name was preſented to the parliament, charging the ſiting members with unfaithfulneſs, violation of promiſes and oaths, and other things extremely offenſive. This was ſo reſented by the parliament, that they ordered them to be arreſted on the road, and taken into cuſtody, 'till it ſhould appear, whether they were avowed by their principals. But, the Scotiſh parliament juſtifying their conduct, and complaining that the law of nations was violated in their perſons, they were forthwith diſcharged.

Anſwer of the Scotiſh deputies. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 221. Whitelock, p. 384, 389. Phillips.

At ſuch a critical juncture, the Scots had only two ways to prevent a dangerous anarchy. They muſt either, with the Engliſh, alter their government into a common-wealth, or acknowledge the late King's eldeſt ſon for their Sovereign. But each of theſe ways had its difficulties. A republican government was directly oppoſite to their ancient conſtitution, both covenants, and the ſentiments of the people. Moreover, it did not appear that ſuch a change would be of any advantage to the nation. The ſecond way was alſo very perplexing, on account of Scotland's circumſtances for many years paſt. Had not James I and Charles I invaded their kingdom's privileges, by introducing the religion of England, contrary to the peoples inclinations: had not the diſputes between Charles I and the Scots produced a civil war: had not the treaty which put an end to that war, and reſtored to the Scots their ancient religion, been extorted from the King: had not the invincible diffidence of the Scots, as to Charles I. armed them to weaken his power in England, and diſable him to revoke his conceſſions to Scotland: had not the Scots ſworn two covenants, the one national and the other common, to ſupport Preſbyterianiſm: had theſe particulars, I ſay, never happened, the Scots might, nay, ought to have owned for Sovereign the next heir of the crown, purſuant to the immemorial cuſtom of Scotland. But, in recogniſing this new King, the maintenance of their laws, privileges, and religion was concerned. Herein lay the difficulty: becauſe a new King's acceſſion to the crown was no reaſon for their parting with things which had coſt them a ten years war. They knew Prince Charles, the late King's eldeſt ſon, held his father's principles, as to religion and civil government; and never had, nor at preſent entertained any about his perſon, who were not avowed enemies to their nation and religion. In receiving him therefore for King, without a previous contract, they ran the riſque of being re-plunged into their former condition under Charles I, who, they believed, by artifices, and at laſt by open violence, had reſolved to reduce the kirk of Scotland to an exact conformity with the church of England. If then it was, agreeably to the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom, natural to own him for Sovereign, who was next heir to the crown, it was equally proper, in their preſent circumſtances, to conſult the preſervation of what they had had with ſo much difficulty recovered. Was it reaſonable for them to throw themſelves at the mercy of a young Prince, yet unknown to them, and render their peace and happineſs dependent on his ſole will, notwithſtanding their ſuſpicions of his having no more affection for them than his father? Nevertheleſs, his affairs being almoſt deſperate, they thought the offer of their crown would induce him to become a good Scot, and diſmiſs his Engliſh counſellors, who were improper for Scotland; in a word, would eſteem himſelf extremely happy to recover one of his kingdoms, and find himſelf in the condition of his anceſtors, before his grandfather's acceſſion to England. They reſolved therefore to recogniſe and proclaim him, but with reſtrictions, leaving them at liberty to capitulate with him. The proclamation was as follows:

INTER-REG. AN' 1649.

The proclamation being publiſhed, the council diſpatched ſir Joſeph Douglas, to inform the King of it; and the States ſent commiſſioners (2), only to acquaint him with what had been done in his favor, but without any order or inſtruction to treat with him. Before the terms, on which he was to be inveſted with the royal authority, were propoſed to him, it was requiſite to know, if he would accept the crown upon conditions yet unknown, but eaſy to be conjectured (3). The commiſſioners found the King at the Hague, where at the ſame time arrived, in another ſhip, the earls of Lanerick and Lauderdale, and ſome time after, the earl of Montroſe from France. The late King, upon his retreat to the Scotiſh army, having ordered Montroſe to lay down his arms, he paſſed into Germany, and ſerved in the Imperial army. He afterwards went to France, where the Queen and Prince of Wales received him quite otherwiſe than he expected, after his ſignal ſervices in Scotland. This coldneſs was occaſioned by his arrival in France, at the very juncture the Queen was indeavoring to perſuade the King, her huſband, to throw himſelf upon the Preſbyterians, and grant all their demands, believing it to be his only refuge. This was therefore an improper ſeaſon to careſs a man, who was extremely odious in Scotland. He had been very ſucceſsful in the King's ſervice, but had ſo barbarouſly uſed his advantages, that he was degraded by the parliament, and excommunicated by the kirk; ſo that in Scotland he was accounted an enemy to the nation, and to Preſbyterianiſm. His reſidence in France being very diſagreeable, he no ſooner heard of the death of Charles I, than he went to the Hague, to offer his ſervice to the new King. He had, in his retinue, ſome Scotch lords and gentlemen attached to his fortune.

The King very coldly received the news of his being proclaimed, on account of the reſtriction in the proclamation, However there was nothing ſtrange in it, ſince the Scots only required what had been demanded of Charles I purſuant to their covenant, and that of the two kingdoms. But it ſeems, the King and his council thought the Scots had no right to inſiſt on ſuch conditions. That is to ſay properly, the Scots in acknowleging his Majeſty, ought to own the injuſtice of their covenants, and renounce all their pretenſions. They apprehended it to be an irreconcilable contradiction, That the Scots ſhould recogniſe the King's undoubted right, and yet deſire a capitulation with him. In a word, they pretended the tranſactions of the laſt ten or twelve years ought to be wholly buried in oblivion. Charles I, Charles II, and their counſellors, were prepoſſeſſed with an opinion which frequently deceived them, viz. that there was no mean between an abſolute attachment and an intire enmity to the King. The lord Clarendon's Hiſtory abounds with examples of this prepoſſeſſion. But, to confine myſelf to the preſent occaſion, this illuſtrious hiſtorian, in repreſenting the Scots as fired with a juſt indignation againſt the Engliſh parliament, for the King's death, infers, that Scotland would have accepted the Prince, his ſon, for ſucceſſor without any condition: and, as this did not happen, he imputes it to the intrigues and credit of the marquis of Argyle. He tells us, The marquis could have wiſhed to prevent the King's being proclaimed; but, not daring to oppoſe the general ſentiment of the kingdom, he was obliged to give his conſent. According to this author, the marquis was the ſole cauſe of the reſtriction in the proclamation: which ſuppoſes the proclamation to have been the general ſenſe of the people, and the reſtriction the effect of Argyle's intrigues. But if this reſtriction agreed with the intereſts and ſentiments of the governing party, as I have ſhewn, why is it ſolely aſcribed to the marquis? Was it impoſſible for the Scotiſh nation to recogniſe King Charles II, without intirely confiding in him? But the Scots only acted with him as they had done with his father, as appears from the covenant itſelf, wherein they diſcovered an extreme diſtruſt of the late King, even when they ingaged to defend his perſon and rights. There was therefore nothing new or extraordinary in the reſtriction; it was a natural conſequence of the troubles begun in 1637.

However this be, Charles thought little regard was due to what had been hitherto done for him in Scotland. He perceived that, in the intended capitulation, things would be required which he had determined not to grant, as the confirmation of the covenant and Preſbyterianiſm. He deſired however to juſtify his averſion to Scotland, by the advice and approbation of the Scotiſh lords now with him at the Hague. To this end, he would have them appear together before his council, and, after being conſulted, diſſuade him from paſſing into Scotland, and the council thereupon form their reſolution. The marquis of Montroſe liked this proceeding; but the earls of Lauderdale and Lanerick (the latter of whom aſſumed the title of duke of Hamilton, on hearing at the Hague of the tragical death of his brother) would not agree to it. They judged it too nice a point, for Scotiſh lords to appear before an Engliſh council. This had occaſioned the earl of Traquaire's ruin. On the other hand, they were ſo incenſed againſt the marquis of Montroſe, that they would have no concern with him. The King, finding they could not be brought together to conſult on this ſubject, declared however againſt going into Scotland, and his mind was ſtill intent upon Ireland. Thus, upon a bare report, that Scotland would not accept him without conditions, he reſolved to refuſe the crown of that kingdom; nay, he commiſſioned the marquis of Montroſe to raiſe forces in Germany, and invade Scotland. So, tho' he thankfully received the propoſal made him by the Scots, he ordered a war to be levied on them, as on enemies, becauſe they would not acknowlege him for their King, without a previous ingagement. Nothing more clearly demonſtrates the neceſſity of the precautions of the Scots, tho' ſome hiſtorians are pleaſed to repreſent them as very unjuſt.

The King could reſide no longer in Holland, where he was told, the States dreaded a rupture with the new common-wealth of England, which rendered his reſidence there very diſagreeable. Moreover, they had advice that the parliament would ſend an agent, to propoſe a ſtrict alliance between the two common-wealths; which affair was not to be negociated while the King continued at the Hague. This agent, named Doriſlaus, did indeed arrive, before the King's departure. But the very evening he came, as he ſat at ſupper in his inn, with ſome other perſons, ſix Scots of the marquis of Montroſe's retinue entered the room, and, dragging him from the table, murdered him (1). The aſſaſſins were neither arreſted, nor immediately purſued; and, tho' afterwards pains were taken to apprehend them, the States diſcovered on that occaſion a great regard for the King, which offended the parliament. Nevertheleſs, the King perceived, after this action, he could not ſtay at the Hague; and the Prince of Orange informed him, that he would be deſired to depart. He therefore ſent his heavy baggage and ſome of his domeſtics to Ireland, reſolving to follow them, after he had made a viſit to his mother in France. But, not being ready, he prevented the ungrateful compliment of the States, by preſenting to them in perſon a memorial of the ſituation of his affairs, and aſked their advice, whether he ſhould go for Ireland or Scotland. The States, finding he was about to depart, judged it inconvenient to preſs him, whereby he gained time to be prepared.

Preſents a memorial to the States. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 230.

While the King was deliberating at the Hague, on the propoſal from Scotland, the States of that nation were ſetling the conditions on which he was to be received, not doubting his readineſs to accept the offered crown. But he had friends in Scotland, who, being better informed of his ſentiments, reſolved to diſturb the public deliberations by an inſurrection, hoping good ſucceſs would procure the King to be admited without any terms. To this end Middleton, Monroe, the Gordons and others drew together ſome forces in the North, and ſeized the town of Inverneſs. But the parliament, having previous intelligence of their intent, had already raiſed forces, which directly marched to the North, under Straughan and Kerr, and diſperſed the mutineers, before they could aſſemble all their forces.

Ibid. Whitelock. p. 386. Heath. Phillips.

Tho' the King had taken a firm reſolution to go to Ireland, it was impoſſible to put it in execution, on account of the turn of affairs in that iſland. After the parliament became maſter of Dublin, it had been frequently moved in the houſe, to ſend an able re-inforcement to Ireland: but the interfering intereſts of the Preſbyterians and Independents prevented their coming to any reſolution. The former would have Sir William Waller ſent to command there, and the latter were as ſtrenuous for major-general Lambert. The diviſion between the parliament and army, which happened ſoon after, brought new obſtacles to this affair. At laſt, the revolt of Wales, inſurrections in other places, and preparations of the Scots to invade England baniſhed all thoughts of Ireland. If, at this juncture, the Iriſh had been united together, and joined the marquis of Ormond, they might have expelled the parliament's forces, and taken poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom. But their diviſions prevented their improving ſo fair an opportunity. It was not, as I obſerved, 'till the end of the year 1648, that they entered into a treaty with the marquis of Ormond; and O Neale's oppoſition hindered the marquis from taking the field 'till April, 1649, when the King was dead, and the Engliſh government changed into a common-wealth.

The union of the Iriſh with the Royaliſts, marquis of Ormond's progreſs, and extreme weakneſs of the parliament's party in that iſland, at laſt, brought the houſe to reſolve on ſending thither a powerful army, with all expedition. Waller, being a Preſbyterian, was no longer thought a proper general to ſerve the parliament; and Lambert, hitherto ſupported by Cromwell, was now ſupplanted by him. The Levellers riſe in arms. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 280. Phillips. Heath. p. 233. Whitelock. p. 401, 402. May 15.

Beſide the Cavaliers and Preſbyterians, the parliament had other enemies, even in the army, who only wanted a pretenſe to declare. Theſe were the Levellers, diſcontented becauſe, after they had been imployed as inſtruments to ruin the Preſbyterian parliament, they were diſregarded, and even ſtiled ſeditious and rebels. On Cromwell's being appointed commander in Ireland they aſſembled, under the pretenſe of inquiring what troops were proper to ſerve in that iſland (1). With this view they met at Burford to the number of five thouſand, pretending Cromwell promiſed, that no part of the army ſhould approach within ten miles. But Reynolds, by general Fairfax's order, unexpectedly attacked them with five or ſix thouſand men, and intirely defeated them. Nine hundred horſe and four hundred foot were ſent priſoners to London, and ſome of them put to death. Others, by Cromwell's mediation, received a pardon. This affair being ſo happily ended, the army was prepared which Cromwell deſigned to lead into Ireland.

Ormond unſucceſsful in Ireland. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 248. Bates. Phillips. Ludlow.

During theſe preparations, the marquis of Ormond approached Dublin, to beſiege it. Upon this, Cromwell forthwith ſent about three thouſand men to re-inforce the gariſon. In the interim, believing he could not arrive in time to ſave the city, he determined to land his army in Munſter, where he hoped to find no obſtacle, ſince the lord Inchiquin, preſident of that province, was gone with his Engliſh troops to re-inforce the marquis of Ormond's army. But the marquis, appriſed of his deſign, immediately diſpatched the lord Inchiquin with his forces to hinder his landing, by which he conſiderably weakened his army. However he proceeded on his march, and began the blocade of Dublin, about the middle of June. He ſtaid ſome time at Finglaſs, two miles from Dublin, in hopes of freſh troops, and at laſt, paſſing the river, he poſted himſelf at Rathmines, to beſiege it in form. While he remained in this camp, the ſuccors ſent by Cromwell arrived in Dublin. A few days after, the marquis reſolved to repair an old caſtle, the ſituation whereof was proper to prevent any freſh relief from entering the city: But colonel Jones the governor, who from a lawyer became an able officer, foreſeeing theſe fortifications might greatly annoy him, reſolved to put a ſtop to their being compleated. With this view, puting the gariſon under arms in the night, at break of day he made a ſally, marched directly to the caſtle, and took it ſword in hand. Upon this happy ſucceſs, he advanced towards the enemy's camp. He met in his way a body of horſe, which ſtopped him ſome time. But, diſperſing of this party, he ſo terrified the Iriſh army, that they fled in diſorder without ſtriking a blow. The marquis of Ormond was obliged to follow them, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies. After this defeat he was forced to retreat at ſome diſtance, and wait for the ſuccors he expected.

Cromwell, hearing of this ſucceſs, while he was imbarking his army, altered his reſolution, and, inſtead of going to Munſter, ſailed for Dublin, where he ſafely arrived, about the middle of Auguſt. The marquis of Ormond, upon the news of Cromwell's arrival, retired ſtill farther from Dublin, and left in Drogheda a numerous gariſon (2), under the command of Sir Arthur Aſton, a famous officer, who had been governor of Reading, and afterwards of Oxford. About this time Londonderry, the principal city in the north of Ireland, which was beſieged by the King's forces, received relief by a ſally made by Sir Richard Coot, much in the manner Dublin was relieved by Jones.

INTER-REG. AN' 1649.

What has been ſaid manifeſtly ſhews the King could not venture into Ireland, without any ſuccors to carry thither but his perſon, while Cromwell was aſſembling his army on the coaſt, and ſtill leſs after Ormond's defeat. But as, on the other hand, he met with cold treatment in France, where, ſince his arrival, the court made no offers to ſerve him, he reſolved to repair to the iſle of Jerſey, the only place where he could hope for a favorable reception (3). He therefore retreated to that iſle with his brother the duke of York, and his ſmall court, where he remained ſome months (4).

The King quits his deſign of going to Ireland. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 251, 264. Retires to Jerſey, Sept. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 252, 258. Phillips.

The commotions cauſed by the King's friends in Scotland being appeaſed, the commitee of eſtates aſſembled to ſetle the conditions to be demanded of the King. It appears the Scots were ignorant of the King's ſentiments, ſince they ſtill deliberated on that ſubject, which doubtleſs they would not have done, had they been informed of his reſolution. In all appearance, as the eſtates had not yet expreſly invited him over to receive the crown, he thought he was not obliged to acquaint them with his ſentiments; and, if he had returned an anſwer to the envoys of the eſtates and council, it was too general to draw any inference from it. However this be, the commitee of eſtates, learning the King was in Jerſey, ſent mr. George Windram to acquaint him, they deſired to treat with him about his eſtabliſhment in Scotland: but the iſle of Jerſey being neither ſafe nor commodious, he was requeſted to name ſome town in the Low Countries, to receive their commiſſioners. To this end it was required, as a neceſſary preliminary to the negociation, that he ſhould acknowlege the authority of the preſent parliament, and eſpecially of the two laſt ſeſſions. Windram left Edinburgh the twenty fifth of September, but did not reach the King before the latter end of October, by reaſon of contrary winds: ſo that the King was fully informed of what had happened in Ireland, where Cromwell, having taken Drogheda by aſſault, had put the gariſon to the ſword, and continued his progreſs with amazing rapidity. Upon this news, the King fixed his eyes more intently on Scotland than before. He was ſenſible he ſhould be welcome neither to France nor Holland. He was intirely excluded from Ireland, nor could Jerſey much longer afford him ſubſiſtence. Moreover he was told, the parliament had given orders for a fleet to reduce that iſland, which was in a defenſeleſs condition. Scotland was therefore the only place where he could ſubſiſt in ſafety. For this reaſon he gave Windram a gracious reception, and appointed Breda for receiving the Scotiſh commiſſioners, promiſing to be there himſelf the fifteenth of the following March. However it was not without ſome reluctance that he came to this reſolution. Beſide his little affection for the Scots, whom he believed to be the principal authors of his father's misfortunes, not one counſellor adviſed him to throw himſelf into their hands, tho' it was impoſſible to direct him to another retreat. So that it was pure neceſſity, which cauſed him to reſolve upon liſtening to the propoſals of the Scots. That this was his ſole motive can ſcarce be doubted, if it be conſidered that, on the thirtieth of January, 1649, he wrote to the marquis of Montroſe, that the Scots had ſent Windram to him, and their commiſſioners would be at Breda, in March, to treat with him. He therefore preſſed him to forward his preparations for invading Scotland, before the ſetlement of this affair, in order if poſſible, and it ſhould pleaſe God to proſper his arms, to prevent the concluſion thereof (1).

Windram being returned with his Majeſty's anſwer, the commitee of eſtates labored inceſſantly to diſpatch the propoſitions to be ſent to the King. The draught was laid before the parliament, and, after ſome amendments, ordered to be ſhewn to the general aſſembly of the kirk, where it was approved. Hence it is manifeſt, theſe propoſitions were ſetled with common conſent, ſeeing they had the concurrence of both parliament and kirk, tho' ſome have been pleaſed to aſcribe them ſolely to the marquis of Argyle, as if they agreed more with his intereſt than that of the kingdom. After this, the parliament and general aſſembly nominated commiſſioners to carry them to the King. Theſe commiſſioners, arriving at Breda at the time appointed, preſented to him the terms, on which the Scots would admit him to exerciſe the regal authority. They contained the four following articles:

Heath.

Terms preſented to the King by the Scotiſh commiſſioners. Phillips, p. 595. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 267. Bates. Whitelock.

I. That all who have been, and remain excommunicate by the kirk of Scotland, may be debared from having any acceſs to court.

II. That he would be pleaſed to declare, that he would, by ſolemn oath under his hand and ſeal, ratify the national covenant of Scotland, and the ſolemn league and covenant of Scotland, England and Ireland; and that he would proſecute the ends thereof in his royal ſtation.

III. That he would confirm and approve all acts of parliament, injoining the ſolemn league and covenant, and eſtabliſhing Preſbyterian government, the directory of worſhip, confeſſion of faith and catechiſm in the kingdom of Scotland, as they are now approved by the general aſſembly of the kirk, and by the parliament of that kingdom; and that he would give his royal aſſent to the acts of parliament injoining the ſame in the reſt of his dominions, and that he would obſerve the ſame in his own practiſe and family, and never oppoſe it, or indeavor any change thereof.

IV. That he would conſent that all civil matters might be determined by the preſent and ſubſequent parliaments of the kingdom of Scotland, all eccleſiaſtical matters by the inſuing general aſſemblies of the kirk, as was formerly condeſcended and agreed to by his late father.

Upon hearing theſe articles, the King demanded, whether the papers they had put into his hands contained all their demands? Whether they were impowered to recede from any particular condition, or to treat with him about the aſſiſtance of Scotland, to place him on the Engliſh throne? They replied, their commiſſion was limited to the offering of theſe propoſitions, and to receive either his conſent or refuſal.

Remarks on theſe propoſitions.

Theſe terms, which the Scots believed to be very juſt, lawful, and abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of their country, appeared to the King extremely hard and unreaſonable. This contrariety will not ſeem ſtrange, if it be conſidered that the King and the Scots reaſoned on different principles, and with contrary views: and this it will not be amiſs to explain.

Inter-reg. An' 1649.

The Scots were perſuaded James VI had oppreſſed them in eſtabliſhing Epiſcopacy in Scotland, which had been aboliſhed by the reformation: that this had been done by addreſs, artifice, and force, while corrupt parliaments were imployed to inact new laws concerning religion, without the kirk's advice, in oppoſition to her will and expreſs declarations: that Charles I, by fraud ſupported with violence, had aſſumed a power of ordaining whatſoever he pleaſed in matters of religion, by virtue of an act ſuppoſed by him to have paſſed by a plurality of voices, tho' it was rejected: that by this pretended power he had not only reſtored biſhops to their revenues and government in the church, but alſo granted them a juriſdiction more extenſive than ever: that he had authoriſed a high commiſſion to ſupport this injuſtice, and intirely ſuppreſſed the general aſſemblies. In a word, that he had altered the Preſbyterian government, eſtabliſhed by the reformation, into a hierarchy, perfectly like that of the church of England; that he had likewiſe attempted to impoſe upon them a liturgy and canons, unknown to their anceſtors, and to bring the worſhip of the church of Scotland to an exact conformity with that of England: that the Scots for their own ſecurity, and the preſervation of their rights, ſo manifeſtly invaded, had judged it expedient to unite in a covenant, deſigned for the maintenance of the King's juſt rights, and the privileges of the people and kirk: that the King, not ſatisfied with his juſt rights, had twice made war upon his Scotiſh ſubjects, to ſupport his uſurped power, and render Scotland dependent on England: that this war had been concluded by a treaty, to which the King would not have conſented, had he not been conſtrained to it by the affairs of England: that after this treaty he came into Scotland, where he granted his ſubjects all their demands, and even the things he had before haughtily and obſtinately refuſed: that it was therefore to be ſuſpected he had only adapted himſelf to the times, 'till an opportunity offered to revoke his conceſſions: that it was no wonder the Scots ſhould harbor this ſuſpicion, ſince the King by the like conduct in England had deſtroyed all confidence in him: that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to reduce him to ſuch a ſtate, as would effectually prevent his retracting: that to this purpoſe the Scots had entered into a ſolemn league with the Engliſh, as having the ſame common intereſt, and that the ſword had decided in behalf of the allies againſt the King: that, notwithſtanding this deciſion, the Scots had never any thoughts of withdrawing the allegiance due to the King, but only of procuring other ſecurity than his bare word: that the late King's tragical death had not changed the ſtate of affairs in Scotland, or brought them the ſo long deſired ſecurity: that they demanded no more of the new King, than they had a right to claim from his father: that their deſires were juſt, ſince they only expected to be maintained in the ſtate they injoyed, before the two laſt Kings had indeavored to alter the eſtabliſhed religion, according to their fancy, and the humor of their Engliſh counſellors: that they had run all riſques to reſtore themſelves to their former condition: that, God having given them good ſucceſs, they could ſee no ſufficient reaſon to deſiſt, and expoſe their tranquillity and religion to the caprices of a young

Inter-reg. An' 1649.

Prince, who was known to retain the principles of his father and grandfather: that their propoſitions did not limit his prerogative as King of Scotland, but only reſtrained him from treading in the ſteps of the King his father: That, in offering him the crown of Scotland, they might lawfully require him to govern according to the true intereſt of that kingdom: that, if he apprehended theſe terms to be contrary to his intereſt, with reſpect to England, he was at liberty to reject them; but his intereſt, with regard to England, was not a valid motive to ingage the Scots to hazard their happineſs, in leaving him to govern at his pleaſure: that it was not yet fifty years ſince James the VI became King of England, and that as Charles I had by his miſmanagement loſt that crown, and Charles II was in no condition to recover it, he ought to think himſelf happy, that the Scots had offered him the crown of his ancient kingdom, on the very terms it had been injoyed by his predeceſſors for many ages; and that, by being a good Scotſman, he would be reſtored to the ſtate of his anceſtors, Kings of Scotland: that it was unreaſonable to permit perſons excommunicate, and conſpirators againſt their country, in attempting by violence to reſtore the late King, to approach his Majeſty with their pernicious counſels, tending to ſow diſcord between him and his ſubjects.

The King's reaſons and intereſts.

But the King reaſoned on other principles. The propoſal of the crown of Scotland was only regarded by him as a means of reſtoring him to the Engliſh throne; this was the principal object of his attention. He little valued to be King of Scotland, if he could not imploy the Scotiſh forces to procure him the crown of England. In the interim, his power was to be ſo limited, as to render it impoſſible to receive any advantage from Scotland to that purpoſe. Thoſe whom he eſteemed as his beſt friends, and who had labored with all their might to free his father and reſtore him to his rights, were to be diſmiſſed from his perſon and council; and yet theſe were the men he deſigned to make uſe of for the recovery of England. In accepting the crown of Scotland, he muſt forget his juſt pretenſions to England. He was to govern Scotland as his predeceſſors did, before their acceſſion to the Engliſh throne; that is to ſay, he was to look on his Engliſh friends with continual diffidence, and conſequently renounce all hope of a reſtoration in England. He was to ſwear to the national covenant made againſt the late King, to prevent for ever the introducing the church-government and worſhip of England into Scotland, which alone he believed to be lawful. He muſt ſwear to the covenant of the two kingdoms, the ſole intent of which was to ſupport Preſbyterianiſm, already eſtabliſhed in England, which was an infallible way to loſe all his friends. Laſtly, he was not only to approve and protect Preſbyterianiſm in both kingdoms, but likewiſe promiſe a ſincere and conſtant profeſſion of it himſelf. But this directly oppoſed his ſentiments and conſcience, ſince he ſcarce believed the Preſbyterians to be any part of the Chriſtian church.

The King diſguiſes his reſentment. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 267. Phillips. Burnet.

Hence it appears the intereſts of the King and the Scots were no leſs contrary, than during the life of Charles I, and that, as the ſame difficulties ſtill remained, they could only be ſurmounted by the arms or acquieſcence of one of the parties. The King was incapable of uſing force, and yet the conditions propoſed to him ſeemed ſo hard, that he would have at once rejected them, if he could have taken any other courſe. But his unhappy circumſtances not knowing where to ſubſiſt, or even to be ſecure, conſtrained him to diſſemble his reſentment, and to treat with the Scotiſh commiſſioners on terms he thought very unreaſonable. There were two articles he could not digeſt. The firſt was, his being obliged to ſwear to the covenant. He alleged the covenant was made for the ſubjects, but not for the Sovereign, ſince the taker ſwore obedience to the King, and it was abſurd to make him ſwear allegiance to himſelf. This objection would have been unanſwerable, had this been the only article of the covenant. But in others it was affirmed, the King was no leſs concerned than his ſubjects. The ſecond related to religion. He ſaid, he would conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery in Scotland by act of parliament: but, as for his own perſon, it was unjuſt to oblige him to renounce the religion for which his father had died a martyr; however he would be contented with only three chaplains, to celebrate divine ſervice in his preſence after the manner of the church of England. But all he could ſay was to no purpoſe; the commiſſioners were not impowered to recede from any article. Thus had the Engliſh parliament offered to treat with his father; leaving him only at liberty to accept or reject their propoſals. But, tho' the King ſaw it was in vain to diſpute on the articles, he deſired as much as poſſible to prolong the negociation, in hopes of agreeable news from Scotland, where he knew the marquis of Montroſe would ſhortly make his appearance. This was his laſt refuge; and, had the marquis met with his former ſucceſs, the treaty of Breda would ſoon have ended, ſince the King might then abſolutely refuſe the offered conditions. But Montroſe's progreſs diſappointed the King's expectations.

But to no purpoſe.

The King amuſes the commiſſioners. Phillips.

After this lord had left the King at the Hague, he went into Germany in order to raiſe forces and money, his Majeſty having only given him a bare commiſſion. The King of Denmark, being Charles's near relation, ſupplied him with a ſum of money, and the Engliſh ſetled in Sweden did their utmoſt to aſſiſt him. This relief inabled him to buy arms and ammunition, and to liſt five hundred ſoldiers, which he ſent in March, to one of the iſles of Orkney. In April, he followed them himſelf, and from thence repaired with his troops to Cathneſs in the North of Scotland. At this very time, the Scotiſh commiſſioners were with his Majeſty at Breda. The King, being informed that Montroſe was gone into Scotland, waited for the reſult of this expedition before he would conclude with the commiſſioners, whom however he entertained with hopes of obtaining their demands.

The marquis, after his arrival at Cathneſs, ſeized a caſtle where he might ſecure his arms and ammunition, and then wrote to his friends to join him. He then alſo publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring "That he was come with a commiſſion from the King "to protect his good ſubjects; but with no deſign to "obſtruct the negociation at Breda; on the contrary, "he hoped to haſten the concluſion of it by means "of his army. If the treaty ſucceeded, he ſhould "readily lay down his arms on the firſt command "from his Majeſty".

His arrival in Scotland. March. Bates. Burnet. Whitelock. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 271.

The Scotiſh parliament, now ſiting at Edinburgh, was aſtoniſhed at the news of Montroſe's arrival, at this juncture, with the King's commiſſion. It was eaſy to ſee, notwithſtanding his pretenſes, it was not to forward, but rather obſtruct the treaty, and compel the parliament to deſiſt from conditions which were judged neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom. It is not to be imagined, this conduced to breed a good opinion of the King's ſincerity.

The Scotiſh parliament diſpleaſed with the King. p. 272.

In the interim, Montroſe being very formidable, on account of his former great ſucceſſes in behalf of the late King, the parliament forthwith gave orders for raiſing, with all expedition, an army of ſix thouſand men, under the command of David Leſley.

Inter-reg. An' 1650.

'Till this army was prepared, colonel Strahan was detached northward with three hundred horſe, to awe the country, and hinder the King's adherents from riſing and joining Montroſe. This precaution had ſurpriſing ſucceſs. His Majeſty's friends, whether from a dread of falling into the hands of the cavalry, or on account of the ſix thouſand men who were to follow, durſt not ſtir, and none, except ſome ill-armed and worſe diſciplined Highlanders, joined Montroſe: ſo that his little army, if it deſerved this name, conſiſting of ſoldiers of different nations, ignorant of each others language, and in a barren country, could not make any conſiderable progreſs. Beſide, as Montroſe wanted horſemen to bring him intelligence, he was a ſtranger to what paſſed in other places, and particularly Strahan's march, vainly hoping to be joined by the King's adherents. This occaſioned his being ſurpriſed by Strahan's little troop, which, after a tedious march, attacked him, when leaſt expected. At the enemy's approach the Highlanders deſerted and fled; the foreigners made ſome reſiſtance, but were at laſt routed (1). The marquis himſelf, being conſtrained to fly, threw away his ribband and george, and put on a peaſant's habit to prevent a diſcovery. He wandered ſome days in this diſguiſe, and at length put himſelf in the power of a gentleman named Aſton, who, having formerly ſerved under him, promiſed to conceal him. But whether for the ſake of the reward publiſhed for apprehending him, or the fear of a rigorous puniſhment if he did not diſcover him, it is certain he delivered him to Leſley, who directly ſent him to Edinburgh (2). The parliament, now ſiting, reſolved to try him themſelves; and as, ſince his degradation, he was called only James Graham, and was univerſally deteſted, no regard was paid to his extraction. They condemned him to be hanged on a gallows thirty foot high, adding to his ſentence, that, after he was dead, his head ſhould be ſevered from his body, and placed on Edinburgh-talbooth: his arms and legs ſent to four ſeveral towns, to be expoſed as a ſpectacle, and his body buried under the gallows. He faced death with extraordinary courage, and before his execution made a ſpeech to the people, in which, far from owning himſelf guilty of death, he on the contrary declared, he was firmly perſuaded of the juſtice of the cauſe he had ſupported. He affirmed that Charles I died a martyr, and aſſured the people his preſent Majeſty would perform all his promiſes to the Scots, wherein he was as falſe a prophet as the lord Capel had been in England. Thus died the marquis of Montroſe, who had rendered himſelf famous by his great actions for the late King in Scotland, but at the ſame time odious to his countrymen by his barbarity to them, when he had the advantage.

Montroſe's tragical death defeated all the King's hopes, who was thereby deprived of his only refuge. He made loud complaints to the commiſſioners of the execution of that lord, during the negociation, repreſenting it as a breach of faith. He wrote in the like ſtrain to the commitee of eſtates, but was ſilenced by their anſwer, and told it was more adviſeable for him to drop that affair. The reply imported that papers were found upon Montroſe, which it was more to his honor to ſtifle than publiſh. The King readily perceived that by this was meaned his commiſſion to Montroſe, after the news of his being proclaimed, and his letter of the thirtieth of January, after the time and place of conference were appointed. This juſtified the Scotiſh parliament from violation of faith, of which the King himſelf was not intirely guiltleſs.

His Majeſty, having after the marquis's death no refuge or retreat, at laſt accepted the propoſitions preſented to him by the commiſſioners. But the ſigning of the covenant was deferred 'till he arrived in Scotland, on his promiſing however to comply, if it was judged expedient to preſs him when he ſhould come to Edinburgh. The commiſſioners granted him this favor, being aſſured the eſtates would never recede from that article. It is manifeſt the King conſented to theſe conditions, purely becauſe it was the only courſe he could take; and it is perhaps no leſs certain he intended to obſerve them no longer, than while he ſhould be forced. This evidently appears in the hiſtory of thoſe times, written by his adherents: for they could not forbear thinking it ſtrange that the King, when in Scotland, ſhould be bound to a punctual obſervance of what he had promiſed by oaths. As if his promiſe and oath had been mere formalities, which were not to oblige him.

The King ſigns the terms. June.

His Majeſty, upon ſigning the terms, went to Sheveling near the Hague and imbarked, attended by duke Hamilton, the earl of Lauderdale, and ſome other Scots, who gave him hopes that his preſenſe in Scotland would baniſh all ſuſpicions, and that a ſtrict performance of his promiſes would be diſpenſed with. But at his arrival, before he was permited to land, the covenant was ſo preſſed upon him, that he could not refuſe it. He had poſitively promiſed to take it Breda, and no man durſt adviſe him to break his word. This exactneſs of the eſtates convinced duke Hamilton and the earl of Lauderdale, that it was dangerous for them to appear publicly in Scotland. They therefore, finding means to land with the King, retired to their own eſtates, or their friends, in hopes of a more favorable juncture.

Hamilton and Lauderdale retire.

The marquis of Argyle received his Majeſty with all poſſible outward marks of reſpect. But, within two days, all his Engliſh domeſtics were removed, except the duke of Buckingham. Some were forced to retire into Holland; others withdrew at a diſtance from court, to friends who were willing to entertain them. This rigor at firſt ſeems very ſurpriſing, and by ſome is ſo repreſented. But it muſt be conſidered, the Scots were for admiting his Majeſty on thoſe terms only, on which they would have received his father, had he fortunately eſcaped from captivity, and retired into Scotland. Doubtleſs they would never have ſuffered any about him, whoſe principles and maxims directly oppoſed the intereſts of Scotland, and who were reputed the nation's enemies. Why then ſhould they repoſe more confidence in Charles II? There was not more need for precaution under the laſt, than under the preſent reign.

His Majeſty's confidents being removed from his perſon, he found himſelf in the hands of men whom he was ignorant of, and whoſe principles intirely differed from thoſe in which he had been educated; ſo that he was extremely troubled, tho' he outwardly received all the reſpect due to his dignity. What gave him moſt uneaſineſs was the importunity of the miniſters, who judged it their duty to inſtruct him in the Preſbyterian religion, and did not ſcruple to ſtile the hierarchy and worſhip of the church of England, the doctrine of devils. They alleged, his promiſe and oath to profeſs Preſbyterianiſm, bound him to regard their inſtructions.

He diſcovers his diſpoſition as to religion, and loſes the confidence of the Scots.

His preſent imbaraſſment was a natural conſequence of the promiſe he had made, without intending to obſerve it. To be rid as much as he could of this trouble, he attended their ſermons and prayers, but in ſuch a manner as evidently ſhewed it was againſt his will (1). The reluctance he diſcovered on this article created in the Scots a very ill opinion of him, being convinced he had ſworn againſt his conſcience, and with an intent to violate his promiſes the firſt opportunity. It is therefore not ſurpriſing they placed no confidence in him, and that thoſe at the helm did not impart to him all the affairs. He was not conſidered as a Prince attached to the intereſts and religion of Scotland, but as deſigning to eſtabliſh other maxims when freed from reſtraint. But, if we call to mind the tranſactions of ſome years paſt, and the occaſion of the troubles, it will not ſeem ſo ſtrange that they took precautions, with reſpect to his Majeſty, and refuſed him a confidence, which they then apprehended to be of dangerous import.

Attempts to eſtabliſh the Hamiltonians Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 306, 307.

It ſoon appeared how neceſſary theſe precautions were, by the King's indeavors to reconcile the ſtate and the church, to thoſe who had been concerned in the late duke Hamilton's ingagement, to raiſe an army, which, under the pretenſe of acting againſt the Independents, was intended to reſtore the late King to the Engliſh throne without any condition. The authors of that deſign had thereby involved Scotland in a war not only needleſs, but directly oppoſite to her intereſts. Beſide, their bad conduct had occaſioned the loſs of a numerous army, and a great effuſion of blood. What might not the Scots have added to enhance the crimes of the Hamiltonians, had they heard of the ſecret treaty made with the late King in the Iſle of Wight, ſo contrary to the covenant of both kingdoms? It is no wonder therefore men who had ſo directly oppoſed the intereſts of Scotland, or at leaſt of the prevailing party, were conſidered by that party as enemies of the ſtate and religion. And yet theſe were the men for whom his Majeſty labored ſo ſtrenuouſly, under color of happily uniting his ſubjects. But all the while he plainly diſcovered an averſion to the maxims, by which the kingdom was then governed, and his intent to inable his adherents to oppoſe the marquis of Argyle, who was the head of the contrary faction and of the government. This lord eaſily perceived the King's deſign; and therefore, tho' he had hitherto conſtantly attended him, he by degrees withdrew himſelf from him, as from a ſecret enemy who only wanted an occaſion to ruin him.

Engliſh parliament's reſolution againſt Scotland. p. 292. Phillips. Whitelock. p. 460.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the Engliſh were not idle; for, finding commiſſioners from that kingdom were to confer with the King at Breda, they apprehended he would accept the crown of Scotland on any conditions, in order to uſe the Scotiſh forces to invade England, in which they were not miſtaken. This war, which the parliament thought unavoidable, muſt of courſe be very dangerous to the Independent party, if brought into England. The Independents, tho' uppermoſt, had no ſupport except the army, having the Preſbyterians, the Royaliſts, and the city of London for their enemies. It was therefore highly probable, if his Majeſty entered England with a Scotiſh army, that he would be joined by the Royaliſts, and favored by the Preſbyterians: wherefore, to avert this danger, the parliament reſolved to carry war into Scotland. This reſolution was intirely founded on policy, ſince the parliament had no reaſon to complain of the Scots, who, in acknowledging the late King's eldeſt ſon for their Sovereign, did not injure England. Nay, it was a conſequence of the covenant between both kingdoms, tho' notoriouſly violated by the Engliſh parliament. But, at this juncture, the parliament believed themſelves not obliged to a ſcrupulous obſervance of the rules of equity, on account of the prejudice which in time might attend ſuch ſcruples. Intereſt therefore was ſolely conſulted, which required the war ſhould rather be carried into Scotland than expected in England.

INTER-REG. AN° 1650.

Upon this reſolution Cromwell was haſtily recalled out of Ireland, to command the army which was to march againſt Scotland. General Fairfax's behavior, in the late Scotiſh invaſion under duke Hamilton, had given occaſion to believe, that he would not willingly accept the conduct of the war, which was true in fact. Cromwell's ſucceſs in Ireland had anſwered the very wiſhes of the parliament. Having taken Drogheda he ſeized Kilkenny and many other places, and in a ſhort time reduced the greateſt part of the iſland to the obedience of the parliament. The marquis of Ormond was in no condition to reſiſt him, on account of the diviſion ſtill reigning among the Iriſh. This diſſenſion roſe ſo high that O Neale at laſt concluded a treaty with Monk, one of the parliament generals, commiſſioned by the council of ſtate. But the parliament would not ratify the treaty, as being too favorable to the Catholics; and therefore O Neale had begun to treat with Ormond, and was on the point of joining him, when he was prevented by death. Upon this his troops diſperſed, and ſo were of no advantage to the marquis. In the interim Cromwell purſued his conqueſts with amazing rapidity, and, to hinder the agreement and junction of the Iriſh, he thought of an expedient which anſwered his purpoſe. He publiſhed a proclamation permiting all the Iriſh officers to liſt, in the ſervice of foreign Princes, as many ſoldiers as they pleaſed of their own nation, with a promiſe not to give them the leaſt interruption. Upwards of twenty-five thouſand forthwith choſe to ſerve France and Spain, and afterwards a much greater number (2). This proceeding put it out of Ormond's power to bring an army into the field, capable of oppoſing that of the parliament; ſo that, when Cromwell was recalled, the Iriſh affairs were in ſo good a ſituation, that his ſon-in-law Ireton, whom he left there as his lieutenant, had very little to do.

Cromwell, upon his arrival at London, took his ſeat in parliament, where, by order of the houſe, the ſpeaker thanked him for his late ſervices. The Scotiſh war being now the moſt preſſing affair, the parliament cauſed Fairfax to be aſked, whether he would undertake the conduct of it? He anſwered, If the Scots invaded England, he would indeavor to repel them, but deſired to be excuſed from attacking them in their own country. Some pains were taken to convince him of the juſtice and neceſſity of this war, but without effect. Cromwell acted ſo artfully that, tho' he paſſionately wiſhed to be commander in chief, he gave his opinion for Fairfax, and pretended he ſhould be well pleaſed to ſerve as his lieutenant. Fairfax perceived that being a Preſbyterian, tho' he had but too faithfully ſerved the Independents, the parliament would not have repoſed much confidence in him, and that the zeal ſhewn in his favor was purely ceremony. He therefore ſent his commiſſion to the houſe, which Parliament's manifeſto. p. 464. Phillips. Bates.

While an army was preparing to march againſt Scotland, the parliament appointed a commitee to draw up a manifeſto, relating to the intended war. This precaution ſeemed the more neceſſary, becauſe the houſe knew the Cavaliers and Preſbyterians would take pains to repreſent this war, as the moſt unjuſt that ever was, ſeeing the Scots had offered no provocation. The commitee concerned about the manifeſto, unwilling to publiſh the true reaſon of the war, viz. to ſupport the Independents, were contented with ſuppoſing the Scots intended to force the Engliſh to recogniſe King Charles II, tho' they had not as yet advanced one ſtep towards it. It was however very probable the King would indeavor to ingage them in a rupture with the Engliſh parliament; but there was no likelihood of ſucceſs, conſidering his utter averſion to become a good Preſbyterian.

The Scots, hearing of the preparations againſt them in England, raiſed an army with all expedition (2), and gave the command to general Leſley, not daring to truſt his Majeſty for the reaſons aforeſaid. He was even permited to ſee this army only once, leſt he ſhould gain the officers and ſoldiers by his intrigues. David Leſley incamped between Leith and Edinburgh, and fortified his camp with ſuch intrenchments, that he could not be attacked without manifeſt danger.

Cromwell enters Scotland. July 22. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 293. Phillips.

About the middle of July, Cromwell appeared at the head of the Engliſh army, conſiſting of eighteen or nineteen thouſand men, and marched to the frontiers of Scotland, where he publiſhed his manifeſto. The enemy's army lying incamped near Edinburgh, he eaſily penetrated into Scotland. But, finding the country deſtitute of inhabitants, and all things proper to ſubſiſt his army conveyed away, he was obliged to maintain it with ſupplies from his fleet. However he proceeded, and came in ſight of the enemy's army; but he found it incapable of being attacked. He therefore retired towards Muſſelborough, whereupon Leſley detached a large body of horſe, which fell upon the Engliſh rear, commanded by Lambert, with ſome advantage (3). The next day there was a ſharp ſkirmiſh, in which the Scots defeated ſome Engliſh regiments; but at laſt were forced back to their camp with conſiderable loſs. Then Cromwell once more indeavored, by his approach, to draw the Scotiſh army out of their intrenchments, but to no purpoſe. At laſt, after both armies had continued almoſt in view ſeveral weeks, Cromwell, for want of proviſions and forage, was obliged to retire. He deſigned to imbark his foot, and with only his horſe return into England. In order to this he marched towards Dunbar, where his fleet expected him, his army being reduced to about twelve thouſand men.

The Scots, appriſed of Cromwell's reſolution, fancied the Engliſh were ſtruck with terror, and that a fairer opportunity could not offer to ingage them, and therefore to purſue them cloſely they quited their camp. The firſt day they incamped on a hill, about a mile from Dunbar, ſo that Cromwell could not imbark his foot, without running the riſque of a defeat. General Leſley was againſt attacking the Engliſh, and only for watching an opportunity to fight them with advantage. But the clamors of the miniſters in his army, who promiſed an undoubted victory, as if they had ſome revelation (4), obliged him on the morrow to draw nearer the enemy. Cromwell, who obſerved them with a perſpective glaſs, when he ſaw them deſcend the hill, cried out, "That God had delivered them "into his hands." He forthwith went to prayers, and then informed ſome of his officers, he had felt, in praying, ſuch a repoſe in his mind, that he doubted not but God would grant him the victory. Perhaps he really believed this, or elſe it was an artifice to invigorate his ſoldiers, who were moſt of them fanatics. The armies remained in ſight all the reſt of the day, Leſley ſtill alleging ſome pretenſe to delay fighting. But, in the night, Cromwell reſolved to attack the Scots at break of day. It was his frequent and ever ſucceſsful maxim, not to expect but attack the enemy, regardleſs of number, being convinced the aſſailants always have a great advantage.

Upon this reſolution he drew up his army in the night, and begun the fight an hour before day. The Scotiſh cavalry on the right wing at firſt made a briſk defenſe, but were at laſt put to flight. The left wing retreated, without charging once. Three regiments of Scotiſh infantry fought ſo bravely, that they were almoſt all ſlain on the ſpot. The reſt, finding themſelves deſerted by the horſe, fled in diſorder, leaving the field and a certain victory to the Engliſh. It is reported the Scots loſt three thouſand men (5), beſide ſeven or eight thouſand priſoners and twenty-ſeven pieces of cannon; and that the Engliſh loſt only three hundred. The Scots after their defeat quited Leith and Edinburgh, of which Cromwell took poſſeſſion, but Edinburgh caſtle held out 'till the end of December.

This misfortune to the Scots was of ſervice to his Majeſty, as it obliged them to take notice of the Hamiltonian party. At the raiſing of the army lately defeated at Dunbar, none were admited who had been concerned in the late duke Hamilton's ingagement, or were ſuſpected to be attached to the King. In a word, the rigid Preſbyterians, then at the helm of affairs, would not aſſociate with thoſe whom they ſtiled the luke-warm, that is, men not ſufficiently zealous for the covenant. After the defeat at Dunbar a new army was to be raiſed, to withſtand Cromwell, who threatened to compleat the ruin of Scotland the following ſpring. The parliament was therefore convened at St. Johnſtoun's, where the King retired (6). But, as it was difficult to form a new army of the zealous, it was propoſed in parliament to receive into this all ſuch as had Upon this the council of State appointed Cromwell, Lambert, Harriſon, St. John and Whitelock to indeavor to convince him of the juſtice of the undertaking. been hitherto called Luke-warm, who offered to ſerve their country in its preſent extremity. This affair being debated, the parliament was conſtrained to reſolve, That all, who had been excluded from places, ſhould be permited to produce proofs of their repentance, and then be imployed in the ſervice of their country. Purſuant to this reſolution thoſe, who had 'till now oppoſed the marquis of Argyle, wanted zeal for the covenant, diſcovered an attachment to the King, and had even been imployed by Charles I, readily made an outward ſhow of repentance, in a diſavowal of their former conduct and a reconciliation with the kirk. Upon this they were admited to public imploys, as well as into the parliament, and eſpecially to poſts in the army then raiſing. Hence his Majeſty at laſt obtained what he had ſo paſſionately deſired, namely, to ſee his friends in a condition to ſerve him on a proper occaſion.

Proteſtation againſt it. Phillips. Burnet's Hiſt. p. 55.

But the parliament's reſolution, of which neceſſity was either the motive or pretenſe, diſpleaſed the zealots. They could not bear the admiſſion of Malignants, as they termed them, to imployments, under color of a reſolution procured from the parliament by artifice and cabal, as the levying an army had before been obtained to ſerve againſt the intereſts of Scotland. They alleged, it was mocking God to admit the guilty to an hypocritical repentance, in order to reſtore them to imploys from which they had been juſtly excluded. But it was replied, it was ſtrange cruelty to remove men from imploys, who offered to ſerve their country, at ſuch a critical juncture, and had profeſſed repentance, for having wanted ſufficient zeal for the common cauſe. In a word, the former ſolemnly proteſted againſt the reſolution of the parliament, forming a party, ſtiled Proteſtors, while thoſe who adhered to it formed another, called Reſolutioners. Five weſtern counties (1) joined the Proteſtors, and, entering into an aſſociation, publiſhed a remonſtrance which, being laid before the parliament, was voted ſeditious. But this did not prevent ſeveral officers of reputation, as Strahan, Kerr, and ſome others, from adhering to the Proteſtors.

Remarks on the reſolution of admiting the Hamiltonians. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 308.

Doubtleſs, if the people of Scotland had been conſulted, this reſolution would never have paſſed in the parliament. The people were ſo zealous for the covenant, that there was no probability of their receding from their rigidneſs at once, in behalf of perſons who had not ſubſcribed it, or ſcrupled to break it. It is therefore very likely this reſolution was brought about by the intrigues and cabals of Argyle's enemies, under color of the neceſſity of raiſing new forces. Nothing more clearly ſhews its being oppoſite to the general ſenſe of the people, than the profeſſion of repentance, required of all who were to be admited to any imploys. This was manifeſtly a condeſcenſion for the people, who believed a luke-warmneſs for the covenant to be the moſt heinous of crimes. Accordingly it was publickly ſaid, the defeat at Dunbar was a juſt puniſhment for having called in the King, before he had given any proofs of his repentance. This was the moſt general ſentiment, notwithſtanding the contrary deciſion of the parliament. But parliamentary reſolutions, either in Scotland or England, are not always to be conſidered as the ſenſe of the nation. It is a defect in the conſtitution of both theſe ſtates, that members of parliament receive no inſtructions from their electors. They are no ſooner aſſembled than they become ſovereigns of thoſe by whom they are choſen, and palm upon the nation their own deciſions for thoſe of the public, tho' they are often contrary to the inclinations and intereſts of the people repreſented. Examples are ſo frequent, that the proof of this point is intirely needleſs.

Phillips, p. 601. Bates.

The managers of this affair in parliament were ſenſible, the number of the Proteſtors greatly exceeded that of the Reſolutioners: wherefore they judged it expedient to give an appearance of ſatisfaction to the former, leſt they ſhould obſtruct the deſigns formed in favor of the King. They projected to put his Majeſty at the head of an army, almoſt wholly at his devotion, that he might, when occaſion offered, march into England, where it was not queſtioned he would find many adherents and a powerful aſſiſtance. The rigid Preſbyterians were therefore not to be alarmed, at ſeeing the King at the head of an army, for fear of their preventing the execution of this deſign. Wherefore it was thought adviſeable for his Majeſty to publiſh a ſtrange declaration, wherein he was made to ſpeak a language agreeable to the ſentiments of the people, but very oppoſite to his own. In it he acknowleged "the ſin of his father, in marrying in- "to an idolatrous family:" he owned "the "bloodſhed in the late wars lay at his father's "door: he expreſſed a deep ſenſe of his own ill "education, and the prejudices he had drank in "againſt the cauſe of God, of which he was now "very ſenſible:" he confeſſed "all the former "parts of his life to have been a courſe of enmity "to the work of God:" he repented "of his "commiſſion to Montroſe, and of every thing he "had done which gave offenſe:" and he ſolemnly proteſted, "that he was now ſincere in his decla- "ration, and that he would adhere to it to the end "his life, in Scotland, England and Ireland." When this declaration was offered him to ſign, he ſeemed at firſt reſolved to reject it; alleging, "That, if he paſſed it, he could never look his "mother in the face." But on his being told it was abſolutely neceſſary to gain the confidence of the Proteſtors, in order to execute his deſigns, he ſwallowed the bitter pill, and the declaration was publiſhed.

His Majeſty's ſtrange declaration. Burnet's Hiſt, p. 56.

This declaration did not fully anſwer the King's expectation. No man could imagine he voluntarily ſigned a paper ſo ſcandalous, and ſo highly injurious to his father's memory. The Proteſtors on the contrary, believing he concealed ſome deep project in this ſtrange proceeding, united ſtill more cloſely againſt him, and at laſt declared, They would have no concern with the Reſolutioners, nor with Cromwell and the Independents in England.

It diſappoints his expectations. Burnet.

Charles was extremely mortified to find his declaration attended with no better ſucceſs, than the loſs of the confidence of both parties, and his own reputation. It was univerſally thought, ſuch a ſcandalous diſſimulation was deſigned to deceive the people. At laſt this falſe ſtep, taken ſo contrary to his own judgment, and the ſad life he had led, inclined him to take notice of the propoſals made by ſome of his friends in the Highlands (2), who would accept no imploys at the price of an hypocritical repentance. Theſe gentlemen acquainted him, that, if he would come and appear at their head, they would ſend an able body of troops to receive him at a place appointed. Dr. Frazier, a phyſician, * was the manager of this intrigue, and took care to convey the letters. His Majeſty conſented to join the male-contents, being extremely deſirous to retire from the Preſbyterians, who had laid ſo many hardſhips upon him. He prepared a declaration, ſhewing the ill uſage he had received from the marquis of Argyle, and the cruel ſervitude in which he was kept ſince his arrival in Scotland. The duke of Buckingham, diſcovering this ſecret by letters left on the King's table, informed the marquis, who could not imagine the project was on the point of execution. Nevertheleſs, two days after, the King withdrew from St. Johnſtoun, and repaired to the place appointed, where he found only a handful of men, inſtead of the number of troops he expected. But, while he was deliberating how to proceed, the commitee of eſtates diſpatched major-general Montgomery to him, who in a very rude manner preſſed his return to St Johnſtoun, to which at laſt he agreed, being doubtleſs convinced thoſe who had invited him among them were in a worſe condition, than they had made him believe (1).

This deſign, however imprudent, proved advantageous to his Majeſty, tho' at the ſame time it loſt him the confidence of the Preſbyterians, who evidently perceived his inſincerity, and the little regard he had to his promiſes at Breda. In the interim, the marquis of Argyle and commitee of eſtates plainly ſaw exceſſive rigor might throw the King upon deſperate reſolutions, and occaſion great diſorders, if he ſhould deſire to head his adherents. This not only procured him better treatment, but a larger ſhare in the public affairs. His Majeſty on the other hand found he ſhould never be eaſy in Scotland, or in a capacity to accompliſh his deſigns, without the concurrence of Argyle, who was the chief of the kirk party. He therefore extremely courted the marquis, making him great offers, and even propoſing to marry his daughter. But that peer, conſidering his propoſals as ſo many ſnares, rejected them, tho' he outwardly paid all due reſpect to the King. His Majeſty at laſt was crowned at Scone, the firſt of January 1650 (3), from which day all perſons had acceſs to him; and after this the Scots made it their whole ſtudy to raiſe forces, admiting all volunteers, without diſtinction of party. The army was in readineſs, the begining of June, before Cromwell could take the field for want of forage. It conſiſted of fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, which the King commanded himſelf, with David Leſley, his lieutenant-general (4). As moſt of them were freſh troops, his Majeſty judged it improper to go in queſt of Cromwell, who was formidable for his valor and experience, and beſide at the head of a diſciplined and victorious army. He therefore poſted himſelf to advantage at Torwood, between Edinburgh and Sterling, having a large deep river behind him (5), the paſſes whereof were all ſecured; and by this means, tho' the country before him was intirely laid waſte, the plentiful county of Fife ſupplied him with proviſions. This army was ſo ſtrongly intrenched in the front, that it would have argued raſhneſs to attack it. Here he determined to wait the enemy's motions, and form his meaſures accordingly.

Cromwell, having aſſembled his forces, marched directly to the King with a view of giving him battle; but he thought it adviſeable to drop that deſign, when he perceived the ſtrength of his intrenchments. The armies continued in their reſpective camps about ſix weeks, all the ſtratagems to draw his Majeſty out of ſo commodious a poſt proving abortive. The preceding year's experience had taught the Scots greater circumſpection. At laſt Cromwell (forced to quit his preſent ſituation, on account of the difficulty in procuring neceſſaries, which the county of Fife plentifully afforded the King) reſolved upon an attempt to deprive him of that advantage: for he plainly ſaw his Majeſty might avoid fighting, during his pleaſure, and oblige him to ſpend the whole campain in a ſtate of inaction.

Cromwell not daring to attack him, July 3. Phillips. Whitelock, p. 498. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 309.

Purſuant to this reſolution he detached ſixteen hundred men under colonel Overton, who marched towards Edinburgh to a place provided with boats, and, paſſing the Frith, poſted himſelf in the county of Fife. Lambert immediately followed Overton with a more numerous body. At the ſame time Cromwell with the reſt of his army advanced towards his Majeſty's intrenchments, as if he deſigned to attack them, in order to prevent any detachment to oppoſe the landing of his forces. The King no ſooner had intelligence that the Engliſh were in Fife, than he diſpatched major-general Brown with four thouſand men to ingage them. Brown was routed, and thereby Cromwell left at liberty to tranſport his whole army into Fife. By this means he deprived his Majeſty of any farther ſupplies from that county.

Cromwell indeed gained an advantage, by forcing the King to quit a poſt incapable of being attacked: but yet, in ſo doing, he rendered it impoſſible to fight him, becauſe there was a deep river between the armies, joining the lake of Lomund to Edinburgh-Frith. His Majeſty might have croſſed the river, being maſter of all the paſſes; but it was judged imprudent to purſue Cromwell, now at diſtance, who had taken St. Johnſtoun, and threatened Sterling. On the contrary, the King ſuddenly reſolved to march into England, having no oppoſition before him, and was pleaſed Cromwell had given him an opportunity to project and execute a deſign ſo agreeable to his intereſt. He found himſelf at the head of eighteen thouſand men, and did not doubt his army would be greatly augmented in England, by the junction of the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians equally oppreſſed by an Independent parliament. This was the idea his Majeſty and his council conceived of this expedition. The marquis of Argyle alone entertained another opinion, and ſo far incurred the ſuſpicion of diſloyalty, that the King was adviſed to order his being arreſted: but it was thought improper to regard this advice, which could not procure any advantage. The King therefore, leaving the marquis in Scotland, began his march for Carliſle with extraordinary expedition. He had ſet out ſome days (1) before Cromwell heard of it, and entered England the ſixth of Auguſt, where he was proclaimed by his army.

His Majeſty marches into England. July 31. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 309. Bates. Whitelock.

The news of his Majeſty's march exceedingly ſurpriſed Cromwell, who never expected it. He imagined his forcing a paſſage into Fife to have been a very advantageous ſtep; but it paved the way for the King's marching into England, where in all probability he would be joined by a great number of adherents. The avoiding of this was the parliament's ſole view, in carrying the war into Scotland. It may therefore be affirmed, Cromwell was guilty of an error, which might have produced fatal conſequences to the new common-wealth and governing party. Accordingly, his principal care was to prevent the pernicious effects. As he did not doubt the parliament would be alarmed to hear of his Majeſty's march, he ſpeedily acquainted them with it, and that he was reſolved cloſely to purſue him. He likewiſe adviſed them to put all the militia of the kingdom in arms, with the utmoſt diligence, to deter the Royaliſts from re-inforcing his army. He himſelf gave the ſame orders in the northern counties, not only to reſtrain the Cavaliers from riſing, but alſo to find ſeveral bodies of the trained-bands in readineſs to augment his forces on his arrival in England. At the ſame time he detached major-general Harriſon with three thouſand horſe, which Lambert was to follow at the head of another party of cavalry to retard as much as poſſible his Majeſty's march. Having taken theſe precautions, he left major-general Monk in Scotland with five thouſand men, giving him orders to attempt the making himſelf maſter of Sterling and Dundee. At laſt he ſet out in purſuit of the King, with all expedition, in order to reach him before he ſhould arrive at London, being confident he would march thither without halting.

The King's ill ſucceſs in England. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 309, 311. Phillips.

His Majeſty entered England full of hopes, that both the Preſbyterians and Royaliſts, being equally enemies to the Independents, would eagerly eſpouſe his cauſe. He therefore ſent colonel Maſſey before with a detachment, to receive all who inclined to ſerve him (2). He alſo by letter deſired the earl of Derby, then in the iſle of Man (3), to join him, laying great ſtreſs on his credit in Lancaſhire. But many circumſtances concurred to diſappoint his expectations. 1. As he proceeded on his march, the Scots deſerted in ſuch numbers, that it was computed four or five thouſand returned to Scotland. Theſe deſerters were probably the moſt zealous Preſbyterians, who believed they could not in conſcience aſſiſt the King in recovering England by violence, which was the general opinion of that nation. 2. The militia, being every where in arms, prevented his Majeſty's adherents from aſſembling, by guards placed on all the public roads. 3. The commitee of the kirk, which had followed the army were apprehenſive that, if the King's forces were increaſed by too numerous a body of Cavaliers, their ſuperiority might conſtrain the Scotiſh army not only to contribute to the ruin of the Independents, but alſo the reſtoration of his Majeſty without any conditions, which directly oppoſed the intereſts of Scotland. On this account the commitee ſent Maſſey a declaration, with orders to publiſh it, repreſenting that, the King being zealous for the covenant, none who refuſed to ſign it could be admited into his army. They did this unknown to his Majeſty, who was extremely concerned at the news. He even ordered Maſſey to ſuppreſs the declaration. But, as the import of it was already notorious, the King's adherents judged it expedient to conceal themſelves, not daring to mix with the Scots, becauſe they could not reſolve to take the covenant. 4. The Engliſh Preſbyterians were indeed enemies to the Independents; but not ſo much his Majeſty's friends, as to reſtore him to the throne, without a previous aſſurance of his ratifying the conceſſions the King his father made in the treaty of Newport. But, this being an improper time to negociate ſuch an affair, they did not ſeem very forward to ingage in his ſervice. 5. The earl of Derby, who had been ſent by the King into Lancaſhire, where he raiſed twelve hundred men, was defeated by colonel Lilbourne at the head of ten troops brought from York to join Cromwell. The earl found it difficult to eſcape to the King, after the loſs of his forces, the lord Widdrington and ſir Thomas Tildeſly being left dead on the ſpot. This defeat diſcouraged the Royaliſts in thoſe parts, who deſigned to re-inforce his Majeſty's army.

The earl of Derby defeated. Auguſt 25. Phillips, p. 607. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 314. Whitelock, p. 504. Ludlow.

At laſt, after a very fatiguing march, the King arrived at Worceſter, where he met with an honorable reception from the magiſtrates, and was ſolemnly proclaimed. He determined to refreſh his weary troops in the neighborhood of that city, ſince they were unable to proceed without ſome repoſe. Probably his intent was to have marched directly to London, if his army, as he expected had been conſiderably augmented on their route: but on the contrary he ſaw it was ſo diminiſhed by deſertion, as to be reduced to twelve or thirteen thouſand men, without the leaſt proſpect of its being increaſed for the reaſons aforeſaid. In all appearance therefore he durſt advance no farther, and believed the ground about Worceſter was proper for defenſe in caſe of an attack.

While the King's army remained at Worceſter, Cromwell advanced with great expedition. His orders for aſſembling the militia of the north were ſo punctually obſerved, that, on his arrival in England, his forces were daily augmented by parties from all quarters; by which means, after his junction with Lambert and Harriſon, he found his army much ſuperior to that of his Majeſty, who lay incamped, about a mile from Worceſter, with a reſolution to withſtand the attacks of his enemy. Cromwell, before he attacked the King, thought fit to make a diverſion on the other ſide of the Severn; and with this view he detached Lambert, who went directly to Upton, where Maſſey was poſted to defend a bridge. This paſs was ſo fiercely aſſaulted that, after a ſharp ingagement, Maſſey quited the place. Immediately after, Cromwell ordered ſome of his forces to croſs over to the weſtern ſide of the Severn, which obliged the King to ſend a party of men the ſame way, and ſo weaken the main body who were to ſuſtain Cromwell's attack.

with courage to hold out any longer againſt the conqueror, were to no manner of purpoſe. At laſt, his horſe ſeeing the enemy break into the town, fled, and left the foot to the mercy of the Engliſh. His Majeſty alſo was forced to fly thro' St Martin's gate, and had a very narrow eſcape. Almoſt all the infantry were ſlain or taken, and the cavalry, being cloſely purſued, eaſily diſperſed; ſo that moſt of the officers and ſoldiers were made priſoners of war. It is reported the Scots loſt about two thouſand men, beſide ſeven or eight thouſand captives (1), who were ſent to London, and ſold for ſlaves to the plantations of America. The King, tho' he fortunately eſcaped from the defeat, was extremely perplexed. It highly concerned him to avoid the purſuers, but this he found a very difficult taſk. He was in the heart of England, which he could only conſider as an enemy's country, tho' he had ſtill ſome friends in the kingdom. He was under a neceſſity to abandon it, and go beyond ſea, but how to effect this ſeemed next to impoſſible. It was yet more hazardous to attempt a return into Scotland, ſince in all likelihood he would be moſt narrowly ſearched for on this road; and tho' he ſhould ſafely arrive in that kingdom, he was apprehenſive of being in almoſt the ſame danger there as in England. The parliament's army, victorious in Scotland, as the ſequel will inform us, would not have permited him to injoy a ſecure retreat. He therefore reſolved to travel that night, as far as his ſtrength would admit; and, diſmiſſing his attendants who could only ſerve to diſcover him, he commited himſelf to the care of a truſty guide, by whom he was conducted through by-roads in the habit of a peaſant. In theſe melancholy circumſtances he ſpent an intire day in a tree near the road (3), from whence he ſaw and heard people, as they paſſed by, diſcourſe of him and wiſh he would fall into their hands. He travelled only in the night, his guide concealing him by day in obſcure cottages, where his diet generally was no other than a little milk. At laſt, after two months great fatigue, ſurmounting infinite dangers, and traverſing a conſiderable part of the kingdom from Worceſter to the county of Suſſex, he imbarked, (4) and ſafely landed in Normandy the twenty-ſecond of October. The curious reader is refered to the earl of Clarendon, who, from his Majeſty's own mouth, has given a particular account of his eſcape, and the adventures of his flight (5).

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 321——331. Monk reduces Scotland. Phillips, p. 611. Whitelock. Ludlow.

We muſt now return to the affairs of Scotland, ſince both armies left that kingdom. While Cromwell purſued the King, Monk obeying his orders, beſieged Sterling, which held out but few days. This place, one of the ſtrongeſt in Scotland, where the public records were kept, ſurrendered the fourteenth of Auguſt (6). All the papers and records were tranſmited to London, from whence they never returned, the ſhip which was bringing them back after the reſtoration being loſt in a ſtorm. Monk, having taken Sterling, laid ſiege to Dundee, where the inhabitants of Edinburgh had conveyed their beſt effects, after the battle of Dunbar. Some Scotiſh gentlemen, aſſembling forces to relieve the town, were ſurpriſed and diſperſed by a detachment from Monk, and their leaders made priſoners; but notwithſtanding this misfortune, the governor * bravely defended the place, 'till it was ſtormed the firſt of September, two days before the battle of Worceſter. The taking of Sterling and Dundee was followed by that of Aberdeen, St. Andrews, and all the other towns and caſtles capable of reſiſting. Thus in a ſhort ſpace, Monk brought the whole kingdom of Scotland in ſubjection to the Engliſh parliament: and this was the remarkable conſequence of his Majeſty's conducting the Scots army into England.

The victory of Worceſter and reduction of Scotland gave ſuch a reputation to the new common-wealth, that all the ſtates in Europe either courted its alliance, or dreaded its arms. Moſt of the Sovereigns therefore excuſed themſelves from making offers to the King, or ſupplying him with money, leſt they ſhould be ſuſpected by the parliament; ſo that his Majeſty was reduced to preſſing extremities, and even to a want of common neceſſaries. He reſided at Paris, maintained by his mother who had a penſion from the crown; but cardinal Mazarine, making his court to the common-wealth of England, overlooked the diſtreſs of her unfortunate ſon.

Cromwell increaſes his credit.

On the other hand Cromwell's glory and intereſt were ſo greatly increaſed, ſince the battles of Dunbar and Worceſter, that, being maſter of the armies of three kingdoms, he could in effect command the reſolutions of parliament, no man daring openly to oppoſe him. Beſide he had in the houſe ſo great a number of creatures, that he might eaſily procure whatever he deſired; ſo that it may be truly ſaid, he was the head of the republic, tho' he only had the title of general.

The Engliſh common-wealth's power.

The common-wealth was extremely powerful from its very begining. This ſeems incredible at firſt, conſidering the vaſt ſums which were expended, and how much blood was ſhed, during the civil war. But, as to the expenſe, it ſhould be remembered that the money had not been carried out of the land. The ſole alteration was, that the rich became poor, and the poor rich, which had not ſunk the capital of England. And with reſpect to the multitudes ſlain in the war, it muſt likewiſe be called to mind, that the kingdom ſwarmed with people in the year 1642, having injoyed peace ſince the death of Queen Elizabeth; ſo that the effuſion of blood had not to ſuch a degree diminiſhed the inhabitants, as conſiderably to impair the ſtrength of England. This is manifeſt from the eaſineſs wherewith, in the ſpace of one year, the parliament raiſed an army for Ireland, and another more numerous againſt Scotland, beſide the forces which remained in the kingdom. The navy, having had no enemies to incounter during the war, was in a flouriſhing condition. In a word, England was not leſs powerful than in the reign of Elizabeth, or than it might have been under

INTER-REG. AN' 1651.

James I, and Charles I, had they thought fit to ingage in foreign wars. Nothing therefore underwent a change but the government, and that was in the hands of the moſt able men the kingdom had for many years produced, tho' the power they had was very unjuſtly uſurped. On this account England found itſelf in quite different circumſtances from what it had been under the two preceding Kings, whoſe capacities to govern cannot be highly commended by impartial judges.

Cromwell returns to London. Phillips. Whitelock. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 347.

Cromwell returned to London the twenty-firſt of September, leading in triumph his principal priſoners, who were ſent to the Tower, from whence Maſſey ſome time after found means to eſcape (1). A majority of the parliament, with the ſpeaker at their head, attended by the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, met him at Acton. Eight days after the earl of Derby, being tried by a council of war, received ſentence of death, and was beheaded at Bolton in Lancaſhire (2).

The parliament's fleet takes Jerſey, Barbadoes and other iſles. Whitelock.

* Of Parham.

During the tranſactions in England, the common-wealth's fleet ſubdued Jerſey, Cornet-caſtle in Guernſey, and the iſle of Man. In January following ſir George Aſcough reduced the iſland of Barbadoes, then governed by the lord Willoughby * for his Majeſty; and the iſles of Nevis and St. Chriſtophers ſubmited without any reſiſtance.

The parliament unite England and Scotland. Phillips. Whitelock. Heath. Ludlow.

England injoying a profound tranquility, and the reduction of Ireland being almoſt compleated, the parliament attempted to unite Scotland with the republic of England. As they had made a conqueſt of that kingdom, they believed it lawful to uſe it as they pleaſed, without conſulting the Scots who where no longer in a condition to oppoſe their pleaſure. An act therefore paſſed in the parliament of England, which utterly aboliſhed regal power in Scotland, and united that kingdom to the Engliſh common-wealth, impowering it to ſend a certain number of repreſentatives to the parliament. Commiſſioners were afterwards ſent into Scotland, to ſetle the terms of this union; and moſt of the Scotiſh peers, being unable to reſiſt the parliament, ſubmited to their will. The marquis of Argyle became one of the moſt zealous adherents to the republic, but the aforeſaid union highly diſguſted the clergy.

They are afraid of Holland.

The Independents, ſince their firſt open appearance, had made a ſurpriſing progreſs. They had beheaded Charles I; aboliſhed the houſe of lords; transformed the monarchy into a common-wealth; quelled the Levellers; humbled the Preſbyterians; ſubdued Scotland; and almoſt compleated the conqueſt of Ireland. The victory at Worceſter ſeemed to have deprived his Majeſty of any refuge, and diſabled him from giving them any diſturbance. Nevertheleſs, the Cavaliers were ſtill a thorn in their ſide, and laid them under continual apprehenſions. It is certain this party could do very little by their own ſtrength, but it was poſſible they might receive aſſiſtance from foreign powers. Indeed the parliament dreaded neither France nor Spain, being ſatiſfied they who managed the affairs of theſe kingdoms did not deſign to attempt the King's reſtoration, and that, ſhould they indeavor to reſtore him, their maritime forces were incapable of withſtanding the navy of England. But there was another power which inſpired them with fear, viz. the States of Holland, who could ſtrongly aſſiſt the Royaliſts: nay, it was probable the Prince of Orange, his Majeſty's brother-in-law, would imploy his great credit in the United Provinces, to ingage them in the quarrel between the King and parliament. It was therefore equally neceſſary to prevent this, as it had been to hinder the Scots from aiding the Preſbyterians.

INTER-REG. AN' 1651.

Their indeavors to unite the two common-wealths prove abortive. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 355. Phillips, p. 613. Heath, p. 285.

With this view the common-wealth, in the year 1649, diſpatched Doriſlaus to Holland, to propoſe a ſtrict alliance between both the republics. The murder of this agent at the Hague made the leſs noiſe in England, becauſe the parliament intended to avert the danger which might come from that quarter, by a cloſe friendſhip with the States. The Prince of Orange dying in October 1650, it was judged expedient to treat with the Dutch, becauſe his intereſt could no longer obſtruct the negociation. The parliament therefore, in March 1651, ſent Oliver St. John and Walter Strickland to the Hague, not to negociate a bare alliance, but ſuch an union as might render them one body. This propoſal was warmly oppoſed by the States. Firſt, The Engliſh pretended they ſhould renounce all their alliances, except thoſe common to them and the republic of England. Secondly, The parliament's terms were ſuch, that all the advantages lay on their ſide, and the forces of the United Provinces could in reality only ſerve to augment thoſe of England. Thirdly, If we conſider the time when the two envoys arrived at the Hague, it will evidently appear the parliament's affairs were not yet in a ſituation to oblige the States to accept ſo diſadvantageous conditions. Cromwell indeed had, the preceding year, gained the battle of Dunbar: but this was not a deciſive victory ſince his Majeſty was about to head a new army, as he afterwards did, while the Engliſh envoys remained at the Hague. The States would therefore have acted too raſhly, had they concluded this union before a deciſion between the King and parliament. Laſtly, the houſe of Orange's party not being wholly ſuppreſſed greatly oppoſed the union aforeſaid, which would have intirely deſtroyed the hopes of the young Prince of Orange. On all theſe accounts the Engliſh envoys returned in July, not only diſſatisfied at their ill ſucceſs, but likewiſe for ſome inſults on their perſons by the rabble at the Hague (3). This manifeſtly ſhewed the ſubjects of that republic were more inclined to his Majeſty than the parliament, and confirmed their ſuſpicion, that the States would the firſt opportunity openly eſpouſe his cauſe. Thus their report to the then powers contributed to incenſe them againſt the States; and they would perhaps have immediately diſcovered a warm reſentment, were it not for the war with Scotland. It was therefore thought proper to diſſemble 'till that affair was over, to which the battles of Worceſter and Monk's ſucceſs in Scotland gave at laſt a happy concluſion.

"He had quarter given him, "and therefore was not to be tried by a court-martial." 2. He pleaded "ignorance of the acts of treaſon ſet forth by the "parliament." But theſe pleas were over-ruled; and he was ſentenced to loſe his head at Bolton. Whitelock, p. 511. He married the daughter of duke de la Tremouille in France. The reward his ſon received, for this famous earl's loyalty, will appear from the following inſcription, fixed by the preſent earl of Derby on a building erected at Knowſley, his ſeat in Lancaſhire:

They highly reſent the conduct of the States.

But if the proſperous end of this war inabled the parliament to undertake another againſt Holland, it on the other hand ſeems to have removed the motives of that undertaking; for, as they were now maſters of Scotland and Ireland, it is very unlikely the Dutch would think of aſſiſting his Majeſty. Beſide, the Prince of Orange being dead, it was not to be imagined the States would promote the King's reſtoration, uncle to the young Prince whom they intended to reduce to the condition of a private perſon. However the common-wealth of England ſo highly reſented the States conduct, that a war was reſolved (1).

Reſolve to declare war againſt them. Phillips. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 360.

Pretenſes were taken from the injuries ſaid to be done to the Engliſh by the Dutch, thirty years before, at Amboyna and other places in the Indies. It is pretended Cromwell conſented to this war, which he judged unneceſſary, merely in complaiſance to St. John and ſome others, who appeared to be extremely incenſed againſt Holland.

Cromwell's ruin the ſecret motive to this war.

The ardent deſire the parliament ſhewed to ingage in this war, on ſo remote pretexts, gives occaſion to conjecture theſe were not the only motives to that proceeding. It is highly probable, even then ſome members, ſecret enemies or enviers of Cromwell, were ſollicitous to ruin him, or at leaſt conſiderably to impair his exceſſive power; apprehending that its being continued in a private perſon could not but prove extremely dangerous to a republican government. They had participated in his counſels and deſigns to ſubvert the Preſbyterian parliament, which gave them an opportunity of knowing his genius and extenſive capacity; and therefore they could not help dreading that he was laboring for himſelf, how plauſibly ſoever he diſguiſed his ambition under the maſk of public good. They eaſily perceived that, if he projected his own advancement, nothing could prevent the execution of his purpoſe, while he was maſter of the army. He muſt therefore either be deprived of this ſupport, or the common-wealth expoſed to his ambitious projects. But it was difficult to procure his conſent to diſband an army intirely at his devotion, and his great influence in the parliament led them to deſpair of effecting it there, without a preſſing neceſſity. Nevertheleſs they believed that, if the republic could be ingaged in a ſea-war, the great expenſe of which was foreſeen, the houſe would by degrees be brought to diſband a land-army, to avoid a needleſs charge. This at firſt view may ſeem to be too refined a piece of policy, but three things concur to ſtrengthen the conjecture. Firſt, The cauſes alleged for this war appear to be inſufficient to ingage the parliament in ſuch an expenſive affair, at a time when it would have been on the contrary very advantageous to let the people injoy the ſweets of peace, that they might learn to reliſh the late eſtabliſhed republican government. Secondly, The ſequel will inform us, that all the ſubmiſſions of the Dutch were ineffectual to obtain a peace, and the parliament would hardly hear their propoſals. Hence it is manifeſt they had ſome ſecret motive to continue the war; and it is difficult to diſcover any other than what I have related. Thirdly, We ſhall ſee hereafter Cromwell evidently perceived, that the ſole reaſon for continuing the war was to give the houſe an occaſion to diſband the army; which made him reſolve to ruin a parliament who ſought his deſtruction. I confeſs it is hard to prove, that the authors of this war againſt the Hollanders at firſt deſigned what I have aſcribed to them; and that, with reſpect to the begining, it is a bare conjecture. But this point is confirmed, when we conſider that the principal members combined to leſſen Cromwell's power, and the war was ſolely prolonged to render the expenſe of it a plauſible pretenſe for diſbanding the land-army, as uſeleſs, but which was neceſſary to the ſupport of that general.

An act of parliament gives riſe to the war. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 355.

However this be, Cromwell returning victorious from Worceſter, as he had before done from Ireland and Scotland, his credit ſo greatly increaſed, that he became in a manner the ſoul of the parliament and common-wealth of England. Whether he did not at firſt diſcern the ſecret ſprings of the projected war, or from ſome other motive, he readily conſented to the deſign of humbling Holland, the only foreign power from whom the parliament were apprehenſive of any danger. But as it was expedient to manage the people, who would not eaſily be convinced of the neceſſity of this war, the houſe reſolved to force the Dutch to be the aggreſſors, or at leaſt afford a pretenſe for hoſtilities. With this view, under color of incouraging navigation, they paſſed an act prohibiting the importation of all foreign commodities except upon Engliſh bottoms, or thoſe of the country from whence they were brought. This act, to commence the firſt of December 1651, deſtroyed all commerce between the Engliſh and Hollanders, which wholly conſiſted in foreign merchandiſes imported from Holland in their own veſſels. Moreover the parliament granted letters of mart to ſeveral private perſons, who complained of an unjuſt confiſcation of their ſhips in Holland.

The States indeavor to prevent a war. Decemb. p. 355. Whitelock. Phillips, p. 613.

The States plainly perceived the deſign of this proceeding, but rather than uſe hoſtile means, as the Engliſh expected, they ſent an embaſſy to London, to ſollicit a repeal of the act. The parliament received the embaſſadors with great reſpect, and admited them to ſeveral audiences, intending to intimate that nothing ſhould be wanting on their parts to preſerve the peace between the two common-wealths: but, when the particular articles came to be diſcuſſed, it manifeſtly appeared they were reſolutely bent upon war. Inſtead of revoking the navigation-act, they revived ſeveral ſtale pretenſions. Satisfaction was required for the maſſacre of the Engliſh at Amboyna, in the year 1622; for the loſſes ſuſtained from the Dutch, ſince the year 1618, in the Indies, Perſia, the Mogul's dominions, Muſcovy, Greenland, and the iſle of Poleron. Theſe damages, according to the parliament's computation, amounted to ſeventeen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. A ſuitable reparation was likewiſe demanded for the murder of Doriſlaus commited at the Hague, under the eye of the States, who had taken no proper ſteps to bring the authors to puniſhment. In fine, ſatisfaction was inſiſted on for the ſecret intelligence the laſt embaſſadors from the States had held with the late King, during the civil war. For theſe ſatisfactions and reparations the parliament offered to enter into an alliance with the United Provinces, on the terms propoſed by their envoys at the Hague (2).

Theſe propoſitions convinced the States, that it was neceſſary to make warlike preparations. Accordingly with great diligence and expenſe they fited out a fleet of a hundred and fifty ſail. They were unwilling however to declare war againſt the Engliſh, reſolving, if poſſible, to make them the aggreſſors,

aggreſſors. To this end, while the States embaſſadors continued at London, their admiral Martin Van Trump, one of the moſt valiant and experienced ſea-officers in Europe, appeared in the channel with a fleet of forty-five ſhips of war, under color of conveying ſome merchant-men, and anchored in Dover-road, probably with an intent to provoke the Engliſh to begin hoſtilities. Admiral Blake, commander of the Engliſh fleet conſiſting only of twenty-ſix ſail, coming in ſight, the Dutch weighed anchor and put to ſea without ſtriking their flag, whereupon Blake fired three guns without ball for a ſignal to ſtrike. Trump only anſwered by drawing up his ſhips in line of battle, and, to ſhew his contempt of the ſignal, diſcharging a ſingle gun, and advancing up to the Engliſh admiral gave him a broad-ſide: ſo that the begining of the fight leaves it uncertain, which ſide was the aggreſſor (1). Both the admirals had expreſs orders not to ingage, unleſs there was an apparent neceſſity. The Engliſh affirm the States ordered Trump not to ſtrike to their fleet, to oblige them to commence hoſtilities. This is not unlikely; tho' it is not mentioned by the Dutch hiſtorians (2). Blake being re-inforced with eight ſhips, the ingagement continued from four in the after-noon 'till night. The Engliſh, if credit is to be given to their authors, had not ſo much as a ſhip damaged, while the Dutch loſt two, one ſunk and the other taken. They farther add that, night approaching, Trump drew his fleet to the back of Goodwin-ſands, and next morning ſailed for Zealand. The Dutch acknowledge the loſs of two ſhips, but ſay the Engliſh had ſix ſunk, and that the night only preſerved their fleet from intire deſtruction. It is not eaſy with exactneſs to diſcover the truth in ſuch contradictory accounts, eſpecially concerning naval ingagements. However the conſternation this battle occaſioned at London, and inſults the populace offered to the Dutch embaſſadors, which obliged the parliament to allow them a guard, ſeem to ſhew the people were diſpleaſed with the ſucceſs.

The embaſſadors, knowing the ſentiments of their maſters, attempted, in an audience obtained of the parliament, to prove that the battle was purely accidental. On the other hand the States diſpatched an embaſſador extraordinary, to propoſe an agreement; viz. Adrian Paw, who had been plenipotentiary at the treaty of Munſter: but the parliament rigidly inſiſting on all the articles propoſed before the rupture (3), they recalled their embaſſadors, and reſolved to continue the war, ſince this was the only ſtep they could take to procure a peace. A manifeſto was publiſhed, in which they pretend to demonſtrate, the Engliſh attacked them, without the leaſt provocation; and the parliament replied in another, repreſenting all the aforeſaid occaſions of complaint, and adding the refuſal to ſtrike the flag, a right they at all hazards reſolved to maintain. The States anſwered, it was true their commonwealth, in its infancy, had paid that compliment to the royal dignity, when England was governed by a King, but they could not think themſelves obliged to the ſame reſpect ſince the monarchy was altered into a republican government. After all, this was far from being the real cauſe of the war: but theſe manifeſto's were neceſſary on both ſides to perſuade the people, that they did not ingage without neceſſity in extraordinary expenſes to ſupport hoſtilities.

The war being ſufficiently declared, not only by a battle but alſo manifeſto's, Van Trump put to ſea with a fleet of ſeventy ſhips: and Van Gallen ſailed to the Mediterranean to fight the Engliſh there. Trump's intent was to ingage admiral Aſcough, who lay in the Downs with part of the Engliſh fleet; but, while he waited an opportunity, admiral Blake with forty ſhips ſailed to the Northward, to attack the herring-fleet and their convoy (4). Trump, hearing of it, chaſes and overtakes him near New-caſtle: but, before he was prepared for the fight, a furious tempeſt ſo diſperſed his fleet, that he returned to Holland with only forty ſail, the reſt which eſcaped ſhipwreck not arriving at the Texel 'till ſome weeks after.

In the interim the Engliſh, puting to ſea with a formidable fleet, became maſters of the channel, their enemy not daring to appear; and a conſiderable number of Dutch veſſels, returning from Holland without being informed of the war, were taken by them, and among the reſt a fleet of forty ſail from Portugal with ſix India ſhips richly laden.

The States, unwilling to expoſe their merchants to greater loſſes, gave notice to the merchant-men homeward bound, to ſail for the iſle of Rhé, where they ſhould find a fleet prepared to convoy them. Accordingly Trump left the Goree in November, with ſeventy men of war and ſix fire-ſhips, and met Blake who expected him in the channel. The ingagement laſted from eight in the morning 'till night, when one part of the Engliſh fleet retired to the Downs, and another into the Thames. A wound Blake received having thrown his fleet into ſome diſorder, he could not prevent Trump from purſuing his courſe (6).

Blake put to sea again in February, being at his own request assisted with Monk and Deane, lately arrived for that purpose from Scotland. The three admirals designed to attack Trump, in his return from the isle of Rhé with three hundred merchantmen he was to convoy into Holland. The States, having intelligence of the mighty preparations in England, had equiped twenty sail to re-inforce their admiral in his passage, but they were detained by contrary winds. In the mean while Trump, entering the channel and conducting the merchant-ships along the coasts of France, met the English fleet, much more numerous than his own: but having advanced too far to recede, a furious fight commenced which continued three days, and would have been renewed the fourth, had the ships on either side been able to sustain a fresh charge. The Dutch lost in this action eighteen men of war, and eight merchant-men(1): but their historians pretend twenty ships of the enemy were sunk, and three stranded. Each side claimed the victory. However this be, Trump brought his three hundred merchant-men safe into Holland, the eight excepted which were taken by the English; and he afterwards ingaged them four several times, but not in so important a manner.

His Majesty offers to put himself on board the Dutch fleet. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 358. His proposal rejected. p. 360.

Shortly after the King, believing he had many friends among the English commanders, offered to put himself on board the Dutch fleet, without any command except such English ships as should voluntarily join him: but the States thought fit to reject his proposal. It was considered as a snare to ingage them in his quarrel, to which they had no inclination in their present condition. They were desirous of peace, and unwilling to obstruct, or render it impossible, by espousing his Majesty's cause. They even contrived a secret way to convey a letter to Lenthal, the speaker, from the particular States of Holland, to propose an agreement. Some affirm this was occasioned by a private intimation given by Cromwell, who at length perceived a peace to be proper for his own security. He had the address to procure from the parliament a civil answer to the letter received by Lenthal; but the reply was directed to the States General. Upon this the States sent another letter, dated the thirtieth of April, in which they openly requested the parliament would be pleased to nominate a place for the treaty.

Project against Cromwell. p. 360, 371, 372. Ludlow.

Cromwell at last discovered the continuation of the war was projected by his enemies, that the expense might render it necessary to disband an army now become useless, to which he saw the house was inclined. This evidently tended to supplant his authority: for tho' he was indowed with excellent qualities, and had by his valor and capacity raised the common-wealth to its present grandeur, he was however still an object of their fear. They dreaded that his power, already excessive, would still farther increase, to the prejudice of the republic; and his ruin had been infallible, were it not for the army's assistance. Cromwell was even privately informed of a conspiracy against him, in which not only several Presbyterians and Royalists were concerned, but even some considerable members of parliament of the Independent party. Affairs therefore were so situated, that either the house must be subdued, or himself destroyed: but such a choice does not long amuse the ambitious. Cromwell, resenting a design to requite his services with ingratitude, readily resolved to hazard every thing to become master of the parliament, rather than be made their vassal, who were properly indebted to him for all their authority.

Which oblige him to destroy the parliament.

Cromwell's measures to support his authority. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 371. Whitelock.

The house, as I observed, was wholly supported by the army, by whose means they held the kingdom in subjection; but since the battles of Dunbar and Worcester, Cromwell had so gained the esteem and affections of both officers and soldiers, that they no farther regarded the parliament's interest, than they were confounded with those of their general. The leading members perceived this, and had therefore formed a design of disbanding the army, more easily to effect Cromwell's destruction: but such a project could not long be concealed from a person of his penetration. Having discovered the intentions of his enemies he directly resolved to withdraw the army's confidence from the parliament, judging it the only way to support himself; for, this step being taken, it would not be difficult to bring about their ruin. This was the very means practised by himself and the other Independents, to destroy the Presbyterian parliament. He therefore caused the officers of the army, in a general council, to draw up a petition, and present it to the house, in which they demanded, "The arrears "of their pay, that they might not be compelled "to take free quarter upon their fellow subjects, "who already paid so great contribution and "taxes, which they were well assured, if rightly "managed, would defray all the charges of the "war, and of the government."

They demand its dissolution. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 372.

The house, as was foreseen by Cromwell, complained of the insolence of this petition, and ordered a reprimand to the officers for their presumption, to intermeddle in affairs which did not concern them, and to arraign the parliament's management of the treasury. This occasioned a second petition from the army, which reminded the house of some of the professions they had formerly made, "That they would be glad to be dissolved, and "that there might be successive parliaments, to "undergo the same trouble they had done. "They therefore desired them to remember, how "many years they had sat, and tho' they had "done great things, yet it was a great injury to "the rest of the nation, to be utterly excluded "from bearing any part in the service of their "country, by their ingrossing the whole power "into their hands: and thereupon besought them "that they would setle a council of war for "the administration of the government, during "the interval, and then dissolve themselves, and "summon a new parliament; which, they told "them, would be the most popular act they could "perform."

This remonstrance, tho' designed to exasperate the parliament, seemed however very just in itself, and agreeable to the general sentiment of the kingdom. This will evidently appear if we consider, how the members, of which the house consisted, had attained the supreme authority. The violence they had used to their collegues; the tragical death of Charles I; the change of the monarchy into a republican form, and the taxes imposed on the people for an unnecessary war, had rendered them odious to the whole nation. They were themselves convinced of these things: but, as it was extremely mortifying to think of divesting themselves of an authority which had so many charms, they had also reason to dread an account would be demanded of their proceedings. They were therefore unwilling to quit possession, tho' they could not avoid solemnly deliberating on the petition, which was of too great importance to be neglected. In this debate all the members, who were officers in the army, strenuously maintained the petition. p. 373. Phillips.

The Preſbyterians, who had been admited into the houſe on ſwearing to the ingagement, were likewiſe of opinion, the parliament ought to diſſolve themſelves, ſince it was undoubtedly the nations, deſire. But, the negative being carried by a majority of votes, the houſe reſolved, that it was not yet time to diſſolve themſelves, while affairs were depending which muſt neceſſarily be finiſhed, and particularly the important war with Holland: but that nevertheleſs the ſpeaker ſhould iſſue out writs for filling the vacant ſeats in the houſe. A commitee was alſo then appointed ſpeedily to prepare a bill, by which all perſons were prohibited to preſent ſuch petitions, on pain of being declared guilty of high-treaſon.

The houſe votes againſt it, and prepares an act to prohibit ſuch petitions.

This was no more than Cromwell expected. After ſo poſitive a declaration it could not be doubted, that the members who had ſat upwards of twelve years, and but too much abuſed their power, would always retain the ſupreme authority, under color of being repreſentatives of a commonwealth, which properly was compoſed only of themſelves. Cromwell therefore, well aſſured the people deteſted this parliament, and that it was equally odious to the army, believed he owed no farther regard to men, who only ſought his deſtruction. Having previouſly concerted matters with the principal officers, he came to the houſe, the twentieth of April, with ſome officers and ſoldiers, and without any ceremony told the members, he was come to deſtroy their power, which they had abuſed; and therefore they were forthwith to be diſſolved. The officers and ſoldiers entered at the ſame time, and ſtayed at the door 'till the members walked out. Cromwell, as they paſſed him, reproached one with drunkenneſs, and another with corruption, not ſparing to upbraid any whom he knew to be his enemies. After that he gave the mace to one of his officers, and locked the door (1). This, tho' a very extraordinary action, was no more than general Fairfax had done a few years before, when he expelled and impriſoned the members who were diſliked by the army.

Remarks on that proceeding.

However it cannot be ſaid Cromwell had hitherto pulled off the maſk. He might ſtill be thought to have the good of the public in view, ſince he had only delivered the nation from a parliament which had long inſlaved them; and had he afterwards called a free parliament, and ſubmited himſelf to it, the people would have loaded him with bleſſings. But the ſequel manifeſtly ſhews, he ſolely conſulted his own advantage (2): yet if it be conſidered that the kingdom was then divided into three parties, each of them avowed enemies to the other two, it is ſcarce to be imagined a parliament, tho' ever ſo free, would have been able to ſetle the peace of the nation. It was almoſt impoſſible to content three parties, of ſuch oppoſite principles and intereſts both with reſpect to government and religion. Force alone, by rendering one of them ſuperior, was capable of awing the other two. This doubtleſs was foreſeen by Cromwell, who therefore reſolved to model the ſtate according to his own inclination, ſupport his ſetlement by violence, and diſregard the chimerical project of pleaſing every man in the kingdom. He perceived the neceſſity of a ſupreme authority to command obedience, without which all would run into diſorder, and that it muſt be ſupported by the army; and queſtionleſs he thought himſelf more able than any other perſon, to preſide at the helm of affairs. I do not pretend to juſtify all the proceedings of this great man, whoſe ability was never diſputed; but only to prove he could have taken no other courſe at that juncture, without throwing the ſtate into a moſt dreadful confuſion. Since therefore, as matters were then ſituated, England muſt be governed by force, was it more inconvenient for the nation to be ruled by the greateſt general and ſtateſman England had for many years produced, than by an Independent or Preſbyterian parliament, or a King intoxicated with arbitrary power? The people, after a trial of all theſe governments, found them inſupportable; and therefore a fourth muſt be tried, things being in ſuch a ſituation that it was neither poſſible nor expedient to ſubmit to any of the other three. This being ſuppoſed, it cannot be denied Cromwell was better qualified to govern ſo great a ſtate, than any other man then in the kingdom. No objection could be made againſt him, which might not with more reaſon have been urged againſt any other perſon who ſhould ſeize the government, or any body of men inveſted with the ſupreme authority. If on certain occaſions he abuſed his power, and in all he did ſolely conſulted his own glory and intereſt, it is not my deſign to vindicate his behavior. However it is certain things have been highly aggravated, and ſome of his actions miſrepreſented, which with impartial and unprejudiced perſons, are capable of an eaſy vindication. The whole difficulty attending this affair lies in the ſuppoſition made by each of the ſeveral parties, that their form of government was beſt and moſt perfect: but, as Cromwell had no regard to any of the ſchemes, he was equally exclaimed againſt by all the three parties. The Independents, fond of their democracy, tho' it was no more than an empty name, were incenſed at him, for ſubverting a ſtructure himſelf had erected. The Preſbyterians would have been extremely well pleaſed, had he reſtored the parliament to its former ſtate, at the begining of the year 1648, when they were maſters; and they could not forgive him, for taking a courſe contrary to that which they believed the moſt natural. It was agreeable to the Royaliſts that Cromwell had diſſolved the Independent, without reſtoring the Preſbyterian parliament; but, to content them, he muſt have placed the King on his throne, and put the church of England in poſſeſſion of all her rights. The reader is left to judge, whether, in the then condition of England, what the three parties deſired was either juſt, expedient, or poſſible. It is not therefore ſurpriſing, if all theſe parties equally diſliked Cromwell's proceedings, and loaded him with invectives.

Shortly after Cromwell publiſhed a declaration

(1) Whitelock, who was preſent, affirms, Cromwell led a file of muſqueteers into the houſe, and in a furious tone ordered the ſpeaker to quit his chair, telling the houſe, "They had ſat long enough, unleſs they had done more good; that ſome "of them were whore-maſters (looking towards Henry Martin and ſir Peter Wentworth) others of them were drunkards, "and ſome corrupt and unjuſt men, and ſcandalous in the profeſſion of the goſpel; and that it was not fit they ſhould ſit any "longer, and deſired them to go away." Whereupon among all the members, many of whom wore ſwords and would ſometimes talk big, not a man offered to draw againſt Cromwell, but every one tamely departed the houſe. He ſaid to the ſoldiers, "Take away that fool's bauble the mace." Whitelock, p. 554.

(2) It is probable he formed the project of invading the government, juſt after the battle of Worceſter; for he met at the ſpeaker's, with ſeveral members of parliament and principal officers of the army, to conſult about the ſetlement of the nation. The ſoldiers were for a common-wealth, the lawyers for a mixed monarchy, and many for the duke of Gloceſter's being placed on the throne; but Cromwell ſtill put off that debate, and it is believed his intent in this conference was only to ſound thoſe great men, that he might manage accordingly. The houſe being diſſolved, it was neceſſary the ſupreme power ſhould be ſome where lodged. Cromwell might have aſſumed the reins of government by force, as he had diſmiſſed the parliament: but he did not deſign to uſurp the ſovereign authority in ſuch a notorious manner. His intent was that it ſhould be given him by parliament, in order to dazzle the eyes of the public. The council of officers, who had petitioned the houſe, being ſtill aſſembled, Cromwell cauſed them to reſolve, that a hundred and forty-four perſons ſhould be intruſted with the ſovereign power. In the choice of theſe men Cromwell at once diſplayed his capacity, and diſcovered he had ſome ſecret deſign, which would openly appear on a proper occaſion. They were all of mean extraction, illiterate, of no particular merit, unexperienced in buſineſs, and in a word utterly incapable of an imploy of ſuch importance (1). Cromwell evidently perceived they would ſoon be tired, and obliged to reſign the government into his hands, and ſo furniſh him with a pretenſe to aſſume it to himſelf. Having made this remarkable choice, he wrote to each ſeparately to meet at Whitehall the fourth of July, in order to enter upon the adminiſtration of public affairs (2).

Theſe new ſovereigns meeting on the day appointed, Cromwell made a ſpeech, and, when he had ended, gave them an inſtrument, ſigned by himſelf and the principal officers of the army, by which they were inveſted with the ſupreme authority. It imported, that all theſe members, or any forty of them, were to be held and acknowleged the ſovereign power of England, to whom all perſons were to yield obedience and ſubjection 'till the third of November, 1654, that is during a year and four months: that, three months before their diſſolution, they were to chuſe ſucceſſors, whoſe authority ſhould not exceed one year, and then they were alſo to provide and take care for a like ſucceſſion in the government. But we ſhall preſently ſee, Cromwell was far from intending this regulation ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved. Theſe members, being thus impowered, did not ſcruple to ſtile themſelves a parliament, and choſe one Rouſe (3) for their ſpeaker. The whole kingdom was aſtoniſhed to find themſelves under the dominion of ſuch perſons, moſt of whom were artificers, or retail merchants (4). There was among them one Barebone a leather-ſeller, who in his neighborhood paſſed for a notable ſpeaker, becauſe he uſually entertained them with long harangues upon the times; and from him the people in deriſion called them Barebone's parliament (5). I ſhall for a moment leave this ridiculous aſſembly, which did nothing worth notice, to reſume the recital of the wars and affairs between England and Holland.

The letter the States-general ſent to the parliament the twentieth of April, the day on which its diſſolution happened, was refered to the council of ſtate, eſtabliſhed by Cromwell and his officers, 'till the new parliament ſhould be aſſembled; and, being under Cromwell's direction, they gave a favorable anſwer to the States, with hopes of a peace on ſending plenipotentiaries to London.

The Engliſh affairs were then in a ſtate of uncertainty, of which it was difficult to foreſee the iſſue. Cromwell had by his ſole authority diſſolved the parliament, and named a council of ſtate who ruled the nation, with no other right than what they derived from the officers; and therefore it was improper for the States either to treat of, or conclude a peace with ſuch perſons. But the provinces of Holland and Zealand, the greateſt ſufferers by it, wiſhed at any rate to put an end to the war; and at laſt, after warm debates, the States-general nominated four embaſſadors to negociate a treaty at London.

After this battle the Engliſh fleet, being reinforced to the number of a hundred ſail, was for ſome time miſtreſs of the ſea, and frequently alarmed the coaſts of Holland. At laſt Trump, having as much as poſſible repaired his fleet, tho' inferior to that of the enemy both in the number and largeneſs of ſhips (7), attacked it again near the Texel. The fight laſted from morning to night, neither ſide gaining any conſiderale advantage. It was renewed the next day with the ſame fury, Trump being re-inforced by twenty-ſeven ſhips; nor did the ſecond day decide the victory. The third day introduced a freſh ingagement, in which Trump was ſlain by a muſquet-ball: but vice-admiral De Witzen continued the fight 'till both fleets, as if by conſent, retired to their own coaſts, unable any longer to ſuſtain a charge. The loſs was great on both ſides (8), and neither had reaſon to boaſt of the victory, but the loſs of admiral Trump was irreparable to Holland.

The parliament returns the ſupreme authority to the officers. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 378. Whitelock, p. 570, 571. Phillips.

Barebone's parliament did nothing remarkable in a ſeſſion of more than five months (1): nor indeed was it called for that purpoſe. At laſt the twelfth of December, the ſpeaker, with a conſiderable number of the members, who knew Cromwell's deſign, being aſſembled ſooner than uſual, one of them roſe up and ſaid; that they were unequal to the burden laid upon them, and therefore propoſed a diſſolution of themſelves; and a reſignation of the ſoverein power into their hands from whom it was received. This motion met with a ready and unanimous approbation. Then the ſpeaker, and all the preſent members, without waiting for thoſe who were abſent, quited their ſeats, and directly repaired to Cromwell and the council of officers: to whom they declared, that they found themſelves incapable of the truſt repoſed in them, and, reſigning their inſtrument, intreated them to take care of the government. Thus Cromwell and his council of officers were a ſecond time inveſted with the ſupreme authority, by thoſe perſons on whom they had confered it; and it is evident this had been reſolved from the calling of the parliament, in order to derive a parliamentary authority to thoſe who had by their own power diſſolved the former parliament. This was ſo groſs an artifice, that Cromwell's belief to impoſe upon the people is matter of amazement: but the moſt palpable abſurdity is eaſily ſwallowed by means of an irreſiſtible power.

Two days after the council of officers, by virtue of the authority lately received from the parliament, declared that henceforward the government of the common-wealth ſhould reſide in a ſingle perſon, viz. The ſixteenth of December, the council of officers ſent for the commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, with the lord-mayor and aldermen of London; and, acquainting them that Cromwell was made Protector, they cauſed to be read in their preſenſe, a paper termed the inſtrument of government, the ſubſtance whereof was: I. A parliament to be called every three years by the Protector. II. The firſt to meet the third of September 1654. III. No parliament to be diſſolved 'till they have ſat five months. IV. Such bills as are offered to the Protector by the parliament, if he do not confirm them in twenty days, to be laws without him. V. That his council ſhould not exceed the number of one and twenty, nor be leſs than thirteen (2). VI. Immediately after Cromwell's death, the council ſhall chuſe another Protector before they riſe. VII. No Protector after the preſent ſhall be general of the army. VIII. The Protector ſhall have power to make war and peace. IX. The Protector and his council may make laws binding on the ſubject, during the intervals of parliament. After the reading of this inſtrument, Cromwell ſwore to obſerve it to the utmoſt of his power. Then he was conducted to Whitehall with great ceremony, Lambert carrying the ſword of ſtate before him, and from that time he was honored with the title of Highneſs and Lord Protector. Immediately after he was proclaimed as ſuch in London, and then in the three kingdoms which were united into one common-wealth. The city of London invited him to a magnificent entertainment, and gave him ſuch a reception as was not inferior to what had ever been performed to the King.

Thus Cromwell, whoſe extraction ſeemed to have placed him at an infinite diſtance from ſovereignty, found means to attain the ſupreme authority. When the long parliament's proceedings againſt Charles I; the meaſures taken to effect his deſtruction; their obſtinate refuſal of peace, unleſs epiſcopacy was aboliſhed and the regal power reduced; the Independents policy in concealing themſelves many years among the Preſbyterians, 'till his Majeſty was in no condition to hurt them, their intrigues to gain the army; tyrannical treatment of the Preſbyterians and the King himſelf, and in fine Cromwell's early adherence to that party: I ſay when theſe particulars are conſidered, one is inclined to believe his grand deſign was projected from the begining of that parliament, and the following tranſactions ſolely flowed from this fountain. Accordingly nothing leſs is inſinuated by ſome, with an intent to ſhew Charles I was perſecuted, merely to put the aforeſaid project in execution. But if on the other hand we remember, that it was almoſt impoſſible for Cromwell to entertain any ſuch views, when his credit was ſmall and himſelf hardly known to the parliament; that his reputation increaſed by a ſeries of events intirely out of his power, and by battles he might have loſt, it is ſcarce credible he could have formed ſuch a deſign before his victory at Worceſter. In all appearance he had, even before that battle, an eye to his own advancement, but not to the ſupreme authority. Some of Cromwell's party were perſons of too great ſagacity not to diſcover his intentions, had his ambition ſoared ſo high: but as no ſteps were taken to ruin him 'till after this victory, very probably they did not any ſooner perceive his deſigns, and it was only from that time, or perhaps not ſo early, he began to aſpire after the ſovereign power, for, being then commander in chief, he had leſs way to go, than when he was only lieutenant-general (3).

A peace between England and Holland. Collect. of Treaties, Vol. III. p. 67. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 382.

THE treaty between England and Holland was at laſt brought to a concluſion, being ſigned the fifth of April 1654. Cromwell took great advantage of the neceſſity the States were under to conclude a peace. Before they could obtain it, he obliged them to promiſe the payment of large ſums for the damages the Engliſh had ſuſtained thirty years ſince (1); and alſo to ſtrike to the common-wealth's ſhips as they had formerly done to thoſe of the King. They were intirely to abandon his preſent Majeſty's intereſts, and to receive no exiles from England into their dominions; and he likewiſe laid them under an ingagement to reſtore to the Engliſh twenty-two merchant-ſhips, confiſcated by the King of Denmark, or to pay their full value. I do not find in this treaty any mention of the navigation-act, which had occaſioned the war (2): it is probable either that this article was adjuſted in a private and particular treaty, or the States were ſatisfied with a bare promiſe of not being diſturbed on that account. Laſtly, the States by a ſeparate article bound themſelves never to make the young Prince of Orange their Stadtholder, general, or admiral: but this was only ratified by the province of Holland, the other ſix refuſing it, and Cromwell judged it improper to continue the war to force their compliance. Thus ended a war which had been very warmly carried on, and inexpreſſibly deſtructive to both nations. It is ſaid the two provinces of Holland and Zealand loſt in it fifteen hundred ſhips, which fell into the hands of the Engliſh; and this very war, tho' it had been undertaken to ruin Cromwell, proved the means of his advancement, as it obliged him to diſſolve the parliament for his own ſecurity.

Cromwell makes many his enemies. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 363.

The new Protector did indeed meet with a general ſubmiſſion, yet not without pretty open complaints of his uſurping the ſovereign power, by a pretended title he received from men who had no right to confer it. The Royaliſts conſidered Cromwell's advancement as a mortal wound to his Majeſty. The Preſbyterians were almoſt equally diſpleaſed with it: for, tho' their government ſtill ſubſiſted in the church, the liberty of conſcience injoyed by all Proteſtants they apprehended to be an intolerable indulgence. Beſide they were excluded from the beſt poſts, which Cromwell took care to fill with perſons intirely devoted to his ſervice; but nevertheleſs Cromwell careſſed them, becauſe he wanted their aſſiſtance to accompliſh his deſign of being confirmed in the Protectorate by a free parliament, where he foreſaw their influence would be very conſiderable. However he deteſted the Cavaliers, and greatly depreſſed them; which occaſioned many conſpiracies againſt him, the authors whereof were ſeverely puniſhed (3), particularly mr. Vowell and mr. Gerard (4), the former of whom was hanged in London, and the other beheaded in the Tower.

At this very time, and on the ſame ſcaffold, Don Pantaleon Sa, knight of Malta and brother to the Portugueſe embaſſador, loſt his head. This gentleman, having quarreled with mr. Gerard aforeſaid on the New Exchange, returned next morning with a numerous retinue; but unfortunately ſingling out a man in the croud whom he miſtook for Gerard, and entering into a freſh quarrel, he killed him, and others were wounded by his ſervants, after which he retired to his brother the embaſſador's. This tumult drew the people together, who ſurrounded the embaſſador's houſe, and threatened to drag the criminals to juſtice. Cromwell, hearing of it, diſpatched an officer with ſome ſoldiers, to demand the murderers. The embaſſador loudly complained of this inſult, and required an audience of the Protector, but was refuſed and told that, if the criminals were not delivered, the people would proceed to extremities, nor could the Protector anſwer for the conſequences: that, ſince a man had been ſlain, and ſeveral wounded, juſtice muſt have proper ſatisfaction. In the interim the embaſſador, finding himſelf in no condition to reſiſt, was at laſt conſtrained to deliver up his brother and the other criminals, in hopes of afterwards obtaining their pardon: but, Cromwell remaining inflexible, the Portugueſe gentleman was beheaded in the Tower, and his accomplices hanged at Tyburn. I do not preſume to determine, whether this act of juſtice did not violate the privilege of embaſſadors, or if it had not been more equitable in Cromwell to have connived at the priſoner's eſcape. I ſhall only in a few words ſhew, that the preſent juncture was not favorable to the embaſſador, or the King his maſter.

Occaſion of this embaſſy from Portugal.

Don John IV, King of Portugal, formerly duke of Briganza, had in 1640 ſeized the crown of Portugal, alleging it was unjuſtly wreſted from his anceſtors by Philip II of Spain. This had ingaged him in a fierce war with Spain, during which Charles I had, in a treaty ſigned at York the twenty-ſecond of May, 1642, acknowleged him as King of Portugal. Thus the crowns of England and Portugal were in peace and alliance, before the declaration of war between Charles I and the parliament: upon which foundation the two Princes Palatine, Rupert and Maurice, the firſt of whom was commander of his Majeſty's navy, being forced in 1650 to leave Ireland, where they could no longer

This demand extremely perplexed that Monarch, who had concluded an alliance with the King of England; but on the other hand England was the King's avowed enemy, and Don John could not avoid declaring for one or the other on the preſent occaſion. Policy directed to a declaration for the parliament, but honor and hoſpitality required him to protect the King's ſhips, which were come for refuge to Portugal. This queſtion was warmly debated in his council. The majority adviſed him to abandon a Prince expelled his dominions, who could neither ſerve nor hurt him, and thereby procure the friendſhip of a powerful republic, from which he might expect great aſſiſtance againſt Spain: whereas, in declaring on the other ſide of the queſtion, he would perhaps involve himſelf in freſh difficulties, at a time when all his forces were ſcarce ſufficient to withſtand his enemies. But his Majeſty by his reaſons and authority cauſed it to be decided, that the King of England's ſhips ſhould be protected; and accordingly a ſquadron of thirteen men of war was immediately equiped, to join Prince Rupert's. Both the ſquadrons ſailed together, with an intent to ingage the Engliſh if they ſhould meet between the two capes (1): for the Portugueſe ſquadron had orders to ſail no farther, that it might appear the King only deſigned to ſecure the mouth of the Tagus. Upon notice of this junction the Engliſh admiral put to ſea: but, to revenge the protection granted to Prince Rupert, he attacked a Portugueſe fleet returning from Brazile, and took fifteen ſhips. The approach of winter obliging him to return to England, the Princes Palatine ſailed to America, after creating a ſort of rupture between the Engliſh commonwealth and Portugal. To adjuſt this difference Don John had ſent to London the Condo de Penaguaio, his circumſtances (during a war with Spain, which had now laſted thirteen years) not permiting him to remain in a ſtate of hoſtility with the Engliſh. In all probability this was the reaſon of not recalling his embaſſador, upon the execution of Don Pantaleon Sa: and I do not know whether this accident did not retard the peace between England and Portugal, which was not ſigned 'till two years after in 1656 (2).

The King's circumſtances in France. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 393, 407. Whitelock, p. 584.

Since Charles II's arrival in France, after his miraculous eſcape from the battle of Worceſter, he had lived in extreme want, not having what was ſufficient for his ſubſiſtence. The French court overlooked his neceſſities, either in complaiſance to Cromwell, from a deſire of entering into a ſtrict alliance with him, or thro' dread of his declaring in favor of Spain: ſo that his Majeſty was in a melancholy condition. He had even the mortification to ſee monſieur de Bourdeaux, who 'till then had been his reſident in England, appointed embaſſador by the court of France (3), upon Cromwell's being declared Protector. This change convinced his Majeſty, that France intended an alliance with Cromwell, and he did not queſtion but the treaty would be followed with a requeſt for him to depart the kingdom. He therefore, to prevent that compliment, acquainted cardinal Mazarine, he deſigned to withdraw, which was agreeable news to that miniſter. The cardinal, to forward this deſign, promiſed him the arrears of a penſion of ſix thouſand livres a month, which had been granted him, tho' never regularly paid, and the continuance of it, while he ſhould remain out of France. At the ſame time the King received another ſmall relief, which inabled him to diſcharge his debts. Prince Rupert ſafely arrived at Nants with the fleet, after he had loſt his brother Maurice in a ſtorm. Beſide that the ſhips were extremely damaged, and his Majeſty unable to repair them, he was in preſſing want of money, which determined him to ſell the ſhips with the ordnance and tackling. Cardinal Mazarine was the purchaſer, but at a very cheap rate if we may believe the lord Clarendon, and paid him without delay. Prince Rupert afterwards went to Paris, and, taking leave of the King, retired into Germany. His Majeſty no ſooner received the money than he left France, and retreated to Cologne where he reſided many years.

The King, before his departure from Paris, ſent Wilmot, then earl of Rocheſter, embaſſador to the Emperor and ſome other German Princes, to procure a ſupply of money. He even applied to his Holineſs by the mediation of cardinal de Rhetz, who, it is pretended, in order to ſucceed, prevailed on him to renounce his religion and privately received his abjuration. At leaſt dr. Burnet in the Hiſtory of his own Times poſitively affirms, that his Majeſty imbraced the Catholic religion before he left France, where he never returned: but others, who believe themſelves better informed, aſſign this change of his religion to the year 1659.

While the King remained in this ſtate of adverſity, Cromwell was honored, reſpected and feared by all the powers of Europe, who equally courted his friendſhip. His Engliſh enemies durſt not ſhew their heads; Scotland was intirely ſubdued, and Ireland reduced to the laſt extremity. But, before I reſume the affairs of England, it is neceſſary briefly to relate what happened in Ireland and Scotland to Midſummer 1654.

Affairs of Ireland. Ludlow. Bates. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 333, 334, 335, 336.

Since Cromwell left Ireland in 1650, Ireton his ſon-in-law, who had commanded there as his deputy, treated ſuch of the Iriſh rebels as fell into his hands with extreme ſeverity, the parliament having ordered that the maſſacrers ſhould be uſed in a rigorous manner; but this was incapable of uniting the Iriſh with the marquis of Ormond. On the contrary the monks and clergy had inſpired them with a religious zeal, which would not ſuffer them to ſubmit to a Proteſtant commander: nay, they conſpired againſt the marquis's life, and, in an inſurrection at Limerick raiſed by a monk, he was in danger of being ſlain. At laſt the Iriſh biſhops, in a full aſſembly, publiſhed a declaration, proteſting they would have no communion with heretics, nor obey the marquis of Ormond: whereupon they required him to reſign his command to a Catholic, on whom they could better rely. The marquis (finding himſelf thus expoſed to the ſuſpicions and perfidious deſigns of the Iriſh, and utterly unable to reſtore the affairs of his Majeſty) appointed the marquis of Clanrickard his deputy, and withdrew into France, from whence he afterwards accompanied the King to Cologne.

Ulster, refuſed to aſſociate with the Engliſh, under the command of the marquis, tho' a Catholic, for it was ſufficient to render him odious that a Proteſtant had given him his commiſſion. A certain number of perſons were therefore choſen to conſtitute a council for the management of their affairs. This aſſembly judged it proper to invite to their aſſiſtance a foreign Catholic Prince, capable of conducting them, and put him in poſſeſſion of the government of Ireland. They fixed their eyes on the duke of Lorrain, then at Bruſſels, and reſolved to ſend deputies to treat with him. Having taken this reſolution, they demanded of the marquis of Clanrickard a commiſſion for the deputies, being afraid of their meeting with an ill reception, if not authorized by the King's governor: but the marquis refuſed to grant ſuch a commiſſion, 'till he ſhould know his Majeſty's pleaſure. This refuſal inflamed their former animoſities: they exclaimed againſt him with extreme bitterneſs, and ſent their deputies notwithſtanding his oppoſition (1). The duke of Lorrain thought it imprudent to ingage in ſuch an undertaking without better information of ſome important particulars relating to the invitation: but when an abbot whom he ſent into Ireland for that purpoſe brought him intelligence, that the affairs of the Iriſh were almoſt deſperate, and they had taken this reſolution without the conſent of the King's lieutenant, he abſolutely refuſed to treat with the deputies. The Iriſh, inſenſed with the marquis of Clanrickard for obſtructing their deſign, perſecuted him various ways, and at laſt negociated a treaty with Ludlow, by means of a monk, without the marquis's privity, who, perceiving himſelf unable to ſerve his Majeſty, informed him of what happened, and deſired leave to retire. The King readily complied with his requeſt, apprehending it impoſſible to ſave Ireland, and left the Iriſh to their own meaſures, whoſe affairs from that time daily declined.

It was then, and in the ſucceeding years, that the Iriſh, utterly unable to reſiſt the parliament's forces, were expoſed to the utmoſt ſeverity of the Engliſh commanders. The barbarity they had uſed to the Engliſh Proteſtants ſetled in Ireland, was juſtly revenged upon themſelves. Many were executed, and others, to the number of a hundred thouſand, moſt of whom periſhed with hunger and miſery, had permiſſion to enter into the ſervice of foreign princes. The families ſtill remaining in the country were for the moſt part removed into Connaught, where ſome lands were alloted them for their ſubſiſtence, while the reſt was delivered to the adventurers, who advanced money for the Iriſh war. Part alſo of thoſe confiſcated lands was given to the officers and ſoldiers in payment of their arrears, and a part was ſold to the higheſt bidders. From this time the nation has been kept ſo low, that there is no probability it will ever recover. In 1654, Fleetwood, who had married Ireton's widow, Cromwell's daughter, was appointed governor of Ireland, and two years after ſucceeded by Henry Cromwell, younger ſon to the Protector.

Tho' Scotland was ſubdued, it was not wholly free from diſturbances. The general aſſembly of the kirk had been ſuppreſſed by Cromwell, being ſenſible that from thence had flowed all the troubles which had for many years infeſted Scotland. Beſide; as he deſigned to introduce a liberty of conſcience in that kingdom as well as England, he knew it would be impoſſible to execute his intentions ſo long as theſe aſſemblies ſubſiſted. The Scots were inſenſed at a liberty directly contrary to their covenant, and the maxims of the kirk. They ſufficiently diſcovered their ſentiments, tho' in vain, ſince they had neither places, forces, arms, nor leaders to inable them to attempt a deliverance. On the other hand, ſome lords and gentlemen of the Royal party ſtill kept in the Highlands, with troops under the earl of Glencarn's command: but theſe troops ill armed and undiſciplined were defeated by colonel Morgan (2). Nevertheleſs, with the remains, they ſtill poſted themſelves in ſome inacceſſible places, where it was impoſſible to attack them. But at laſt, diſſenſion ariſing among them, they were obliged to ſend to his Majeſty for colonel Middleton, and obtained his conſent. On Middleton's arrival Glencarn quited them, and made his own peace. Middleton ſupported the remainder of this party about a year, and then was forced to abandon it, ſeeing it was impoſſible to do the King any remarkable ſervice in that country. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

As purſuant to the inſtrument of government, a parliament was to meet the third of September, Cromwell called one for that day. But in his writs for electing members, there was a ſtrict order not to chuſe any perſons, or their ſons, who had born arms for his Majeſty; and this was punctually obſerved. A new regulation was alſo made to proportion the number of repreſentatives to the largeneſs of the boroughs and counties, and to their reſpective ſhares of the public expenſe. This regulation, as it was very juſt in itſelf, met with univerſal approbation (3).

Cromwell calls a parliament. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 386. Whitelock, p. 591. Phillips.

The parliament being aſſembled, Cromwell made a ſpeech in the Painted-chamber, where the houſe attended him. He briefly touched upon the diſorders of the preceding government, and attempted to juſtify the preſent eſtabliſhment. After aſſuring them of his good intentions, he repreſented his ſervices for the nation, ſince the diſſolution of the long parliament, and told them, he had ſummoned a free parliament, agreeable to the deſire of all good Engliſhmen; adding, that he did not ſpeak to them as one that would be a lord over them, but as their fellow-ſervant, in the grand affair of ſetling the government.

Cromwell expected this parliament, free indeed, excepting the excluſion of the Royaliſts, who could not have been admited with ſafety, would confirm his protectoral dignity, and that the confirmation of a free parliament would ſtop the mouths of his enemies. Upon his own recommendation Lenthal, ſpeaker of the long parliament, was choſen again to that poſt. It very ſoon appeared many members of the parliament were enemies to tyranny, and, Thoſe for Scotland and Ireland (for the three kingdoms were united in one common-wealth, the iſles of Jerſey and Guernſey being alſo included) were to be thirty for each kingdom. Then the perſons to be choſen in England and Wales were to be in a certain proportion there ſet down at large. A proportion, which it would have been happy for England, had it been always obſerved, the little inſignificant boroughs being omited, and the number of the knights of the ſhire increaſed from four to twelve, according to the extent of the county. This (the lord Clarendon obſerves) was then generally looked upon as an alteration fit to be more warrantably made, and in a better time. Vol. III. p. 387.

having ſerved in the long parliament, had imbibed maxims very oppoſite to thoſe eſtabliſhed by Cromwell. The firſt thing propoſed was to examine the authority by which they were aſſembled; a queſtion unexpected by the Protector. In all probability his enemies intended to give him a mortal blow, by a deciſion that his authority was imaginary and illegal, which was the truth of the caſe. Perhaps too the parliament deſigned to ſeize the ſovereign power, tho' convened by unlawful authority. Cromwell himſelf had given them an example of what could be done by compulſive methods. But, having friends as well as enemies in the houſe, he made them loſe time by the oppoſition they met with from the officers and others, thro' fear or friendſhip attached to his intereſt; ſo that, tho' he could not prevent the frequent debates on this queſtion, his enemies had reaſon to apprehend they ſhould not carry it, when it came to be decided. At laſt, finding they only wanted a proper opportunity to put the queſtion, he ſent for the members to meet him in the Painted-chamber, and tho' in his firſt ſpeech he declared, he would only be their fellow-ſervant, in this he ſpoke as their lord, telling them, they were too bold in their diſputing an eſtabliſhed form of government, from which themſelves had derived their authority, ſince, if they were unlawfully convened, they had no right to debate. At their return to the houſe, they found a guard at the door, refuſing entrance to all who would not ſign the following ingagement: "I. A. B. do here- "by freely promiſe and ingage myſelf to be true "and faithful to the lord Protector, and to the "common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ire- "land, and ſhall not (according to the tenure of "the indenture, whereby I am returned to ſerve "in this preſent parliament) propoſe or give any "conſent to alter the government, as it is ſettled "in one ſingle perſon and a parliament." Many, who refuſed to ſign this ingagement, were excluded from the houſe (1).

Nevertheleſs the members, who ſigned the ingagement, perſiſted in ſhewing their enmity to Cromwell: they had only ſubſcribed, to have it in their power to ruin him at a favorable occaſion, which they hoped would ſoon fall in their way. A plot was formed principally by the Cavaliers, but with the privity of many members of parliament, to raiſe an army in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. Cromwell, informed of it by his ſpies, defeated the deſign of his enemies, by diſſolving the houſe eleven days before the time fixed for its continuance by the inſtrument of government (2), viz. on the twenty-ſecond of January. At the diſſolution he acquainted the members, he was no ſtranger to their projects, and that ſeveral were ingaged in a conſpiracy againſt him (3).

It was not without grounds he mentioned a conſpiracy, which was now ripe for execution. Tho' he had no intelligence of all of the particulars, yet he knew in general, that an inſurrection was deſigned in ſeveral places, and had the names of ſome of the principal actors. Two days after he diſſolved the parliament, major Wildman was apprehended by Cromwell's order, and a declaration found in his houſe, containing the reaſons which obliged the Engliſh to take up arms againſt the Protector (4). Some others, both Republicans and Royaliſts, were likewiſe arreſted.

Since his Majeſty's retreat to Cologne, he had received frequent expreſſes from his adherents, acquainting him with the national diſlike of Cromwell's government, and the fair opportunity for a general riſing. The former of theſe things was true in fact: but they built upon a falſe principle which had often deceived Charles I, and now alſo themſelves. They fancied all who were diſaffected to the government inclined to ſerve the King and reſtore him without any conditions. Indeed the Preſbyterians would have gladly promoted his Majeſty's reſtoration, on the terms granted by his father in the treaty of Newport, that is, with the limitation of the regal power, and the eſtabliſhment of Preſbyterian juriſdiction in the church: but it was unlikely Charles II, at liberty, would make the ſame conceſſions Charles I had done under confinement. On the other hand it is likewiſe certain, that moſt of the Independents and Anabaptiſts, and in a word all the zealous Republicans, were enemies to Cromwell ſince his ſeizing the government, and that even in the army there was a numerous party againſt him. But theſe men did not entertain the leaſt thought of reſtoring the King; and yet the Royaliſts imagined all the Protector's enemies would eſpouſe his cauſe, as if it was impoſſible to be Cromwell's enemy without being his Majeſty's friend. Upon this foundation they projected an inſurrection in the Weſt, and another in the North, not doubting of the army's joining, or at leaſt permiting the Cavaliers to act againſt Cromwell without interruption. This project was communicated to the King, who approved of it, and the day appointed for its execution, viz. the eighteenth of April. The King diſpatched the neceſſary commiſſions, and ſecretly came into Zealand, to be in readineſs to ſail for England, if the undertaking ſhould prove ſucceſsful. At the ſame time Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter, repaired privately to London (5), with ſir Joſeph Wagſtaff, who had been major-general in the army of Charles I. Having conſulted their friends in the city it was reſolved, Wagſtaff ſhould conduct the inſurrection in the Weſt, and the earl of Rocheſter that in the North (6).

The market place was forthwith ſeized, and all the ſtables locked up, that the horſes might be at their diſpoſal. The judges and ſherifs were afterwards ſeized, and in great danger of being hanged for refuſing to proclaim his Majeſty, who nevertheleſs was proclaimed. It is impoſſible to know, how the army would have behaved, ſince there was no neceſſity for their aſſembling, that affair being ended in two or three days. It may here be remarked (what uſually happens on theſe occaſions) that the authors of ſuch projects, for the moſt part converſing with none but thoſe of their own party, are inclined to believe the whole nation to be in the ſentiment of their companions, wherein they are often miſtaken. This was, in a manner, the peculiar weakneſs of the Cavaliers, of which the earl of Clarendon's Hiſtory furniſhes various inſtances.

He was apprehended and ſhot to death, in a caſtle belonging to the duke of Newburg. It is now time to treat of Cromwell's affairs with France and Spain.

Affairs between France and England.

In the reign of Charles I, Cardinal Richelieu, as has been obſerved, was concerned in the troubles of Scotland in the year 1637, from which thoſe of England were afterwards produced. The French court all along ſeemed to eſpouſe the cauſe of the late King, during his life, but never offered him any real aſſiſtance. Cardinal Richelieu believed nothing could more promote his project of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, than to hinder the Engliſh from aſſiſting Spain, in order to preſerve the balance of Europe, as the intereſt of England required. On this account that able miniſter, inſtead of ſerving Charles I, ſtudied only to foment the troubles of England. Cardinal Mazarine his ſucceſſor, under the minority of Lewis XIV, purſued the ſame maxim, and never did Charles any real ſervice. But it may be affirmed, he carried this policy to an extreme, ſince he was ſo far from keeping the balance even between the King and parliament, that he gave the latter an opportunity to acquire a ſuperiority, which might prove extremely prejudicial to France. After the death of Charles I, the common-wealth of England became ſo powerful, that it was too late to indeavor to weaken it, eſpecially as France was then involved in a war with Spain. If France had aided Charles II, it would have run the riſque of ſeeing the parliament in alliance with Spain, which was not to be hazarded in its preſent condition. The intereſts of that unhappy Prince were for this reaſon intirely abandoned by France, and all his aſſiſtance from that quarter was a penſion inſufficient for his ſubſiſtence; and even this was allowed him privately, to prevent the jealouſy of the parliament. The Engliſh were ſo little afraid of them, that, in 1652, their fleet did not ſcruple to attack that of France, ſent to the relief of Dunkirk beſieged by the Spaniards, and taken by them the ſame year: yet, notwithſtanding this affront, an embaſſador arrived from the French court to deſire the friendſhip of the parliament. Cromwell, being made protector, held for ſome time the two crowns of France and Spain in ſuſpenſe, equally flattering them both with hopes of the favor of England: but it afterwards appeared he only deſigned to amuſe Spain, having reſolved to enter into an alliance with France.

Spain had not given more aſſiſtance to Charles I than France. On the contrary Don Alenzo de Cardenes, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, had diſcovered a partiality for the parliament, which Charles conſidered as a ſort of declaration againſt him. After the death of Charles I, the King of Spain ſhewed a great regard to the parliament, and gave them no juſt provocation to make war upon him. All that England could lay to his charge was his receiving, tho' very coldly, in 1649, lord Cottington and mr. Hyde as embaſſadors, from Charles II, but without ingaging in any negociation which might create in the parliament jealous apprehenſions. The ſole intent of this embaſſy was, to procure ſome money from the Spaniſh court for his Majeſty's ſubſiſtence, in which the embaſſadors were unſucceſsful. The murder of Aſcham, the parliament's envoy at Madrid, by ſome Iriſh, and the court of Spain's want of zeal in not puniſhing the murderers, might be another occaſion of complaint. But affairs of this nature are liable to ſo many diſcuſſions, that it is not eaſy to know whether it was poſſible for the King of Spain to give the parliament intire ſatisfaction. However this be, theſe cauſes of complaint did not ſeem ſufficient grounds for a war between two nations. Nevertheleſs Cromwell, now Protector, had no ſooner concluded a treaty with Holland, than he reſolved upon a war with Spain. It is difficult to gueſs at (2) the real motives to this undertaking, but there is ſome room for the following conjecture. Cromwell, as I ſaid, deſigned to be confirmed by a parliament in his Protectoral dignity, which he only received from the officers of the army. It was neceſſary for him therefore firſt, to do ſome ſignal ſervice for the ſtate, to make his uſurpation paſs with leſs interruption. Secondly, as Spain was then in a declining ſtate, he perhaps believed ſome conqueſts might be eaſily made upon that crown, which might render his Protectorale famous, and demonſtrate to the Engliſh that, if he ſought his own advancement, it was with a view of being more ſerviceable to the common-wealth. Thirdly, it is probable Mazarine was concerned in this reſolution in order to give a powerful diverſion to Spain.

Cromwell, not to be opened 'till the time prefixed (1). This fleet left Portſmouth the twenty-ſeventh of December, and arrived at Barbadoes the twenty-eighth of January, from whence they ſailed the thirtieth of March 1655. Purſuant to the ſealed orders, the commanders were to proceed to Hiſpaniola and take St. Domingo, the capital of that iſland. Cromwell's inſtructions for this expedition were ſo particular and circumſtantial, that they appeared to be drawn up by men thoroughly acquainted with the country (2). The Spaniards, at the approach of the Engliſh fleet, abandoned St. Domingo. But Venables, inſtead of landing his troops (3), according to inſtructions, within a mile of the place, cauſed them to diſ-embark at a much greater diſtance (4). This gave the inhabitants time to recover themſelves, return to the town, and put it in a defenſive poſture. When they approached Domingo, the Engliſh were ſo fatigued, by a long march, by exceſſive heat, by hunger and thirſt, that they were eaſily repulſed, and forced to retire to their ſhips, leaving many dead and wounded on the iſland.

This attempt miſcarrying, the Engliſh fleet ſailed to Jamaica, and ſeized the iſle with little oppoſition. Some troops were left there, which afterwards were re-inforced by Cromwell, in order to preſerve this conqueſt, where the Engliſh have ſince eſtabliſhed a rich colony. Venables, on his return to London, was ſent to the Tower, but ſoon diſcharged. The war being ſufficiently declared by this attempt, which the Spaniards had no cauſe to expect, the King of Spain ordered the effects of the Engliſh merchants in all his dominions to be ſeized, which was a very conſiderable loſs to them. Nor did the miſchief ſtop here; for by this war ſo unjuſtly undertaken, the Engliſh forfeited the trade to Spain, which, transferred to the Dutch, inabled them to repair their loſſes ſuſtained in the laſt war.

Peace made with France, October 23. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 455 Whitelock. Phillips.

The Spaniſh war was ſoon followed by a peace with France, proclaimed at London the twenty-third of October. This peace was eaſily made, as France was willing to forget the injury done them by the Engliſh in 1652. That point was only to renew the ancient treaties, to which there was no obſtacle, after Cromwell's declaration againſt Spain (5).

Cromwell ſurrounded with enemies. Burnet, p. 65.

Beſide the conſpiracies and inſurrections from the Cavaliers and Preſbyterians, Cromwell was alſo in danger from the male-contents of his own party, who had effectually ſerved him, without knowing his deſign, but who were extremely provoked at their having been tools to his private ambition. The Republicans were inſenſed againſt him. The Republican government was as much their idol as the covenant was that of the Preſbyterians. So Cromwell by being inveſted with the Protectorſhip, had offended them no leſs than the Cavaliers and Preſbyterians. It was not eaſy to curb three parties, which, if they could have reſolved to unite, would have been ſtrong enough to ruin him. But he knew the difficulty of ſuch an union, and yet it was not impoſſible, but particular men of each party, whether openly or privately, might combine for his deſtruction. His only ſupport was the army, in which too there were Republicans who mortally hated him, as appears in Ludlow's Memoirs, one of the moſt inveterate againſt him. Nay, very likely, if he had been obliged to aſſemble the diſperſed army, and the officers could have communicated their thoughts to one another, they would not have intirely obeyed him. As to the Royaliſts, he never wanted pretenſes to perſecute them, which not only pleaſed the other parties, but was agreeable to their intereſts. As for the Preſbyterians, as they were equally enemies of the Cavaliers and Independents, in keeping them low, he obliged theſe two laſt parties, who knew, if the Preſbyterians ſhould again be ſuperior, they would treat them no better than Cromwell. But the rigid Republicans were his moſt dreaded enemies, becauſe he had no pretenſe againſt them. They had the more cauſe to complain, and ſpeak freely, as Cromwell, being their head, had made uſe of them, under color of acting for the public, and brought them to labor for his own private advancement; therefore, to hold all theſe parties in ſubjection, he divided England into eleven diſtricts, and eſtabliſhed in each, officers, whom he called major-generals, with an almoſt abſolute power, that they might be always ready to prevent or diſperſe inſurrections. In this eſtabliſhment his principal view was to awe the Republicans, tho' the pretenſe was to curb the Cavaliers. Theſe major-generals became true tyrants, and ſo oppreſſed the people, that Cromwell at laſt was forced to reduce their power within much narrower bounds (6).

Reſolves to call a parliament. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 460.

Tho' Cromwell's ambition inclined him to ſupport by force the dignity confered on him, yet he ſaw how ridiculous it was to exerciſe an authority given by men who had no lawful power to beſtow it. He eaſily perceived it to be a fertile ſourſe of plots and conſpiracies againſt his perſon and government. He could not puniſh the conſpirators by law, ſince his dignity, far from having any ſolid foundation, was a pure uſurpation. On theſe occaſions therefore it was neceſſary to uſe a tyrannical power, and ſuch violences might in the end produce very ill effects. To remedy this evil, he had called a free parliament, in expectation of having his authority confirmed, but was diſappointed. He reſolved therefore, inſtead of a free parliament, to call one on which he might depend, and to uſe their authority to eſtabliſh his own.

Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 559.——It is very remakable, That, in this treaty, Cromwell would not allow the French King to call himſelf King of France, but of the French; when he himſelf aſſumed the title of Protector of England and France. The parliament agreeable to the natural meaning of the word, is the repreſentative of the nation, whoſe deciſions and laws are looked upon as conformable to the ſentiments of the people in general. The great reſpect, veneration, and attachment which the Engliſh have for the parliament, are therefore not to be thought ſtrange, ſince in ſupporting its privileges, they maintain their own liberty: but this ſuppoſes a parliament agreeable to the conſtitution, compoſed of King, lords, and commons, with an intire freedom in elections. A parliament thus compoſed may be truly called the nation's repreſentative. It is needleſs here to obſerve, that artifices, intrigues and cabals have ſometimes altered this happy conſtitution. The frequent inſtances occuring in this hiſtory, render it undeniable. We have ſeen parliaments regardleſs of their country's good, and devoted intirely to the will of the Prince. Kings have been depoſed by others, and their Sovereigns deprived of their moſt lawful prerogatives. But without looking ſo far back, it needs only be conſidered, what paſſed in the late reign, particularly ſince December 1648. A parliament, by force and violence, reduced to leſs than a hundred members, brought their Sovereign to the ſcaffold; aboliſhed the houſe of lords; deſtroyed Monarchy; changed the government into a common-wealth, and inveſted themſelves with an authority ſupreme, under the ſpecious pretenſe of repreſenting the nation, tho' without King or houſe of peers. Nevertheleſs, tho' the conſtitution of the parliament was intirely ſubverted, and tho' the name of parliament, one would have thought, ſhould not have deceived the people, that venerable appellation was ſtill uſed to force them to obedience, on a groundleſs ſuppoſition, That an aſſembly with only the title of parliament was inveſted with all the authority of the moſt legal repreſentatives. Upon this foundation, theſe tyrants claimed a right to inact laws, to ordain, to decree, as the moſt regular parliament might have done. I ſhall not ſtay to ſhew the extravagance of this pretenſion. Very probably, thoſe who claimed it, were not themſelves ſatisfied with it. But as they were deſtitute of all other foundation, they built upon this, tho' weak and unſecure.

Reflections on parliaments.

On Cromwell's authority.

Cromwell's authority was no better ſupported. So viſible was his uſurpation, that a man muſt have been wilfully blind not to ſee it. He was himſelf ſo fully convinced of the unlawfulneſs of his power, that he left no means uneſſayed to get it confirmed by a free parliament, being the only way which could furniſh him with a plauſible pretenſe to exerciſe it. But failing of ſucceſs, he continued in the ſame ſtate, i. e. inveſted with the dignity of Protector, by men who had no power to confer it. Wherefore, the authority of a parliament appeared to him abſolutely neceſſary to confirm him in his own. But, as he had experienced what was to be expected from a free parliament, he reſolved to call one which might be more at his devotion. He therefore ſummoned a parliament to meet the ſeventeenth of September; but he took ſuch juſt meaſures, that tho' the people ſeemed to injoy a perfect freedom in the election of their repreſentatives, he ſecured a majority of voices. Beſide, he would admit no man in the houſe, who had not firſt promiſed, under his hand, to do nothing againſt the eſtabliſhed government. This parliament, compoſed of the three kingdoms repreſentatives, met on the day appointed (1); above a hundred members refuſing to ſign the ingagement, were denied their ſeats in the houſe. The reſt appeared ready to perform Cromwell's deſires. An act was forthwith paſſed, for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart (for ſo they called the King) and ſigned by all the members. By another act it was declared high-treaſon to attempt the life of the Protector. In fine, ſome few months after, the parliament liberally granted all the money deſired by Cromwell, as well for the maintenance of the army and government, as for the contiuation of the Spaniſh war.

Some days before the parliament met, their admirals Blake and Montague, falling in with eight Spaniſh ſhips, returning from the Weſt-Indies richly laden, took two, and ſtranded ſome others. This action was performed near Cadiz, where the Engliſh admirals had long expected this fleet. Cromwell ordered the two prizes to be brought to Portſmouth, and in a ſort of triumph, conveyed the money and goods in waggons to London.

About two months after, ſome Anabaptiſts were diſcovered, who had projected to kill the Protector. Major-general Harriſon, vice-admiral Lawſon, colonel Rich, major Danvers, and ſome others, all Anabaptiſts, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in the conſpiracy, were arreſted.

Since Blake and Montague had taken the two prizes, they continued cruiſing off Cadiz, in expectation of the Spaniſh fleet returning from Peru. As this fleet did not appear, in the time looked for, Blake had notice, it was retired to Teneriff, one of the Canaries, 'till the Engliſh ſhips ſhould be ſailed from Cadiz. Whereupon, he ſtood for the Canaries, the begining of April, and found there the Spaniſh fleet, conſiſting of ſix galeons richly laden, and ten other ſhips of leſs burden. The commander of this fleet had anchored in the bay of Santa Cruz, and taken all poſſible care to ſecure himſelf againſt an attack. The ten ſmaller ſhips were moored cloſe to the land, and defended by two forts well mounted with guns, and ſeveral batteries erected on the ſhore. But the galeons drawing more water, could not come ſo near the land, but lay farther off, with their broad-ſides towards the ſea. Blake ſeeing no poſſibility of approaching the ten ſhips, reſolved, nothwithſtanding the raſhneſs of the attempt, to attack the galeons. Accordingly, with a fair wind, he approached, received their fire and boarded them. The particulars of this ingagement are very confuſedly related by the hiſtorians. Thus much, however, is certain, that Blake, after an obſtinate fight, poſſeſſed himſelf of the galeons, and as the wind, which had brought him into the bay, would not ſerve to carry them out, fired them. Immediately after a land-breeze ariſing put him ſafe to ſea again. The Spaniards on this occaſion ſuſtained a very great loſs, in ſhips, money, men, and marchandiſe; and the Engliſh acquired nothing but glory. Blake dying in his return to England, was pompouſly buried by Cromwell, in Henry the VIIth's chapel, among the monuments of the Kings.

careſſed all parties alike. The Preſbyterians were told, he was not far from their ſentiments; the nobility met with great reſpect from him; and he appeared leſs inſenſed againſt the Cavaliers. At length, after his friends and creatures had been long laboring to diſpoſe men in his favor, a member of parliament *, and one of the city aldermen, propoſed, in direct terms, that he might be inveſted with the title of King. This propoſition was immediately ſeconded by a great many members (1), and it was even obſerved, that his known enemies very readily gave their conſent. Theſe imagined, there was no better way to ruin him, and excite plots againſt his life. But for the ſame reaſon, his chief friends oppoſed it with all their power. Nevertheleſs, it is very probable, he was privy to this propoſal, tho' he thought not fit to tell it to Deſborough his brother-in-law, or Fleetwood his ſon-in-law, from whom it met with the greateſt oppoſition. This contraſt between Cromwell's friends, held thoſe in ſuſpenſe, who only intended to make their addreſs to him, and cauſed them to be irreſolute. The propoſal therefore was debated in the houſe two days ſucceſſively. In all likelihood the irreſolute were informed, in this interval, how they were to behave. However that be, it was at laſt carried by a majority of voices, that the crown ſhould be offered to the Protector. Agreeable to this reſolution, the houſe immediately appointed a commitee, to acquaint his Highneſs with what had been reſolved for the public good. He ſeemed ſurpriſed at the offer, and told the commitee, he thought it very ſtrange, the parliament ſhould entertain ſuch a deſign: that he did not believe it proper for them to offer, nor would his conſcience admit the acceptance. The commitee expecting this anſwer, replied, They did not queſtion but he would grant their deſire, when he ſhould be informed of the reaſons which had induced the parliament to take this reſolution, and which they beſought him only to hear. Whereupon, he appointed a day to hear what they had to ſay (2).

Reaſons laid before him to prevail with him to accept it. Apr. 11, 12. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 463.

The commitee (3), on the day appointed, entertained him with long diſcourſes, concerning the reaſons on which the parliament founded their requeſt, of which the principal were: "That the "people of England had for many ages been ac- "cuſtomed to the government of Kings: that in "changing this government, there had neceſſarily "been an abolition of many laws, cuſtoms, and "formalities, and an eſtabliſhment of others, which "would never be indured by the people on account "of their novelty: that according to the laws of "England, there could be no ſecurity to any act "concerning the government, without the inter- "vention and authority of a King: that hitherto, "thoſe concerned in the war, and the late changes, "could not be ſafe, but would remain liable to "dangerous inquiſitions, agreeable to the laws of "the land: that the daily conſpiracies againſt the "preſent government, clearly ſhewed, the people "were inclined to a King, nor would be ſatisfied "without one: In a word, that the kingdom would "never be in peace, 'till things were brought "back to their ancient channel. That it was "very true, the royal family had been rejected on "account of their tyrannies; but this was no ob- "jection to the choice of a King of another family, "nor could any kingdom be produced, where the "like had not happened, as well as in England."

INTER-REG. AN' 1657.

In the debates of the houſe, theſe very reaſons were alleged, and the Republicans anſwered them to this effect: "That an oath had been taken to "be faithful to the common-wealth without a "King; and to make a new King was returning "to Egypt. Where was the neceſſity of recuring "to Kings, ſince it was agreed, they invaded the "rights of the ſubject? That it was advantageous "that all the ſubjects ſhould be equally liable to be "called to an account, that they might be more "united among themſelves. That if a King "was at laſt neceſſary, they would chuſe rather to "have the true heir to the crown." Cromwell was not unacquainted with the reaſons alleged on both ſides in the houſe, and therefore to ſhow, he would neither accept nor refuſe the offer without deliberation, he appointed the eighth of May for his final determination.

He is greatly perplexed what choice to make. Whitelock, p. 556. Clarendon, Vol. III. P. 466.

In this interval, it is pretended, he was in the utmoſt diſtraction, not knowing how to act. His ambition prompted him to accept the offered crown, the whole intrigue being probably directed by himſelf. But the diſpoſition of his relations and principal friends made him tremble. For how could he promiſe to himſelf allegiance from ſtrangers, when he ſaw his own moſt intimate friends determined to abandon him? Nay, it is ſaid, ſome threatened to kill him, and that he was informed of a plot to aſſaſſinate him, the moment he accepted the diadem. The very day he was to give his anſwer, Deſborough and Fleetwood, walking with him in St. James's park, told him, if he accepted the crown, they could no longer ſerve him. He was diſcouraged by all theſe events, at the very inſtant the crown was going to be placed on his head. His anſwer therefore to the commitee was, that he could not accept the government under the title of King (4). Whether this refuſal was for or againſt his intereſt, is a problem that admits of great diſpute. For my part, I believe, that being ſo able a politician, he did not think the advantages of accepting the diadem, equal to the inconveniencies.

This petition and advice was preſented to his Highneſs by the houſe, and he deſired that a commitee might be appointed to confer with him about it; which was named, and Whitelock one of the commitee, was made chairman. The general terms in which the laſt three articles concerning religion are expreſſed, plainly ſhew, that the intention of the parliament, or rather of Cromwell who directed them, was, to oblige equally the Preſbyterians and Independents. Cromwell having ſolemnly ſworn the punctual obſervation of theſe articles, appointed the twenty-ſixth of June for the day of his inauguration, which was performed with great pomp (3). This done, the houſe adjourned to the twentieth of January 1657-8.

Since the renewal of the ancient treaties between France and England, another negociation was begun for a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Spain. This negociation, ſet on foot by the embaſſador of France in 1656, at London, was concluded at Paris the thirteenth of March 1657, by a treaty of league, importing, that Cromwell ſhould join ſix thouſand men with the French army; that Mardyke and Dunkirk ſhould be beſieged, and when taken, delivered to the Engliſh (4).

A league offenſive and defenſive between France and Cromwell. March 13. Aubery's Hiſtory of cardinal Mazarine.

King Charles being informed of this negociation, ſent a truſty meſſenger to arch-duke Leopold, ſtill governor of the Low-Countries, to offer a league with Spain. The King's deſign was to give himſelf ſome reputation by a league with that crown; and beſide, he wiſhed to reſide in the Low-Countries in order to be nearer England, in caſe his preſenſe there ſhould be neceſſary. The arch-duke accepted the propoſal, believing, if the King of England was attached to Spain, he would have credit enough to draw the Iriſh forces from the French, into the Spaniſh ſervice. This was all the benefit Spain could expect from a junction with a Prince, who had properly nothing to offer. Beſide he was to be ſubſiſted, when he ſhould be deſerted by France. However this be, the King and the arch-duke concluded a treaty, by which the King's reſidence at Bruges was only to be connived at by Spain, which was little able to maintain him according to his dignity. Spain alſo ingaged to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men, as ſoon as he ſhould be poſſeſſed of ſome good port in England. His Majeſty, ſatiſfied with theſe conditions, not being able to procure better, ſigned the treaty, which was ratified by the King of Spain. With the ratification, Philip ſetled upon the King a monthly penſion of ſix thouſand Guilders, and another of three thouſand upon the duke of Gloceſter, who had been ſent for out of France by his brother the King, where his mother was perſuading him to change his religion. So, the King left Cologne in April 1657, and retired to Bruges, at the ſame time as arch-duke Leopold reſigned the government of the Low-Countries to Don John of Auſtria, natural ſon of Philip IV. The King afterwards prevailed with the lord Muſkerry, colonel of an Iriſh regiment in the French ſervice, to deſert their imployment, and join the Spaniſh army with his regiment. He alſo found means to cauſe four regiments, of Engliſh, Scots and Iriſh, to come in ſingle companies, and offer him their ſervice. Theſe regiments, tho' not in very good order, ſerved in the Spaniſh army.

Before it a table and chair for the ſpeaker, and on each ſide of the hall covered ſeats one over another, for the members. About two o'clock his Highneſs came, the earl of Warwick carrying the ſword before him (and being the only nobleman that was preſent at that ſolemnity, ſays Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 592.) and the lord-mayor of London, with the city-ſword. His Highneſs ſtanding under the cloth of ſtate, the ſpeaker preſented to him a robe of purple velvet lined with ermines, which ſir T. Widdrington, the ſpeaker, aſſiſted by Whitelock, put upon him. Then he delivered to him the bible richly gilt and boſſed; after that he girt on his ſword, and delivered into his hands the ſcepter of maſſy gold, and then made a ſpeech to him, and gave him the oath. After this, the people gave ſeveral ſhouts, and the trumpets ſounded: the Protector ſat in the chair of ſtate, holding the ſcepter in his hand; on his right ſide ſat the embaſſador of France, on the left the embaſſador of the United Provinces: near him ſtood his ſon Richard, Fleetwood lord deputy of Ireland, Claypole, maſter of the horſe, the council and others of ſtate. The earl of Warwick held the ſword on the right, and the lord-mayor the city ſword on the left ſide of the chair. Near the earl of Warwick ſtood viſcount Liſle, general Montague, and Whitelock, each of them with a drawn ſword in their hands. Then the trumpets ſounded, and a herald proclaimed his Highneſs's title, and proclamation was made to the people, crying, " God ſave the Protector." The ceremonies being ended, he went in ſtate to Weſtminſter-hall gate, where he took coach, and went to the houſe, and paſſed ſome bills. Whitelock. p. 662.

In conſequence of the league, Cromwell ſent ſix thouſand of his beſt troops into France under the command of Reynolds, who had concluded the treaty at Paris in quality of his embaſſador. In this campain, the French took ſeveral places from the Spaniards, and among the reſt Mardyke which was delivered to the Engliſh. Compoſes another houſe of parliament. Whitelock, p. 665. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 472. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 594, 595. Heath.

As by the ſecond article of the humble petition and advice, the Protector was to ſummon every year a parliament, conſiſting of two houſes, Cromwell reſolved to obſerve that article, which had been inſerted in the inſtrument by his ſole direction. To compoſe the other houſe, he choſe at his own pleaſure a certain number. Moſt of theſe were officers, or other perſons devoted to him, to whom he added ſome ancient peers; but they refuſed to take their ſeats with thoſe of his nomination (1). This choice being made, he iſſued out writs for their aſſembling in parliament, in a ſeparate houſe, the twentieth of January 1657-8. His intention was to have this houſe conſidered as a houſe of peers and inveſted with all thoſe privileges the peers had formerly injoyed. He however durſt not give it that name, but contented himſelf with calling it the "Other Houſe," 'till a more proper name could be thought of (2).

Deſigns of his enemies againſt him. Ludlow.

It has been obſerved, Cromwell had created himſelf many enemies, not only among the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians, but even among the Independents themſelves. Theſe laſt were highly provoked at his having made uſe of them for his advancement, under color of laboring with them to eſtabliſh a Republican-government. The ſequel had ſhown them, that in ſuppreſſing Kingly juriſdiction, he had never intended to aboliſh the Monarchy, ſince he had ſeized the ſupreme power, under the name of Protector. They therefore looked on him as the moſt perfidious of men, and were not leſs his enemies than the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians. He was ſupported only by the army, filled by himſelf with Fanaticks and Enthuſiaſts, who imagined the time was come to erect a Fifth-Monarchy, or the reign of Jeſus Chriſt upon earth. Cromwell was not ignorant, his enemies had deſigned to deſtroy him, on pretenſe of raiſing him higher, and this had made him refuſe the title of King. It was alſo to break their meaſures, that he had aſked and obtained a power of erecting another houſe, to oppoſe it occaſionally to the houſe of commons, where he knew he had but too many enemies, of which he had cauſe very ſoon to be ſtill more ſenſible.

The parliament meets in two houſes. Jan. 20. 1657-8. Whitelock, p. 666. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 472.

During the adjournment, his enemies having had time to concert their meaſures, took another courſe to deſtroy him when the parliament re-aſſembled. As by the third article (3) of the humble petition and advice, it was ſaid, the members legally choſen, ſhould not be excluded without the conſent of their houſe, a motion was made to admit all the elected members, who had refuſed to ſign the ingagement. This motion was ſo ſuddenly received and approved, that Cromwell had not time to oppoſe it, and it was ſo much the more out of his power, as it was founded on a ſolemn act, which he had ſworn to obſerve. By this means above a hundred members, Republicans and Preſbyterians, all enemies to the Protector, were admited into the houſe of commons (4). From that time, the face of affairs began to change, Cromwell's enemies having gained the ſuperiority in that very houſe which would have made him a King. As they had formed great projects againſt him, their firſt care was to hinder the other houſe, wholly conſiſting of his creatures, from uſing their pretended negative voice to fruſtrate their meaſures. The authority therefore of the other houſe was called in queſtion, and it was affirmed to be abſurd, that they ſhould have a negative voice, ſince the commons, by whom they were created, never pretended to make peers of men who had no other power than what they voted them. Adding, that therefore it was ſaid in the humble petition and advice, that the power of the other houſe ſhould be limited. Cromwell, perceiving to what all this tended, ſent for the parliament to Whitehall, and in a ſpeech maintained the authority of the other houſe with ſuch warmth, that the commons fearing an immediate diſſolution, found it neceſſary to acknowlege the other houſe as an eſſential part of the parliament.

The parliament examines the validity of the humble petition and advice. Phillips.

Notwithſtanding this, the commons took into conſideration the humble petition and advice, and many were of opinion, it was null and void, becauſe it was made when ſeveral members were excluded from the parliament, without any lawful cauſe. This evidently tended to a revocation of the act, and withal of the ſubſequent confirmation of Cromwell's protectorſhip. Cromwell was too quick-ſighted not to ſee how far it concerned his intereſt, not to ſuffer this parliament to ſit any longer. Wherefore he came to the other houſe and ſending for the commons, ſpoke to them in theſe terms:

Cromwell's ſpeech to the parliament. Feb. 4. Phillips, p. 631.

"I had very comfortable expectations that God "would make the meeting of the parliament a "bleſſing; and the Lord be my witneſs, I deſire "the carrying on the affairs of the nation to theſe "ends. The bleſſing which I mean, and which we "ever climbed at, was mercy, truth, righteouſneſs, "and peace, which I deſire may be improved.

"That which brought me into the capacity I "now ſtand in, was the petition and advice given "me by you, who, in reference to the ancient "conſtitution, did draw me to accept of the place "of Protector. "But to be petitioned thereunto, and adviſed by you "to undertake ſuch a government, a burden too "heavy for any creature, and this to be done by "the houſe that then had the legiſlative capacity,

On the diſſolution of the parliament, Cromwell ſuſpecting, or perhaps being informed, that Lambert was one of the principal authors of the plot formed againſt him, diſmiſſed him from all his imployments (1). Fleetwood was recalled from Ireland to ſucceed Lambert in the lieutenant-generalſhip, and Henry Cromwell, younger ſon of the Protector, was diſmiſſed into Ireland in Fleetwood's room. Since Cromwell had been confirmed in the Protectorate, he called his eldeſt ſon Richard to court (2), and made him chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford. He had married his ſecond daughter to the lord Falconbridge, and his third to Mr. Rich, grandſon to the earl of Warwick. His eldeſt had been long ſince married to mr. Claypole, and a fourth lived unmarried, if I am not miſtaken, 'till the reign of William III (3). Soon after Lambert's diſmiſſion, Cromwell so reduced the authority of major-generals, that they had no longer the power, as before, of oppreſſing the people. In all appearance, they were deeply concerned in the plot to gain the army, mentioned by Cromwell in his ſpeech to the parliament. It is pretended, he meaned a greater reformation in his army, and was reſolved to diſmiſs every perſon of ſuſpected fidelity. But he had not time to execute this project.

A conſpiracy of the Royaliſts. Warwick. Phillips. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 482, &c.

Cromwell had great reaſon to ſpeak of a conſpiracy forming in England in favor of the King. The Royaliſts not doubting that all who were enemies either to Cromwell's perſon or government, were the King's ſecret friends; built upon that foundation to place him on the throne by the aſſiſtance of his greateſt enemies. This would appear incredible, if they had not given frequent inſtances of their partiality. The project was, as uſual, to raiſe inſurrections in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in the belief, that the King's private friends would not loſe the occaſion of joining thoſe who ſhould appear in arms. The principal managers of this plot were John Mordaunt brother to the earl of Peterborough, ſir Henry Slingſby a rich and popular man in the county of York, and dr. Hewet a miniſter of the church of England. This plot had been repreſented to the King in ſo advantageous a manner, by reaſon of the general diſcontent under the preſent government, that he conceived hopes of ſucceſs. And therefore he himſelf had made ſome preparations in the Low-Countries, and the four regiments raiſed by him, and after the miſcarriage of the deſign, added to the Spaniſh army, were intended for his ſervice. Moreover he had ſent commiſſions into England, for thoſe who would ingage in his intereſt. One of theſe commiſſions, to raiſe a regiment of horſe, had been granted to one mr. Stapley, whoſe father had been Cromwell's great friend, and one of the King's judges. Cromwell, upon ſome information, ſent for Stapley, and artfully drew from him a confeſſion of whatever he knew; and that he had received his commiſſion from mr. Mordaunt. He alſo told him, the marquis of Ormond had been at London, and ſtayed there three weeks to concert meaſures with the conſpirators, and give them his directions; which was true. The earl of Clarendon intimates, the marquis, when in England, had not found things ripe for the execution of what was intended; and yet the great number of commiſſions ſhew, that the court had a better opinion of the undertaking. However this be, the marquis had the good fortune to leave England, and return to the King, before Cromwell knew he had been there. Immediately after the diſſolution of the parliament, Mordaunt, Slingſby and Hewet were commited to the Tower, and many of their aſſociates were apprehended in all parts of the kingdom. After which,

Some others were condemned, and pardoned by Cromwell, not to multiply any more the number of his enemies. It is certain he had a great many, and thoſe who had been moſt attached to him while he was believed to be in their views, hated him mortally, when they found themſelves deceived.

Addreſs of ſome ſectaries to the King. p. 489, &c.

The earl of Clarendon relates on this occaſion a long addreſs to the King, from ſeveral Independents, Quakers and Anabaptiſts, brought him by a young gentleman (4), wherein they ſuppoſed the death of Cromwell to be near, which ſeemed to intimate a deſing to aſſaſſinate him. To this addreſs were annexed ſome conditions required of the King, with which certainly he could not comply. Wherefore he contented himſelf with returning a general anſwer, that he intended not to perſecute or trouble any men for their opinions, if their actions were peaceable, and that they might hope for his favor, if he received ſervice from them; by which he ſeemed to incourage them to execute their deſign. It is certain, theſe men abhored Cromwell, but depended too much on their own ſtrength, and filled their heads with chimerical deſigns. After all, tho' their projects ſhould have ſucceeded, the King would have received no advantage, their principles being ſo oppoſite to his. Probably, their intention was to make uſe of the King to accompliſh their aim, but not to place him on the throne in the manner he deſired, therefore this project vaniſhed.

This year, in June, marſhal Turenne, the French general, beſieged Dunkirk, contrary to the opinion of Don John of Auſtria, who expected he would have opened the campain with the ſiege of Cambray. As this belief had made him neglect providing for the defenſe of Dunkirk, he was forced to hazard a battle to ſave that place, which was in no condition to make a long reſiſtance. But this battle proved fatal to the Spaniards, who were intirely defeated (5), and the ſiege was continued by Turenne, who made himſelf maſter of Dunkirk the twenty-ſixth of June. The town, in purſuance of the treaty with England, was ſurrendered to Cromwell, who made Lockhart governor, and in it placed a ſtrong gariſon.

Cromwell's family was originally of Glamorganſhire in Wales, and called Williams, one of which marrying a ſiſter of Cromwell, vicar-general in the reign of Henry VIII, aſſumed the name of Cromwell, and tranſmited it to his poſtirity. Oliver Cromwell was born at Huntington, April twenty-five, 1599. His education had nothing extraordinary (2), nor have we any account how he beſtowed his time before he arrived at the age of thirty five, when he led a very regular life, without indulging himſelf in any indecent or ill action. He then probably, if not ſooner, ingaged in the Preſbyterian party (3). The reputation he had acquired of an honeſt man and good chriſtian, and doubtleſs his principles concerning the government, were the cauſe of his being returned for the town of Cambridge, to the parliament which met the third of November, 1640 (4). Two years he ſate without being diſtinguiſhed, not having a genius for ſpeaking to ſet him upon a level with ſome of the members of that parliament. His delivery was ungraceful, and his ſpeeches prolix and confuſed. In theſe two years probably he was gained by the Independents, and liſted in their party, tho' concealed under the name of rigid Preſbyterians, agreeable to the views and intereſts of that party. Cromwell affected an extraordinary zeal for Preſbyterianiſm, and the liberty of the kingdom againſt the uſurpations of the court, in which he followed the directions of the then leading members of the houſe. So, when the civil war began in 1642, he had a poſt in the army, as a man intirely devoted to that houſe, of which he was member. At firſt he was a major of horſe, and tho' two and forty years of age before he had drawn a ſword, he was ſo diſtinguiſhed by his valor in that poſt, that he had ſoon after a regiment given him. In the army there was not an officer that faced danger with more intrepidity, or who more ardently ſought occaſions to ſignaliſe himſelf. His reputation increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he became major-general, then lieutenant-general under Fairfax, and at laſt his ſucceſſor. His great talents for war gave him opportunity to ſhew that he had no leſs genius for civil affairs. He entered into the deepeſt deſigns of his party, and at laſt became one of the principal leaders, advancing here with the ſame rapidity as in the field. It was he, who accuſing the earl of Mancheſter of not having done his duty in the ſecond battle of Newbury, broke the ice, and gave occaſion to the new model of the army, which was the firſt ſtep to the triumph of the Independents. From that time, he was looked upon as the chief of the Independent party, and, properly as general of the army, Fairfax acting only by his directions. I ſhall no farther inſiſt upon what has been related at large, but only obſerve, that the troops believed themſelves invincible under his command, and that he was never once forced to turn his back. The victory gained over Prince Rupert at Marſton-moor, was chiefly aſcribed to his valor. What greatly increaſed his glory was, the reduction of Ireland in leſs than a year; and the battles of Dunbar and Worceſter carried it to the higheſt degree.

Let us now view him in his Protectorate. If his government be compared with thoſe of the two laſt Kings, there will appear a very great diſparity with regard to the honor and reputation of the Engliſh nation. James I and Charles I ſeem to have ſtudied diſgracing the Engliſh name; whereas Cromwell, in the ſpace of four or five years carried the glory of his nation as high as poſſible, and in that reſpect was not inferior to Elizabeth (5). He made himſelf equally dreaded by France and Spain, and the United Provinces. Theſe three ſtates courted his alliance and friendſhip with ſuch ardor, that they may be ſaid to cringe to him beyond what was becoming. Charles Guſtavus, King of Sweden, thought himſelf honored in being his particular friend and ally. His greateſt enemies cannot avoid doing him honor on this account.

Burnet's Hiſt. p. 81.

As for his morals and conduct, as a private perſon, they may be ſaid to have been very regular. He was guilty of none of the vices to which men are commonly addicted. Gluttony, drunkeneſs, gaming, luxury, avarice, were vices with which he was never ſo much as reproached. On the contrary, it is certain, he promoted virtuous men; as, on the other hand, he was inflexible in his puniſhments of vice and ill actions. It is true, his own preſervation obliged him ſometimes to imploy men of ill principles; but this is not uncommon to thoſe, who are at the head of a government.

Welwood.

Tho' he was an Independent, as to his religion, his principle was to leave every man at liberty in the perſuaſion he had choſen, and never puniſhed any perſon on that ſcore. He even connived at the private meetings of thoſe who remained attached to the church of England, tho' he was well informed of them. If they were not favored with the free and public exerciſe of their religion, it was becauſe they were conſidered by him as Royaliſts, always ready to form plots in the King's favor, and from whom, conſequently, he had great reaſon to ſecure himſelf. Tho' he was of the Independent opinion, and therefore averſe to all union with the national church, he however conſidered all Proteſtant churches, as part of the Proteſtant church in general; and without aiming to eſtabliſh Independency and Fanaticiſm by force and violence, he expreſſed, on all occaſions, an extreme zeal for the Proteſtant religion. Dr. Burnet, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, ſays, If Cromwell had accepted the title of King, he intended to eſtabliſh a council, in imitation of the 'Congregation de propagande fide' at Rome, to have an eye to what paſſed all over the world, with reſpect to the intereſts of the Proteſtant religion. He adds, that a fund was to have been ſetled upon this council, of ten thouſand pounds a year, for ordinary emergencies, beſide a ſalary of five hundred pounds a-piece to four ſecretaries.

To Cromwell's honor it may alſo be added, that never man was better acquainted with the inward ſprings of human actions, tho' he ſeemed not to have made it his particular ſtudy: never man had more addreſs to manage people, and lead them to his ends, nor more natural capacity for affairs, who had received no aſſiſtance from learning; for he ſcarce remembered the little Latin he had brought from ſchool: in a word, never man choſe at once his moſt advantageous courſe with more judgment, or executed a deſign with more vigor and readineſs. Such, in ſhort, were the virtues and ſhining qualities of Cromwell; but we muſt not conceal the vices and imperfections with which he is calumniated.

Burnet, p. 65.

This charge turns ſolely upon three points. The firſt, that thro' a boundleſs ambition, he ſeized a government to which he had no right. The ſecond, that he maintained himſelf in his dignity, by an exceſſive diſſimulation. The third, that he put to death many of his private enemies, without any regard to laws immemorially practiſed in England. Upon theſe three articles I ſhall offer ſome conſiderations to the reader, to aſſiſt in forming a juſt idea of Cromwell's character.

On the firſt, it muſt be conſidered, that tho' the Cavalier authors traduce Cromwell's memory as much as poſſible, and tho' in particular, the action by which he was poſſeſſed of the government, is the principal foundation of all their complaints, it is certain, the King was no way intereſted in the change it produced. It was not Charles II, but a Republican parliament, that was deprived of the ſupreme power by the Protector. Tho' he had been ſubjected to this parliament; tho' he had miſcarried, and himſelf been ruined by his ambition, the King's affairs would have received no advantage, ſince the parliament was not leſs his enemy than Cromwell. Of what therefore do they complain with reſpect to the King? It muſt be one of theſe two things, either that Cromwell was too wiſe, to ſuffer himſelf to be ſupplanted by all the efforts of the Royaliſts; or that, after ſeizing the ſupreme power, he did not reſtore it to the King, to whom alone it belonged; i. e. that Cromwell did not at once turn Royaliſt, and intirely change his principles. But this charge lies no more againſt Cromwell, than againſt the Independents and Preſbyterians, who were at leaſt three parts in four of the kingdom, and who, no more than Cromwell, thought it proper to declare for his Majeſty.

Ludlow. Vol. II. throughout. Burnet. p. 65.

As for the Republicans, they have not left us many writings on their ſide. The only Memoirs of that party, which I know of, are thoſe of Edmund Ludlow. It there appears, that the Republicans were inraged againſt Cromwell, and deemed him the moſt perfidious of mankind. This is not very ſurpriſing, ſince he had wreſted from that parliament the ſovereign power, ſeized by theſe Republicans without any lawful authority. But, what was this parliament? It was an aſſembly of Independents, Anabaptiſts, Fanatics, Enthuſiaſts, and others of no religion, who, under color of eſtabliſhing a free common-wealth, held the nation in bondage; who, to confirm their own authority, had treated their fellow-members with unheard of inſolence, and dared to imbrue their hands in the blood of the late King, at a time when he had almoſt granted every thing that was deſired; who, in ſhort, were induſtrious to break the union of the church, to ſubvert all religion, or introduce a moſt ridiculous and extravagant one. Was it therefore more eligible for England to be governed by theſe men, than by Cromwell? If, therefore, Cromwell be blameable, it is not for diſſolving a parliament, which certainly deſerved to continue no longer, and had ſtrangely abuſed the power they aſſumed. But if, after the diſſolution of that parliament, Cromwell had reſtored the King (for this, in all appearance, is what the Cavaliers would have) he had drawn upon himſelf the hatred and curſes of all England, which, at that time, was by no means diſpoſed to ſuch a reſtoration, whatever the Royaliſts may affirm. He was therefore, to do one of theſe three things; either to reſtore the King, contrary both to his own principles, and to thoſe of the Preſbyterians and Independents; or to abandon the ſtate to a horrible anarchy, which muſt have followed, if he had left affairs in the ſtate they were in after the diſſolution; or take to himſelf the adminiſtration of the government, unleſs he had intruſted it with ſome other perſon, which, had been the ſame, in reſpect to the juſtice of the action. Let it now be examined, which was moſt advantageous for England, conſidering her then circumſtances, and whether it was not better, he ſhould himſelf take the government, than attempt a reſtoration, in which he could never have proved ſucceſsful; ſince his ſole ſupport was the army, which at that time was very averſe to the King, not to mention the oppoſition he would have met from the Republicans and Preſbyterians. On ſuppoſition that he was in the right to diſſolve the parliament, was it not alſo better for him to aſſume the government, than relinquiſh the ſtate to a fatal anarchy? Thoſe who pretend, he had projected his advancement long before, ſpeak only by conjecture. They do not conſider, that they never were in a condition to form ſuch a deſign, before the battle of Worceſter; nor that this parliament, which he diſſolved, had, in ſeeking to ruin him, reduced him to a neceſſity of deſtroying them, for his own preſervation.

But what cannot be juſtified in his conduct, is, his throwing himſelf, from the begining of the parliament, into a violent party, which aimed at the ruin of church and ſtate; his directing afterwards that party; and his being the chief author of the violences forced on the parliament and the King. This, however, is ſlightly paſſed over, becauſe it is common to him with the whole Independent party; and yet, it is, in my opinion, the only thing he can juſtly be reproached with, and on which it is ſcarcely poſſible to excuſe him.

Inter-reg. An' 1658.

His exceſſive diſſimulation is the ſecond charge againſt him; but here we are to diſtinguiſh. If it be true, as is pretended, tho' without proof, that he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to mock God and religion, by expreſſing a piety and devotion which he had not, and by making long prayers, full of ſeeming zeal. If it be true, that his mouth uttered what his heart never meaned, no man ought to indeavor to vindicate him. But his ſtrong biaſs to Enthuſiaſm is well known; and who can affirm, it was more out of hypocriſy than real perſuaſion? We are not raſhly to aſcribe inward motives to men, which mortals cannot be acquainted with. His diſſimulation, practiſed for the better management of the ſeveral parties, all equally his enemies, has nothing that I can ſee, very blameable in it, unleſs it was a crime, not to leave it in the power of his enemies with eaſe to deſtroy him. I ſhall juſt mention ſome of his methods, to maintain himſelf in his dignity, by which it may be judged, whether Cromwell's diſſimulation is to be juſtly imputed to him as a crime.

Welwood. Warwick's Mem. Burnet. p. 79.

The parliament he diſſolved was compoſed of Independents, Republicans, Enthuſiaſts, or Fifth-monarchy-men. If this parliament had continued longer, things would have been carried to the laſt extremity. They began to talk of pulling down the churches, deſtroying the clergy, and every thing that looked like the union of a national church. The Preſbyterians, who knew this, were in continual apprehenſions of their executing their deſigns, and conſequently the diſſolution of this parliament was conſidered by them, as a great happineſs. Cromwell, to gain their confidence, poſitively promiſed, he would maintain their miniſtry on the foot of the preſent eſtabliſhment, and kept his word, tho' he was far from being Preſbyterian. By this means, the Preſbyterians were attached to his intereſt, by reaſon of their dread to fall again under the tyranny of the Independents.

Burnet, p. 67.

In the Republican party were two ſorts of men, whom it was difficult to govern. The one were Deiſts, or men very indifferent as to religion, who acted only on the principles of civil liberty. The others were Enthuſiaſts, who expected every day when Chriſt ſhould appear to reign upon earth. Theſe were the moſt difficult to manage, becauſe they would not hear reaſon, when it contradicted their headſtrong and violent zeal. Cromwell's accepting the Protectorſhip, was conſidered by them as a ſtep to Monarchy, to which they were ſuch enemies, that they affirmed it to be the great Antichriſt, that hindered Chriſt's reign upon earth. Cromwell found means ſo to divide theſe two parties, that all combinations between them, for his ruin, became impoſſible. To the Deiſts, he made himſelf merry with the extravagant zeal of the Fanatics; and to theſe laſt, he talked of the others as of Heathens and Infidels. But as the Enthuſiaſts were the moſt obſtinate, he intimated to ſome of them, that he would rather have taken a ſhepherd's ſtaff than the Protectorſhip, had it not been to prevent every thing from running into confuſion: that he would reſign this dignity with more joy than he accepted it, as ſoon as things ſhould be ſetled: that nothing was more contrary to his inclination and principles, than a grandeur which obliged him to aſſume an outward ſuperiority over his fellow-laborers. To convince them of what he ſaid, he frequently called them into his cloſet, and ſhuting the door, made them ſit covered, converſing familiarly with them as his equals. Commonly theſe diſcourſes ended in a long prayer. Doubtleſs, there was in this much diſſimulation. The queſtion is, whether it was ſo criminal as is pretended?

Id. p. 68.

Phillips, p. 631.

Burnet, p. 68.

He had likewiſe chaplains of all ſorts. So, hinting ſometimes to one, ſometimes to another, that he was not averſe to their principles; the report was ſpread throughout the whole party, and made each hope for an advantageous change.

He conſtantly implied ſpies among all the parties, and was thereby fully informed of what was contriving againſt his perſon or government (1). Among others, he gained ſir Richard Willis, chancellor Hyde's agent, for conveying the King's orders to his friends in England. All the Royaliſts confided in Willis, knowing he received the King's orders, and yet he betrayed them. But to keep the correſpondence more private, Cromwell aſſured him, that the informations from him ſhould only be made uſe of to diſconcert the plots of his enemies, that none might ever ſuffer for them; and if he impriſoned any, it ſhould only be for a little time, and on other pretenſes. By this means he defeated their deſigns, as by accident, in commiting them to priſon for ſuppoſed crimes, and releaſing them when their meaſures were broken.

p. 65, 66, 71.

He ſometimes intimated a willingneſs to treat with the King. Probably his deſign was to ingage the Royaliſts to offer propoſitions, which would have given him opportunity to amuſe them, and prevented any conſpiracies againſt his perſon; having received information from ſeveral parts of deſigns to deſtroy him. Wherefore he affected to ſpeak publicly of aſſaſſinations with the utmoſt deteſtation, and to declare, he would never begin them; but if an attempt was made upon his life and miſcarried, he ſhould not ſcruple to uſe the ſame method, and that he did not want inſtruments to execute it, nor money to reward them. This declaration kept the Royaliſts in awe, thro' a fear of their own danger, or that of the King and royal family.

Inter-reg. An' 1658.

Burnet, p. 65.

If this conduct of Cromwell be impartially conſidered, it will, doubtleſs, appear, that his diſſimulation and artifices for his own preſervation, were not ſo criminal as they have been repreſented. What has given thoſe, who ſpeak of them with moſt paſſion, the greateſt offenſe, is, that they were proper to diſconcert his enemies projects. The diſſimulation of Queen Elizabeth, for the ſame reaſon, has been extolled, as ſhe uſed it only for her own preſervation.

The third and laſt charge againſt Cromwell is, cruelty, becauſe, while Protector, ſome men were put to death, for conſpiring againſt his perſon and government. That is, according to this reproach, he ſhould have patiently ſuffered the plots againſt him; and when one failed, liberty ſhould have been given for a ſecond and a third, till ſome one had ſucceeded. This deſerves no confutation. But to ſhew, that Cromwell was not for an unneceſſary effuſion of blood, we need only recite what is owned by the earl of Clarendon in his hiſtory, who aſſures, that when it was propoſed in a council of officers, that there might be a general maſſacre of the Royaliſts, Cromwell would never conſent to it.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 509.

To finiſh Cromwell's character, I will add, that in the begining of the Long-parliament, he was a Preſbyterian. After that, he threw himſelf into the Independent party, and was even one of their leaders, and affected to be of the number of the Enthuſiaſts: but when he had accepted the Protectorſhip, he was neither Preſbyterian, nor Independent, nor Republican, nor Enthuſiaſt. As he had to manage all theſe different parties, who were equally oppoſite to him, he was not to appear an enemy to any in particular, and this management furniſhes convincing proofs of his great ability.

It is, nevertheleſs, certain, that Cromwell was very much hated, while he lived, by all the parties then in England, tho' they could not avoid fearing and eſteeming him. But if it be now conſidered, that the prejudices againſt him are not ſo ſtrong as they were then, it will be found that the hatred of him was owing to intereſt, and grounded chiefly upon his ability to diſconcert the meaſures and deſigns of all parties. This general hatred is ſolely refered to his principal action; that is, to the uſurpation of the government, which equally diſguſted the Royaliſts, Preſbyterians, and Republicans. The Royaliſts thereby ſaw their hopes of the King's reſtoration more deſperate than ever. The Preſbyterians could hardly expect, by their intrigues, to render themſelves once more ſuperior in the parliament, after its diſſolution. The Republicans were inraged to ſee the ſupreme power, which they had aſſumed, wreſted from them. It is therefore no wonder, that he incurred ſo much cenſure,

(1) He laid it down for a maxim, to ſpare no coſt or charge in order to procure iutelligence. When he underſtood what dealers the Jews were every where in that trade, that depends upon news, the advancing money upon high or low intereſt, in proportion to the riſque they run, or the gain to be made as the times might turn, and in buying and ſelling of the actions of money ſo advanced, he brought a company of them over to England, for which ſome ſay, he received a conſideration of two hundred thouſand pounds, and gave them leave to build a ſynagogue, Burnet, p. 71.—— Among other good regulations, he alſo appointed a Council of Trade, to conſider how to improve, order and regulate the trade and navigation of the commonwealth. since all the people of England, that is these three parties, were equally concerned to aspersе him. It was not for the enormity of the action, but because, by his advancement, each party despaired of acquiring over the rest the superiority. This is what has drawn, from many writers, expressions so injurious to his memory. The lord Clarendon speaks thus of him, and his usurpation. "Without doubt "no man with more wickedness ever attempted "any thing, or brought to pass what he desired "more wickedly, more in the face and contempt "of religion, and moral honesty. Yet wickedness, "as great as his, could never have accomplished "those designs, without the assistance of a great "spirit, an admirable circumspection and sagacity, "and a most magnanimous resolution." It is easily seen, that this wickedness is refered only to his usurpation of the government. "In a word (continues the same author) "as he was guilty of many "crimes, against which damnation is denounced, "and for which hell-fire is prepared, so he had "some good qualities which have caused the memory of some men in all ages to be celebrated, "and he will be looked upon by posterity as a "brave wicked man." Here the author, no doubt, has an eye to the murder of Charles I, in which Cromwell was too deeply concerned to admit of any excuse. I shall only observe, that this accusation is not peculiar, but is common to him with the whole Independent parliament.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 506.

p. 509.

To form a just and rational idea of Cromwell's character, his conduct and actions in themselves must be examined, and joined to the juncture of the time, independently of the opinions of his enemies. We have no other historians of those times than Royalists, who have laid down certain principles, by which he is condemned. But, it must be observed, these principles were not generally received, in England, during his life. What can never be intirely excused in him, is the death of Charles I, to which he contributed to the utmost of his power, and which will be an indelible blot upon his memory. Another principle, which was absolutely false, and of which he made great use, is likewise to be condemned in him: this was, that moral laws were only binding on ordinary occasions, and might be dispensed with upon extraordinary cases. His usurpation of government has been already considered, and the reader is left to his judgment. I shall only observe, that the confusion which prevailed in England, soon after the death of Cromwell, clearly shews the necessity of this usurpation.

INTER-REG. AN° 1658.

Burnet, p. 79.

In general it cannot be denied, that Cromwell was one of the greatest men of his age, if 'tis considered, that without the advantages of birth and fortune, he rose so near a throne, that it was in his power to mount it. History furnishes very few instances of this kind (1).

Cromwell's death was followed with so many alterations in the government, that the interval between that and the restoration, may be justly called a time of true anarchy. Oliver should have had a successor like himself, to finish what he had so ably begun. But two such great men are not commonly found so near to one another, nor often in the same age.

(1) The wife of Oliver Cromwell, was Elizabeth daughter of sir James Bourchier. Life, p. 2. ——— His mother, who was daughter of sir Richard Steward, must have lived to a very great age, for she was buried in Westminster-Abbey, Nov. 17. 1654. Whitelock, p. 608.

RICHARD CROMWELL, PROTECTOR.

Richard Cromwell succeeds his father. Whitelock, p. 674. Life of Cromwell, p. 405. Ludlow. Heath. Phillips.

IN the last days of Cromwell's illness, some of his intimate friends, seeing him in danger, asked him twice concerning the succession, and he readily answered, he would have his son Richard to succeed him. However he had, in the time of his Protectorship, signed an instrument by which he appointed Fleetwood his son-in-law for his successor; but probably he had burned that paper, for it could never be found (1). An hour after his death, the privy-council met, and upon the report made of the deceased's will, as also upon the instrument of government, impowering them to chuse a Protector, they immediately elected Richard Cromwell. Fleetwood even relinquished before them, the right he might have, in case the paper signed in his favor should be produced. Presently after, the lord-mayor of London was acquainted with the election, and the day following Richard was proclaimed Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The same proclamation was made in all the principal towns of the three kingdoms, without the least opposition. On the contrary, addresses were presented to Richard from all parts, signed by many thousands to congratulate him upon his accession to the dignity of Protector, and to assure him, they would willingly hazard their lives and fortunes to support him. But such addresses are not always to be depended on, experience having often shewn, many are far from being sincere, tho' carefully expressed in the strongest terms. Thus Richard was installed successor to his father Oliver, and took the same oath. The first care of the new Protector, after his installation, was to gain Monk, governor of Scotland, to his interests. After the voluntary resignation of Fleetwood his brother-in-law, of Desborough his uncle, and all the officers of the army, as well Republicans as Presbyterians, he seemed to have nothing to fear from England. Henry Cromwell his brother, then governor of Ireland, held that island in subjection. Scotland therefore only remained to be secured to his interests. Monk had command d in that kingdom, ever since its reduction, and had so artfully managed the Scots, sometimes by rigor, sometimes by gentleness, and the exact discipline of his army, that he had acquired their eſteem and affection, and were never more happy than under his government, tho' the earl of Clarendon inſinuates that he ruled like a tyrant, which ſeems to have no other foundation, than his diſabling that people to withdraw their obedience from the parliament or the Protector, by means of forts erected in convenient places. However this be, it is certain Monk was maſter of Scotland, and Cromwell himſelf would have found it difficult to deprive him of that government without his conſent. Many blamed the confidence Cromwell repoſed in Monk, who had been in arms for the late King, and only ingaged in the parliament's ſervice, to free himſelf from captivity after the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken priſoner. It was, perhaps, for theſe ſuſpicions, that Richard thought himſelf obliged to neglect nothing to gain him to his intereſts. To this end, knowing Monk's eſteem and affection for Clarges his brother-in-law, he ſent him to deſire his friendſhip. But Clarges, as well as Monk, had been zealouſly attached to the King, and was ſtill ſo in his heart, tho' he outwardly complied with the times; therefore in the diſcharge of this commiſſion, he took occaſion to ſound him, and eaſily found he was far from being the King's enemy. From that time Monk and Clarges held a ſtrict correſpondence. Clarges informed Monk of the tranſactions at London, and, in all likelihood, deſigned then to ſerve the King, tho' perhaps he thought it not yet proper to explain himſelf to Monk, who was very reſerved. Clarges, according to his inſtructions, acquainted Monk with the new Protector's great eſteem for him, in which he followed the ſentiments of Oliver his father, who had expreſly charged him to be intirely directed by his advice. Monk readily ſubmited to Richard's government. He obligingly acknowleged his civilities, and only ſaid to him, in general, that having no particular advice to give him, by reaſon of his diſtance, he recommended him to incourage a learned, pious, and moderate miniſtry in the church, to permit no councils of officers, a liberty they too often abuſed, and indeavor the maſtery of the forces.

At the begining of his Protectorſhip Richard had, as I ſaid, the pleaſure of receiving addreſſes from boroughs, cities and counties, to the number of fourſcore and ten; he had afterwards, the like compliment paid him from all the regiments, without exception, ſo that he had reaſon to believe his power ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. Mean while, preparations were making for Oliver's interment; which was ſolemnized with great magnificence, large ſums of money being borrowed by the new Protector for that purpoſe (1). After the ceremonies uſually paid to deceaſed ſovereign princes, his body was depoſited in Henry's VII's chapel, among thoſe of the Kings and Queens of England (2).

The different factions conceive hopes from Richard's advancement.

The royaliſts.

Tho' the late Protector was both careful and capable to preſerve himſelf amidſt the different parties then in England, and to keep them in awe, it was not however in his power to extinguiſh them. Each party, when he was taken out of the world, hoped to gain the advantage under the Protectorate of Richard, who wanted his father's abilities, and to theſe hopes perhaps may be aſcribed, their ready concurrence in declaring him Protector. The Royaliſts juſtly flattered themſelves, that the many parties into which their enemies were divided, having no longer a common head capable to govern them all together, would diſ-unite, and that diſunion be ſerviceable to the King, and perhaps procure his reſtoration, Thoſe who had approved of the government by a ſingle perſon in the deceaſed Protector, and had been moſt truſted by him, hoped to preſerve the ſame credit under the ſon, which they had injoyed under the father, and to direct the new Protector according to their pleaſure. Theſe were the principal members of the council, tho' they had alſo among them a mixture of the Republicans and Fanatics.

Inter-reg. An' 1658.

The Republicans.

If the Republicans conſented to acknowlege Richard, it was becauſe they were unprepared to make oppoſition. The army, chiefly compoſed of this party, being diſperſed in ſeveral counties, the officers had neither time nor opportunity to conſult together. But they doubted not of finding an occaſion to diſplace the new Protector, and reſtore the common-wealth to the ſtate it was in till the year 1653, when Oliver diſſolved the parliament which had formed it.

The Anabaptiſts.

Burnet, p. 67.

The Anabaptiſts were all of the Republican party, becauſe they perceived the impoſſibility of eſtabliſhing their Fifth-Monarchy under a Protector. Theſe were the moſt zealous Republicans, and the hardeſt to be managed, on account of their ſingular notions, which cauſed them to refer every thing to their extravagant religion, and rendered them deaf to any reaſons not drawn from their principles.

The Republican Deiſts.

There was another ſet of Republicans, who, regardleſs of religion, were governed by political views. Theſe were accuſed of having no religion, or of being properly Deiſts.

The Preſbyterians.

As for the Preſbyterians, who were very numerous in England and Ireland, beſide the Scots, who were almoſt all of this ſect, they had not changed their principles, ſince their expulſion from the parliament in 1648. They would have willingly admited the King with a limited power, and the firm eſtabliſhment of Preſbyterian government in the church. This principle had always cauſed them to remain by themſelves, without being able to unite either with the Royaliſts, who would hearken to no limitation on the Regal power, and were averſe to their church-government, or with the Republicans, who would have neither King nor Protector. Beſide, theſe laſt granted an intire liberty to all ſects, which had joined the Independent party, a liberty inconſiſtent with the principles of the Preſbyterians. For, tho' the Preſbyterians had, under the reigns of Elizabeth, James I, and Charles I, taken it very ill to be denied the free exerciſe of their religion, they were by no means inclined to grant others the ſame liberty they had for themſelves demanded. Nevertheleſs, as their number was conſiderable, and they might at laſt find a leader capable to conduct their affairs, the deceaſed Protector thought it proper to manage them, and preſerve their government in the church, but without obliging any perſon to conform to it. This moderation kept the Preſbyterians quiet under Oliver's government, and the more, as they could expect no aſſiſtance from the army, as it was then modelled. But in remaining thus ſeparate from all the other parties, they diſabled themſelves from making any great progreſs againſt the Independent, who took care to keep them low. This gave the Royaliſts room to hope, the Preſbyterians would at laſt he obliged to unite with them, to free them-

Richard designs to become master of the council and the army. Phillips.

This short recapitulation of the several parties interests, plainly demonstrates Cromwell's capacity, who could keep them all in awe, without a positive declaration in favor of any one. Richard proposed to begin his Protectorate with his father's maxims. He formed the design of making himself master of the deliberations of his council, and of reducing the army to receive his orders with submission. By these two things Oliver maintained his authority, and, if he had lived, would not have left an officer in the army of whom he could conceive the least suspicion. But to pursue these maxims, and execute this project, Richard should have had his father's ability for civil and military affairs; his bravery and resolution, and, in a word, by a series of victories, should have been able to strike terror into all who could oppose his designs. But Richard had none of those great talents to command fear and respect, or to inspire his friends with hopes of a powerful protection. So, heading no party, and not having capacity to govern all, he stood exposed to their ambition and violence, without being sure of an effectual assistance when he should want it. Mean while, knowing that the bare election of his person by the council, and the addresses presented to him, were insufficient to establish his authority, he thought it expedient to have his dignity confirmed by parliament, and accordingly summoned one to meet the twenty-seventh day of January 1658-9. This parliament was to consist of two houses, namely, a house of commons, containing four hundred English, thirty Scots, and thirty Irish members; and of the Other House (it having as yet no other name) which was instead of a house of peers, and consisted chiefly of officers. They were generally men of mean extraction, and who, during the late war, had advanced themseves by military imployments.

Richard proposes an addition of new members to his council. Phillips, p. 639.

Richard had caused no alteration in his father's council; but he was immediately sensible, that this council, which was intirely directed by Oliver, was aspiring to more power under his successor. The army, on the other hand, appeared less devoted to the son than the father. Before Oliver's death, they had even began to seem less submissive, which had obliged him to remove Lambert, and some other colonels and officers, who were sowing division among the troops. His design was to make other changes, by degrees, in the army, in order to reduce them to an intire obedience, but death prevented him. He wanted no assistance nor advice for such purposes, and commonly his designs were executed before they were made public; and so well established was his authority, that no officer whatsoever retained any credit among the troops, the moment he was cashiered. This Lambert and some others had lately experienced. Richard was desirous to tread in his father's steps, but being sensible that his authority was not powerful enough, he thought he would attempt nothing, without consulting some of his principal friends. He therefore held a privy-council, in which he proposed, first, the admission of more new counsellors, to secure a majority, and make himself master of the debates, in spite of the old counsellors, who were less tractable than in his father's time. Secondly, he proposed to reduce the army to an intire dependence upon him (1).

Meets with great difficulties. Phillips.

INTER-REG. AN' 1658.

Those whom he consulted on this occasion, were self-interested, and attached to him only in hopes of governing in his name. They apprehended, the Protector's proposal might be prejudicial to themselves, and that in procuring him an absolute power, they might be the first sufferers. He therefore found a strong opposition in these pretended friends. Instead of approving his design, they advised him to call into his council two colonels, wholly devoted to the Republican party. Nor was this all; some of the leading officers of the army was informed of the Protector's designs, and that was sufficient to put them in motion. Fleetwood his brother-in-law, and Desborough his uncle, were the first who combined against him, and caballed with the officers, to deprive him of the generalship of the army, to which they were authorized by the instrument of government. But, probably, they would never have thought of exercising that power, if Richard had not discovered his intentions of becoming absolute master of the army, and puting himself in a condition not to want their assistance. However, as the army lay dispersed, and it was necessary, that the officers should consult together, and act in concert, for the preservation of their authority, and opposing the Protector's designs, a snare was laid, in which he suffered himself to be taken. It was insinuated, that the parliament which was going to sit, might prove dangerous to his authority, should they not be tractable, and therefore it was necessary to fortify himself with a good number of officers, as well to consult them, as to shew the parliament, he was supported by the army, which must certainly produce a good effect. Richard believing this advice proceeded from their zeal for his service, immediately gave orders for every regiment to send as many officers to London as could be spared. This order was punctually executed, and a great number of officers soon appeared in London, who among them formed a council, which frequently met, and assumed, the title of the "Great council of the army."

These officers formed a great council.

Beside this great council, some members of the privy-council, officers of the army, met also at Desborough's house; as well to consult how to deprive Richard of the generalship, as to manage the great council, which being composed of many inferior officers, wanted to be directed in their deliberations. The result of this council was, that Desborough, attended with several officers, waited on the Protector with a petition, "That no officer or soldier should be turned out by sentence "of a council of war: That no member of the "army should be proceeded against capitally, "otherwise than by martial law: and lastly, "That the army might have power to chuse "their own general." As nothing was more contrary to Richard's designs than this demand, he positively rejected it, and threatened even to cashier them if they brought him any more such proposals.

as had been in Oliver's laſt parliament. As there were many Republicans in the houſe of commons (1), great indeavors were uſed to ſuppreſs the other houſe, for fear of its becoming at laſt a houſe of lords, and oppoſing the re-eſtabliſhment of the commonwealth, which was the object of their moſt ardent wiſhes. The debate upon theſe two articles held two months, and it was the twenty-eighth of March, before it was reſolved, by a majority of voices, that the other houſe ſhould ſubſiſt, and the Scots and Iriſh repreſentatives continue to ſit in the houſe of commons. After that, the parliament made an act to recognize Richard Cromwell Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland (2).

While theſe things were tranſacting in parliament, the great council of officers at Fleetwood's houſe, and the private council at Deſborough's continued their conferences and deliberations. They at laſt preſented a petition to the Protector, deſiring Fleetwood for their general. This was directly depriving the Protector of the command of the forces, to which he could not conſent, without expoſing himſelf to the caprices of the principal officers, who directed the army as they pleaſed. Wherefore inſtead of returning a favorable anſwer to their petition, he gave them a ſharp reprimand, ordering them to diſſolve their council and return to their quarters. On the contrary, the houſe of commons perceiving, the officers were contriving ſome plot which might be prejudicial to the parliament, voted againſt holding a council of officers during that ſeſſion of the parliament; and moreover, that no perſon ſhould have any imploy in the army, till he had taken an oath not to diſturb the parliament's deliberations. Immediately after, theſe votes were ſent to the other houſe, now called the upper-houſe, for their concurrence. But as the officers were moſt prevalent there, they believed it no part of their duty to contradict what their comrades were doing. So, the votes of the commons were no more capable, than the orders of the Protector, to diſſipate the councils of the officers who ſtill continued to aſſemble.

At length, on the twenty-ſecond of April, Richard had notice, that the officers had reſolved to force him to diſſolve the parliament. He immediately aſſembled his council to prevent, by their advice, this attempt. Some were of opinion, that he ought abſolutely to refuſe ſuch a demand, and, as his only ſupport, adhere to the parliament. But they pointed not out the means of defending himſelf againſt the officers, who began to aſſemble in the neighborhood of Whitehall, and would probably have been too ſtrong for his guards. Others adviſed him to leave the palace and ſuffer the officers to act as they pleaſed with the parliament, without any promiſe of its diſſolution. But the officers foreſeeing he might take that courſe, had now ſeized all the avenues about Whitehall. In ſhort, every man propoſed expedients, to which others objected inſuperable difficulties. During theſe irreſolutions, Deſborough, with a ſtrong retinue, demanded an audience of the Protector, and required him, in the name of the officers, to diſſolve the parliament (3). Richard at firſt refuſed to grant this demand; but he was told, his refuſal would be attended with danger to himſelf, and that, in a word, they were reſolved to obtain, by fair means or foul, what they demanded. Finally, Richard, who, before Deſborough came, had not been able to take any reſolution, was ſtill more incapable to conſider what was to be done, after he was ſurrounded with men who ſhewed but little regard for his authority. He therefore promiſed to diſſolve the parliament by commiſſion under the great-ſeal. But as the commons, informed of what paſſed, had adjourned themſelves for three days, the parliament was diſſolved by proclamation.

From that time, Richard was no longer regarded, tho' he ſtill bore the title of Protector. The officers conſidered him as an impotent adverſary, incapable of hurting them. So he loſt on a ſudden the ſupport of the parliament, without gaining that of the army. This is what cannot be denied. But thoſe who imagine, he would have ingaged the people in his intereſts, and been ſupported by Monk and his army, had he ſtood by the parliament, build their conjecture upon a very uncertain ſuppoſition. Beſide, was it in his power to refuſe a diſſolution of the parliament, without hazarding his own life; or to ſupport himſelf, till he ſhould have received a ſufficient aid, againſt the violence of the army? Be this as it will, after the parliament was diſſolved, the great council of officers thought themſelves impowered to ſetle the government as they pleaſed, without conſulting the Protector, who was now regarded but as a private perſon (4). This anarchy however laſted only a few days, during which the officers elected Fleetwood for their general. They diſcharged alſo by their own authority five colonels, who adviſed Richard to adhere to the parliament, viz. Ingoldſby, Goffe, Whaley, lord Falconbridge brother-in-law to Richard, and Howard afterwards earl of Carliſle, and reſtored Lambert, and others, diſmiſſed by Cromwell a little before his death. After this, they conſidered of ſetling the government, it being impoſſible the preſent ſituation of affairs ſhould long continue.

Lambert, a man of immoderate ambition, would not have ſcrupled following the example of Oliver, had the juncture ſeemed favorable to him. But Fleetwood being his general, and the idol of the army, he could not hope to ſucceed in an attempt to ſeize the government. He therefore thought proper to wait a more convenient opportunity, and, in the mean time, hinder Fleetwood from puting himſelf at the head of the government, whether under the name of Protector, or any other title, to which he had ſeveral reaſons to believe he was aſpiring. Firſt, Cromwell, by an inſtrument under his own hand, had once named him for his ſucceſſor, and many believed this inſtrument had been artfully conveyed out of the way, either during Cromwell's life, or after his death, leſt it ſhould obſtruct his ſon Richard's election. It was even ſaid, that Cromwell's nomination of his ſon in the time of his illneſs, was only the contrivance of ſecretary Thurlo, and another perſon, to procure Richard the ſucceſsion. Secondly, Fleetwood was one of the moſt zealous Enthuſiaſts, of whom the army was full, and therefore looked on with veneration by the ſoldiers, and judged moſt worthy to be Cromwell's ſucceſſor. Thirdly, it was ſcarcely to be doubted, that it was the army's intereſt to chuſe a Protector, who ſhould depend on them, and in his turn ſupport their credit. This Lambert conſidered, but as it was not for his advantage to have Fleetwood raiſed to a dignity to which he himſelf aſpired, he ſecretly ingaged colonel Lilburn to cabal among the inferior officers, and break Fleetwood's meaſures, if they pointed to the Protectorſhip, while he regularly made his court to him, and indeavored by his flatteries to influence him as Cromwell had formerly done Fairfax. This example made Lambert hope, that he might by this means put himſelf one day at the head of the government.

April 29. Phillips, p. 642. Warwick. Ludlow.

Lambert's cabal being made with the greateſt ſecreſy, Fleetwood, as general, convened his officers at Wallingford-houſe to ſetle the government. All the ſuperior officers came; but at the ſame time the inferior, by the intrigues of Lambert and Lilburn, aſſembled at St. James's in much greater numbers. In this aſſembly the ſetlement of the government was likewiſe debated, and occaſion taken, to magnify the happineſs which England injoyed under the adminiſtration of the parliament, from the ſixth of December 1648, to the twentieth of April 1653, when it was diſſolved by Cromwell. Their prudence, ſteadineſs, and happy ſucceſs in England, Scotland, Ireland, and in the Dutch war were extolled, with ſome intimations of advice, that nothing could be more advantageous to the three nations, than that parliament's reſtoration (1).

The officers come to a reſolution of reſtoring the parliament diſſolved by Cromwell in 1653. May 5. Phillips, p. 643. Whitelock, p. 677. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 517. Dugdale's View.

This debate was carried no farther; but it ſufficed to convince the aſſembly at Wallingford-houſe that a diviſion between them and the inferior officers could not but be dangerous to both, and that their beſt way was to join with thoſe inferior officers in reſtoring the Long-parliament. It is not known what was the deſign of the chief officers with regard to the government, but it is certain, the propoſal of the inferior officers was contrary neither to the principles nor ſentiments of the army in general. This will be eaſily perceived, when it is conſidered, that the officers and ſoldiers, for the moſt part, were Independents, Anabaptiſts, Enthuſiaſts, Republicans, ſuch in a manner as were the members of the parliament diſſolved in 1653, and now propoſed to be reſtored. However this be, all the officers being united, declared for the Good Old Cauſe, i.e. for the cauſe ſupported by the parliament, which brought the King to the ſcaffold, and turned the Monarchy into a Commonwealth. It was therefore reſolved in a general council at Fleetwood's houſe, to reſtore the Long-parliament.

They have a mind to take ſome precautions for their ſecurity. Phillips, p. 643. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 645.

In the interim, as this parliament had no reaſon to be pleaſed with the army, which in 1653, took part with Cromwell againſt them, the great officers were afraid, that when the members were reſtored to their authority, they would think of being revenged. Beſide, they knew the reſolution and firmneſs of theſe members, who would infallibly keep the army in a ſtate of dependence. Therefore it was judged abſolutely neceſſary, by the officers, before they proceeded, to demand certain conditions, and to be previouſly aſſured of the compliance of the parliament, when they ſhould reſume their authority. To this end, they had conferences with ſome of the members, who had been the leading men in that parliament, viz. Vane, Haſlerig, Scot, Salway, ingaging them to promiſe, theſe conditions ſhould be granted. But theſe members would not make any ſuch promiſe, under color, it did not belong to them to preclude the reſolutions of the parliament. This refuſal rendered them ſuſpected to the ſuperior officers, but the inferior, being the moſt numerous, overlooked the difficulty, and were contented with a verbal promiſe from theſe four members, that they would uſe their indeavors to procure a grant of theſe conditions.

The Long Parliament reſtored.

THINGS being thus ſetled, Lambert at the head of a conſiderable number of officers (2), repaired to the houſe of Lenthal, ſpeaker of the Long-parliament, and preſented to him the declaration of the great council of officers, by which the members of the parliament, diſſolved by Cromwell, April the twentieth, 1653, were invited to return to the exerciſe of their authority. Lenthal anſwered, he would communicate the declaration to the members then in London, which he did the next day, and, the invitation being accepted, they met in parliament the ſeventh of May, to the number of only forty-two (3). Thus the three kingdoms were once more under the tyrannical dominion of a parliament, which had not feared to imbrue their hands in the blood of their Sovereign: but with this difference, that the number was reduced to the half of what it was in 1648, when the Preſbyterian members were excluded. Hence they were called in deriſion the Rump-parliament, in alluſion to a fowl all devoured but the Rump. The Preſbyterian members, who had been expelled in 1648, would have reſumed their ſeats, but none were admited beſide thoſe who had ſate, from the firſt of January 1648, to the twentieth of April 1653, and in this the pretended parliament was ſupported by the officers, whoſe intereſt it was not to ſuffer the Preſbyterians to prevail in the houſe.

When the parliament was reſtored to their authority, they ſent Clarges to Monk, to ingage his ſubmiſſion to the new government. They knew, Monk was not of their principles, and if they had dared, they would have ſent him a ſucceſſor, to govern Scotland, inſtead of requiring his acquieſcence. But Monk had ſo eſtabliſhed himſelf in that country, being maſter of the fortified places, and aſſured of the affection of the Scots and his army, it would have been dangerous to deprive him of his government againſt his will. The parliament therefore judged it more ſafe to gain him by fair means, and undermine his credit and authority in the army by degrees. The late change in England having been little foreſeen by Monk, he had not time to take any meaſures to regulate his conduct. When he ſounded his officers, he found they were pre-ingaged by letters from their friends in London. So, all he could do after the arrival of Clarges, was to acquieſce, and expreſs his ſatisfaction to ſee the parliament

The parliament's anſwer, Phillips, p. 647.

To this petition the parliament returned a general anſwer, thanking the army for their affection to the public. Then, taking it into conſideration, they approved of all the articles in general, but appointed a particular commitee to examine thoſe which concerned the government. As to what related to Richard Cromwell and his mother, it was not to be debated, till they ſhould be aſſured of his ſubmiſſion to the government. To this end, a commitee was ſent to inform him of the reſolution of the houſe, and to require his acquieſcence in the late change. The next day, Richard delivered the following anſwer in writing:

RICHARD CROMWELL.

The parliament grants him but 20,000l. to pay his debts, and order him to quit Whitehall. Phillips. Whitelock.

When the houſe examined the account of Richard's debts, the expenſes for his father's funeral was rejected; ſo Richard was forced to pay that debt out of his inheritance, which ſwept away the greateſt part of his eſtate, it not being very large, conſidering Cromwell's advancement during his life. As to the revenue, and annual penſion deſired by the officers for Richard and his mother, the parliament refered the conſideration of them to another opportunity, contenting themſelves with aſſigning twenty thouſand pounds for the payment of his private debts (1). The members had but too much cauſe to complain of Oliver Cromwell, who had deceived and ſhamefully diſmiſſed them, to think themſelves obliged to do ſo much honor to his memory, and beſtow ſo great advantages on his widow and ſon. When they granted him the twenty thouſand pounds, they required him in ſix days to remove from Whitehall (2).

Fleetwood appointed general but for one year only. Phillips. Whitelock.

In the twelfth article of the petition of the officers, it may be obſerved, that, as they expreſſed themſelves, they did not intend to leave to the parliament the liberty of not appointing a general, or of naming any other than Fleetwood, ſince, inſtead of petitioning, they ſaid in that article, " We do una- " nimouſly acknowledge the lord Charles Fleetwood " to be commander in chief of the land-forces of " the common-wealth." The houſe conceived it not proper then to examine the manner in which this article was expreſſed, for fear of raiſing ſome difference between them and the army, at a time when they derived their authority only from the declaration of the officers who had reſtored them. Fleetwood therefore was appointed commander in chief of the land-forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland, but only for one year. This reſolution being taken, the parliament voted, That Fleetwood ſhould have power to ſign and ſeal ſuch commiſſions, for the conſtituting of officers under him, as ſhould be approved by parliament, and nominated by ſir Henry Vane, ſir Arthur Haſlerig, lieutenant-general Fleetwood, and the colonels Lambert, Deſborough, Ludlow, Berry, or the major part of them, who were made commiſſioners for that purpoſe. But upon the bill's ſecond reading, the clauſe impowering Fleetwood to ſign commiſſions was altered, and it was ordered, that all commiſſions, both to the commiſſion-officers of the army, and the captains of the fleet, ſhould be ſigned by the ſpeaker of the parliament of the common-wealth of England, to be writen by the clerks attending the council of ſtate (3), and delivered to the officers gratis by the ſpeaker, in the parliament-houſe. This was a plain indication, that the parliament pretended, the officers ſhould owe their advancement to them alone. The ſame day the houſe voted, That the government of Ireland ſhould be by commiſſioners, nominated and appointed by parliament, and not by one perſon, and that Henry Cromwell ſhould be acquainted with the order, and required forthwith to repair to the parliament. He peaceably ſubmited, tho', in all probability, if he had been inclined to reſiſt, the new governors would have found it difficult to remove him. He was extremely beloved in Ireland, both by the army, and the Engliſh inhabitants, having never injured any perſon, but, on the contrary, obliged every one, as far as lay in his power. But, doubtleſs, not thinking himſelf ſecure of ſucceſs, and receiving no orders from his brother, he was unwilling to undertake ſo important an affair. The hiſtorians are unanimous in their praiſes of him, and generally believe, that if he had been Protector inſtead of his elder brother, the officers would have met with their match, or not attempted what they undertook againſt Richard.

Contrariwiſe, the parliament believed it of the utmoſt importance, to be maſter of the army; which they flattered themſelves, would inable them to rule peaceably and abſolutely, and, without doubt, perpetuate their authority. They ſaw they were to expect a ſtrong oppoſition 'till this was done, conſidering the reſtleſs temper of the principal officers, ever ſeeking to make themſelves neceſſary, for fear of loſing their imploys. This was the firſt, and almoſt open deſign of the parliament. For this purpoſe, the commitee appointed to examine commiſſions was continued, who knowing the intentions of the houſe, made great alterations in the army, diſplacing ſuch as were ſuſpected, and ſubſtituting others of more aſſured fidelity. The ſame was done to the army commanded by Monk, and many officers being removed, others were appointed to ſucceed them, and thoſe moſt confided in by that general were diſplaced. Clarges had now acquainted Monk with the parliament's intentions, which were ſo manifeſt, and Monk had but too much cauſe to perceive them, by the alterations the commitee would have made in the army of Scotland. He wrote to the commitee ſo as to intimate, he plainly ſaw their deſign to undermine his authority. In his letter he uſed ſome expreſſions, which made the parliament apprehenſive there would be danger in driving a man to extremities, who was twelve thouſand ſtrong, and had all Scotland at his diſpoſal. For this reaſon, the officers, appointed by the commitee to go into Scotland, received orders, not to proceed on their journey. But this was only to gain time, in expectation of a more favorable opportunity.

The eighteenth of June the parliament voted a continuation of the monthly aſſeſſment of thirty-five thouſand pounds, impoſed by parliament in 1656. Conſpiracy of the Royaliſts in favor of the King. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 521. Phillips.

Mean while the parliament having received confuſed informations of a plot forming in favor of the King, the Royaliſts had orders to withdraw twenty miles from London. This intimation was groundleſs. In March this year, his Majeſty, by a declaration, had impowered commiſſioners to treat in his name with thoſe, who having been againſt him, or his father, were willing to return to his obedience. Neither pains nor promiſes were ſpared by theſe commiſſioners, to increaſe the number of the King's friends, and certainly there could not be a more favorable opportunity. All were weary of the tyranny of an Independent parliament, conſiſting of forty perſons, and of an army, whoſe officers were moſtly Fanatic, and who, under color of promoting piety, and extending the kingdom of Chriſt, had only their intereſt in view. The Preſbyterians themſelves, and the members of that party, who had been expelled the houſe in 1648, ſeeing little appearance of ever recovering the ground they had loſt, and that they yet remained expoſed to the tyranny of the Independents and Fanatics, agreed at laſt with the King's party, to deliver the nation from the ſervitude to which it was reduced. The particulars and terms of this union are not known, becauſe the hiſtorians who ſpeak of it, being all Royaliſts, have not thought fit to do ſo much honor to the Preſbyterian party. But it cannot be concealed, that from this time the Preſbyterians no longer appeared as the King's enemies, but on the contrary, as will hereafter be ſeen, very much promoted his reſtoration.

The Preſbyterians inclinable to join with them. R. Coke, p. 81.

The project of an inſurrection. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 521. Phillips, p. 649.

It was on the hopes, that the Preſbyterians would aſſiſt, or at leaſt not oppoſe them, that the Royaliſts projected an inſurrection in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in expectation it would at laſt become general. For this purpoſe, they intended to ſeize at once Gloceſter, Lynn, Plimouth, Exeter and Cheſter. They believed their meaſures ſo well concerted, that they doubted not of ſucceſs. For they ſtill relied on the people's affection for the King, in which they were ſo often miſtaken. Mr. Mordaunt croſſed the ſea, to inform the King of the project, which he thought ſo well laid, that he repaired ſecretly to Calais (1), and then to St. Malo's, to be nearer England, in caſe the plot ſucceeded. But this project vaniſhed like the reſt. Sir Richard Willis who, as I have ſaid, betrayed the King's party, informed Thurlo of it, and Thurlo the council of ſtate, who immediately put the militia into the hands of perſons of approved fidelity, and took other precautions, which invincibly obſtructed the execution of this deſign. Maſſey, taken in attempting to ſurpriſe Gloceſter, found means to eſcape. The lord Willoughby of Parham, and ſir Horatio Townſend, who were gone to the weſt (2) to ſerve the King, were arreſted and ſent to priſon. There was only ſir George Booth, who, aſſembling about four or five thouſand men, took Cheſter, and publiſhed a manifeſto againſt the tyranny of the parliament, without any mention of the King, intending to make the public believe, that the people's diſcontent was the ſole motive of his taking arms. Sir Thomas Middleton joined him with ſome troops, but theſe two united bodies were ſo inconſiderable, that Lambert, who marched againſt them by order of parliament, eaſily defeated them, and re-took Cheſter. Sir George Booth had the good fortune at firſt to eſcape, but was taken ſome days after in woman's clothes, and brought to the Tower of London. Middleton retired to a caſtle of his own, which held out but few days. It did not appear on this occaſion that the people had the King's intereſt much at heart (3).

The King's friends, during theſe tranſactions, not doubting of ſucceſs, ſent the reverend Nicolas Monk, the general's brother, into Scotland, to ingage him in the King's party. Some have reported, that Monk in hopes of his Majeſty's party prevailing in England, was upon the point of marching to ſupport them, but was ſtopped by the news of Booth's defeat, and forced to feign himſelf intirely devoted to the parliament. I cannot eaſily be perſuaded Monk ſo early thought of ſerving the King. However, it cannot be denied, that the parliament ſuſpected Monk, becauſe his principles were very far from Fanaticiſm, which then infected both parliament and army. This the parliament plainly ſhowed, immediately after Booth's and Middleton's defeat by Lambert. For judging that victory would keep Monk in awe, they readily confirmed the changes before intended in the army of Scotland. Monk was ſo offended with this proceeding, that he wrote to the ſpeaker, to deſire his diſmiſſion, but Clarges his brother-in-law prevailed with the ſpeaker not to communicate his letter to the parliament, who doubtleſs would not have failed granting his requeſt.

master of the army. Wherefore, they began to think of means to prevent this design, and maintain themselves in their credit and posts. For this purpose, before any resolution could be taken, they had several secret meetings. But one difficulty was to be surmounted. This was, that the inferior officers were very well pleased with the parliament, who greatly caressed them, intending to use them, to get rid of their commanders. Lambert, who commanded the forces about Chester, was intirely in the party of Fleetwood and Desborough, knowing, the parliament had no better intentions for him, than for others. Beside, his chief aim was to procure a perpetual confirmation of the generalship to Fleetwood, in hopes to govern and make use of him for his own advancement to that post, as Cromwell had before done to Fairfax. Tho' he was absent from London, he was informed of what passed at their meetings, and gave his advice. After many deliberations, it was at last resolved, that Lambert should indeavor gaining the inferior officers of his army, which was less difficult, than to prevail with the officers of the rest of the army, who were dispersed in different quarters. Pursuant to this resolution, Lambert coming to Derby, so managed, that his officers, whom he had carefully inspired with discontent, met to draw a petition, which, before it was offered to the parliament, was to be communicated to Fleetwood, for the approbation of the general-council of officers. Sir Arthur Haslerig having received advice that the petition was come to London, informed the commons, and told them, the army was contriving a very dangerous plot, of which it was necessary to prevent the consequences. Upon this declaration Fleetwood was examined by the parliament, whether he knew of the petition? He answered, he had a copy of it, and the original was in the hands of three officers, whom he named. Whereupon he was ordered to give notice to these officers to attend the house that afternoon with the petition, which was done, and the petition read. The stile was in the fashionable language of that time, among those who pretended to a more exalted piety. The substance of it was to this effect:

II. "That since a great many ill-affected persons, "were indeavoring to sow division in the army, "the parliament would be pleased, for the preservation of that union, wherein its greatest strength "lay, to establish firmly the lord Fleetwood in "the command of the army, whose commission "was to expire in a few months, with Lambert "for his lieutenant-general, Desborough for the "command of the horse, and Monk of the "foot."

The parliament vote against it. Phillips, p. 656. Whitelock. Ludlow.

The house, in a debate upon this petition, voted the next morning, "That to have any more general "officers in the army than are already setled by "parliament, is needless, chargeable, and dangerous to the commonwealth; and that Fleetwood "shall acquaint them with this resolve (1)."

This vote having been communicated by Fleetwood at his own house, to some officers, it was resolved, That the petition should not be insisted on, but, on the contrary, an address offered to the parliament, to profess an adherence to their authority against the common enemy, and that they would stand by them in the setlement of the commonwealth, against all disturbances whatsoever; and that this should be prepared and brought to be read, and considered by a general council of officers, to meet for that purpose, the twenty-seventh of September.

The great council of officers resolve to present another petition. Phillips, p. 656.

The preparing of this address was left to the persons who discharged their trust, in a manner little agreeable to the intention of those who ordered it, as will be seen presently. However, the address was approved in the general council of officers, by a majority of voices, and signed by two hundred and thirty, who were in and about London, but was not presented till the fifth of October. In this interval of seven or eight days, the officers sent a copy of the petition to general Monk for his concurrence, tho' they were resolved not to stay for his answer. On the other hand, the parliament took all possible precautions to hinder its being presented, whether by satisfying the army in its arrears, or by sowing division among the officers, as they knew the address was not universally approved, the visible aim whereof was, to beget a breach between the army and the parliament. But all their indeavors were fruitless. The fifth of October, Desborough, with many other officers, presented the petition to the house. It was introduced by a long preamble, pretending, That the intentions of the army were maliciously represented to the parliament by ill-affected persons, to create division between the parliament and the army; and that it was in justification of themselves, from such false accusations, that they presented this humble address, containing the four following assertions:

The parliament offended, yet returns a mild anſwer. Phillips, p. 659.

However reſpectful the terms of this addreſs might appear, the parliament were not pleaſed with the contents, it ſeeming to teach them their duty, or rather to reproach them for neglect. dependent party, and how grateful it had been to them. It was manifeſt, the officers ſought occaſion of quarrel, and the parliament was but too ſenſible of it. But they had no ſupport againſt the army, and the hopes of diviſion among the officers, becauſe many oppoſed the preſenting this addreſs, was their only reſourſe. For this reaſon, after ſome members had warmly inveighed againſt the officers inſolence, the houſe, however, returned a moderate anſwer, to gain time, and keep thoſe in temper whom they were unable to reſiſt. The officers therefore, who had delivered the addreſs, were called in and thanked by the ſpeaker, for their affection and faithfulneſs to the parliament; to which he added, that the parliament had already taken into conſideration the relief of the maimed ſoldiers, orphans, and widows; and had alſo ſetled a way for ſatisfaction of the arrears due to the army, and would indeavor ſpeedily effecting it.

The officers diſtruſtful of the parliament. Phillips, p. 659.

Deſborough brought this anſwer to the general council of officers, who aſſembled that day. But as they were informed of the ſpeeches againſt them in the houſe, it was ſuſpected, that the parliament intended only to gain time, in order to ſtrengthen themſelves, or change the conſtitution of the army. Wherefore, they reſolved to cauſe their addreſs to be ſigned by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to write to them on that ſubject, which was done the ſame day.

Monk writes ſubmiſſively to the parliament. Skinner.

The parliament, two days after, receiving a letter from Monk, with aſſurances of his intire obedience, returned him a gracious anſwer, leting him know the high eſteem they had of his ſervices, with a promiſe to revoke all the orders which might have given him any cauſe of diſguſt. Both theſe parties thought it of great importance to gain Monk to their intereſt. The hopes the parliament conceived of that general's good diſpoſition in their favor, gave them a little more firmneſs than they had at firſt ſhown. So, in their debates upon the propoſals of the officers, a particular anſwer was returned to each article, and the officers given to underſtand, that their complaints were cauſeleſs, and the parliament neither obliged nor pleaſed to give them an account of their conduct. This anſwer convinced the officers, that matters were come to ſuch a height, that they were either to ſubmit to the parliament, or indeavor a diſſolution. But this ſubmiſſion they could not reſolve on, without trying firſt to render themſelves ſuperior. To this end, Lambert marched his brigade towards London, and there appeared himſelf to ſupport his friends. The parliament, on their ſide ſeeing a breach with the army not very remote, haſtily paſſed an act, to declare it high-treaſon to levy money upon the people, without the conſent of parliament. Herein their aim was to hinder the army's ſubſiſtence. They did ſtill more: for Monk the clergyman being arrived from Scotland, with aſſurances from his brother, the general, of his ſupporting the parliament, and marching to their aſſiſtance, if required, Lambert, Deſborough, and ſome other principal officers, who had ſigned the addreſs, were caſhiered. They then annulled Fleetwood's commiſſion, and named commiſſioners (1) for the government of the army, from the eleventh of October to the twenty-ſecond of February. But theſe proceedings not being ſupported with power, the officers, with ſcorn, received the parliament's orders.

Mean while, the council of ſtate, being informed that Lambert was aſſembling the army, ordered two regiments to Weſtminſter to guard the parliament, whoſe colonels and officers were devoted to them, and had refuſed to ſign the addreſs. This did not prevent Lambert from executing his deſign. Having drawn ſome regiments into London, on the thirteenth of October he ſecured all the avenues to the parliament (2). Immediately after, the ſpeaker going to the houſe in his coach, was ſtoped by Lambert, and forced to return. He then ordered the colonels of the two regiments in Palace-yard to retire to their quarters, which they refuſing to do, he ſmilingly bid them ſtay there as long as they pleaſed. But at the ſame time, he took care to ſtop thoſe members who were going to the houſe, and hindered them entering (3). So the parliament, as well for want of a ſufficient number of members, as for the abſenſe of the ſpeaker, not being able to ſit that day, the two regiments placed at Weſtminſter to ſecure them from violence retired, after having remained there till night. No ſooner were they gone, but Fleetwood ſeized their poſts, and placed a ſtrong guard at the door of the parliament-houſe, to retard the members aſſembling. Next day, the diſcontented officers, by their own authority, caſhiered thoſe of the two regiments appointed to guard the parliament, and ſent others to fill their places. The ſoldiers obeyed their new officers, and abandoned the old.

Ten days this ANARCHY laſted, before the officers, now grown ſuperior, thought of ſetling any form of government. All they did, was to nominate ten of their own body to form a council, to take care of the moſt urgent affairs. Then they declared Fleetwood their general, Lambert their lieutenant-general, and Deſborough commiſſary-general of the horſe. They eſtabliſhed likewiſe a council of ſeven to nominate ſuch officers as were not ſuſpected, with orders to exclude thoſe, in whom they could not confide. Mean time a diſcipline ſo exact was obſerved by the troops, that it was wonderful to ſee ſoldiers ſo ſubmiſſive to their officers, and ſo inoffenſive to the people during ſuch an Anarchy. The ſuſpicion the officers entertained of Monk, gave them great uneaſineſs, becauſe he was not of their principles, and beſide, was an enemy to Lambert; they therefore ſent colonel Cobbet to indeavor gaining him to their party, with ſecret orders, in caſe he could not ſucceed to try corrupting his troops, and, if poſſible, put him under an arreſt. Clarges gave Monk intelligence of Cobbet's ſecret commiſſion.

received no advantage from that treaty, had he arrived at the begining. Nay, it is difficult to conceive, what advantages he propoſed to himſelf from this journey, nor has the earl of Clarendon thought fit to inform his readers. Don Lewis de Haro, prime miniſter of Spain, received him very civilly, and expreſſed a ſenſe of his unhappy condition, by making him a preſent of ſeven thouſand piſtoles. But Cardinal Mazarine, for fear of rendering himſelf ſuſpected to the parliament, would not ſo much as ſee him. MEAN time, the great council of officers held frequent aſſemblies in London, to indeavor at ſome ſetlement of the government, which could not be in greater confuſion than at preſent. At laſt, on the twenty-ſixth of October, thirteen days after the diſperſion of the parliament, they agreed to eſtabliſh a Commitee of Safety (1), and put the government into their hands. Sir Henry Vane, who, ſince the laſt change, had come into the meaſures of the army, was of this commitee, with Fleetwood, Lambert, Deſborough, Ludlow, &c. The great-council of officers, as ſole ſovereign then of the three kingdoms, authorized this commitee to execute all the powers of the late council of ſtate, with authority to puniſh delinquents concerned in the late conſpiracy: to give indemnity to all who had acted for the commonwealth ſince the year 1649: to oppoſe and ſuppreſs all rebellions and inſurrections: to diſpoſe of all places of truſt that were void, and remove ſuch as were ſcandalous: [to treat with foreign States: to raiſe the militia:] and laſtly, to make ſale and compoſition for the eſtates of delinquents.

The declaration of the council of officers.

At the ſame time, a declaration was publiſhed, to annul the acts or orders of the parliament, of the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth of October. In this paper the officers declared, that they had no deſign to erect a military government, but had already lodged the executive part in a Commitee of Safety, who were to prepare ſuch a form of government as might beſt comport with a free ſtate and commonwealth, without a ſingle perſon, Kingſhip, or houſe of lords. This declaration ended with ſome ſcriptural expreſſions, adapted to the taſte and practiſe of the godly party.

While the officers ruled in England, Monk was greatly imbaraſſed in Scotland. He was indeed at the head of the government, and of twelve thouſand men, moſt of whom he could rely on, tho' many of the officers were Fanatics, or inclined to be ſo, and conſequently juſtly ſuſpected by him. But this army was ſupported by money regularly paid from England, Scotland being unable to maintain them. Monk had thereby been able to keep the army under ſtrict diſcipline, and to procure Scotland a tranquillity, to which ſhe had long been a ſtranger, tho' the clergy were diſſatisfied with the liberty of conſcience granted to all, Catholics and Prelatiſts excepted. The forts erected by Monk in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, and well gariſoned by him, prevented all inſurrections. The changes in England ſince Cromwell's death, diſturbed Monk's peaceable ſtate in Scotland. For tho' he was equally careſſed by the army and parliament, becauſe they either wanted or feared him, he perceived, that on which ſide ſoever the advantage ſhould turn, he was to be the victim. He had already experienced it in the parliament's indeavors to undermine his credit, and could not doubt, if that parliament had ſubſiſted, he ſhould have been, by one means or other, diſplaced, becauſe he was feared. On the contrary, his hopes were no better from the army, which was properly commanded by Lambert, under the name of Fleetwood. Lambert conſidered Monk as a formidable rival, who would never ſuffer him to execute his deſigns, if it was in his power to prevent him (2). Monk, for his part, would never have been willing to ſubmit to Lambert. Of taking one of theſe two courſes he was under an abſolute neceſſity. A neutrality would have expoſed him to the danger of being ſacrificed by both, if they ſhould be reconciled, which was not impoſſible. Beſide, on ſuch occaſions, the victorious party never thinks any great regard due to the neutral. In fine, a neutrality would have intirely deprived him of the ſupplies received from England for the ſubſiſtence of his army. He therefore determined to ſide with the parliament, and, without any evaſion, ſent his reſolution to Fleetwood. To this end, he prepared for a ſpeedy march into England with the beſt part of his army.

Reſolves to march into England.

Motives of this reſolution.

When this reſolution is conſidered, it is difficult to believe, that Monk could take it, without being influenced by other motives than what at firſt ſight appear. Firſt, he had no cauſe to be pleaſed with this parliament, nor is it ſeen what intereſt, either public or private, he could have, to reſtore a parliament generally hated, and which had been always diſtruſtful of him. Secondly, Monk had joined with the Republicans only to free himſelf from confinement. Thirdly, tho' he had twelve thouſand men, he could, at moſt, take with him but half, unleſs he would give the Scots opportunity to ſhake off the Engliſh yoke. How therefore could he venture to go with five or ſix thouſand men, to incounter an army ſtronger than his own? Laſtly, The people of England hitherto had declared for neither parliament nor army, but equally hated both. Monk therefore could not expect the peoples aſſiſtance, to reſtore a parliament which had ever held them in ſervitude. This was not at leaſt, the intereſt of the Royaliſts or Preſbyterians, who properly were the body of the nation; there being but very few who were really attached to the parliament or the army, tho' fear compelled them to obedience: and, by the way, the ſmall intereſt which the parliament had in the boroughs and counties, was the true reaſon why they never filled the vacant ſeats, becauſe they could not be aſſured ſuch members would be choſen as they deſired. Theſe are the conſiderations which naturally create a belief, that Monk, when he reſolved to march into England, under color of re-eſtabliſhing the parliament, ſecretly intended to ſerve and reſtore the King. This is almoſt univerſally agreed. But it is not equally clear what was his plan, or his means to accompliſh ſuch a deſign. If the Royaliſt authors are to be credited, he marched into England with only five thouſand men; and the terror of that army, joined to the nation's wiſhes, and Monk's prudent conduct, produced this happy reſtoration. All this is true, but not the whole truth; party-intereſt having obliged the hiſtorians to conceal, or ſpeak confuſedly of ſome things. For my part, I ſhall give my opinion, and leave it to the judgment of the unprejudiced reader. I own, I cannot ſupport it with the clear and undeniable teſtimony of the hiſtorians of thoſe times. But I think, I can ground it upon ſomething ſtronger than the teſtimony of thoſe hiſtorians; I mean, upon the facts themſelves, and general Monk's whole conduct. The reader will judge of it hereafter.

His plan in order to the King's reſtoration.

Since the Preſbyterians had been expelled from the parliament in 1648, they had been kept extremely low, becauſe their number ever rendered them formidable to the Independent parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell. They had never been able to recover their ſeats in parliament, a few only excepted, who had thruſt themſelves in by a diſſimulation, which nevertheleſs, as appears in Ludlow's Memoirs, could not deceive the Independents. Sir William Waller, one of their generals, was not in condition to head an army, and Maſſey had eſpouſed the King's cauſe. So, having nothing more to ſay in the parliament, and wanting a leader to head them, they had remained in ſubjection to the Independent parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell, without any likelihood of reviving their humbled party. They had for enemies Cromwell, the army, the parliament, the Royaliſts, and were in no places of truſt which might give them credit. We have already ſeen, that being weary of this ſituation, they had diſcovered an inclination to unite with the King's party, or at leaſt ſhewn, that they ſhould not be diſpleaſed with the good ſucceſs of that party's deſign for an inſurrection in ſeveral parts of the nation. The miſcarriage of that undertaking was doubtleſs the reaſon the union was carried no farther. Nevertheleſs, Monk knowing the diſpoſition of the Preſbyterians, imployed, in all likelihood, Clarges his confident, to make a ſecret agreement with ſome of their chiefs for reſtoring the King by their means. The ſcheme projected for that purpoſe, and which without the Preſbyterians could not be executed was, as appears by the ſequel, briefly this:

Ludlow. Vol. II.

No doubt Monk ingaged to march into England and reſtore the Rump-parliament, diſperſed by the officers. This was the firſt ſtep he was to take. The parliament being reſtored, Monk was to join with the city of London, wholly Preſbyterian, and demand, that the members expelled in 1648, might reſume their ſeats, or, if the Rump refuſed to admit them, to introduce them by force. The number of theſe reſtored members could not but have a great majority in the houſe, and compoſe properly a Preſbyterian parliament. It was agreed, that this parliament ſhould diſſolve itſelf, after ſummoning another free parliament, compoſed, agreeably to the ancient conſtitution, of a houſe of lords and a houſe of commons. This new parliament muſt have naturally conſiſted of Royaliſts and Preſbyterians (the Independents having too little credit to carry any elections) and was to reſtore the King, to which the Preſbyterians ſhould conſent. 'Tis very likely theſe laſt ſtipulated ſome conditions, the particulars whereof are not known. It cannot however be doubted, that there were conditions, ſince, after the reſtoration of Charles II, they complained bitterly of breach of promiſe. This alſo appears in that, to vindicate Charles II, for not keeping his word with the Preſbyterians, 'tis pretended, it was not in his power to diſpenſe with the laws, and conſequently his promiſe was void. This was the ſcheme for reſtoring the King, which, as will hereafter be ſeen, was cloſely purſued. If, Monk on ſome occaſion, ſeemed to ſwerve from it, 'twas becauſe he believed diſſimulation abſolutely neceſſary, and that he could not diſcover his intention without danger of rendering the project abortive. It was to be done on a ſudden, and under other pretenſes, before the enemies to Royalty ſhould have time to oppoſe. Therefore he could not uſe more proper inſtruments than the Preſbyterians, who were little ſuſpected of deſiring the King's reſtoration. But the hiſtorians are unwilling to allow the Preſbyterians any ſhare in this unexpected event, tho' they are forced in ſome meaſure to follow, in their writings, the ſcheme I have explained. They are contented to inſinate, that this reſtoration was owing to the prayers of the people, as if the Preſbyterians had not been a conſiderable, and perhaps a major part of them. This ſcheme being ſuppoſed, all difficulties will vaniſh, and Monk's proceedings appear natural, as well as the conſequences. But if it be ſuppoſed, that Monk reſtored the Preſbyterian members, expelled from the parliament in 1648, without any previous agreement, it can never be conceived, that he ſhould think the re-eſtabliſhment of a Preſbyterian parliament neceſſary, in order to place the King on the throne, without any conditions.

INTER-REG. AN' 1659.

The Preſbyterians contribute to the King's reſtoration.

The firſt thing the commitee of ſafety, lately eſtabliſhed by the general council of officers did, was the ſending Clarges to Monk, to bring him to ſome agreement. They were not ignorant of the error commited by the officers, in uſurping the ſovereign power, without the approbation of a general at the head of twelve thouſand men, and would have gladly repaired it. But they could not chuſe a worſe meſſenger than Clarges, whoſe ſole aim was to ſerve the King, and who, probably, had ingaged monk in the ſame deſign.

The commitee of ſafety ſend Clarges to Monk, to propoſe an accommodation. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 546. Heath.

In the interim, Monk was preparing with all poſſible diligence for his expedition, tho' not without ſeveral obſtacles. 1. His army being diſperſed thro' all Scotland, required, at leaſt, ſix weeks to draw them together. 2. Ready money was to be provided for their ſupport, becauſe he expected no more from England. For this purpoſe, the taxes were to be anticipated, and even extraordinary ſupplies obtained of the Scots. 3. In his troops were ſome officers, on whoſe fidelity he had no dependence. 4. In ſhort, it was abſolutely neceſſary to his deſign, to have ſome towns on the frontiers of England, to facilitate his entrance, as he knew that Lambert was marching to oppoſe him. All theſe difficulties were happily ſurmounted, except the firſt, becauſe of the remoteneſs of his forces. As to the reſt, he began with caſhiering ſeveral of his ſuſpected officers, and ſubſtituting others in their room. He kept thoſe whom the parliament had diſplaced, and whoſe ſucceſſors were not yet come. He then ſummoned to Edinburgh the officers of the neareſt regiments, and imparting to them his deſign of marching into England, to reſtore the parliament, had the ſatisfaction of meeting with their concurrence. This done, he found means to ſecure Berwick, and arreſt colonel Cobbet who was there, and whoſe ſecret inſtructions were told him by Clarges. Cobbet was ſent to Edinburgh, and there impriſoned. Monk alſo attempted to ſurprize Newcaſtle, but was diſappointed. As to the money he wanted, he raiſed as much as was poſſible, and while his army was aſſembling, ſollicited the Scots for an extraordinary ſupply.

While Monk was making theſe preparations, Clarges his brother-in-law arrived in Scotland, with a propoſal for a treaty with the commitee of ſafety. It was reſolved between them to accept the propoſal, not with deſign to conclude the treaty, treaty, but to gain time till Monk's army was ready (1). Agreeably to this reſolution, Monk, with the conſent of his officers, made choice of colonel Wilks, lieutenant-colonel Cloberry, and major Knight to go and treat in his name with the commitee, and ſent them away with ſuch inſtructions, as he thought would raiſe inſurmountable obſtacles to the concluſion of the treaty. Theſe three commiſſioners met Lambert at York, who told them, he was ſufficiently impowered to treat with them (2). But to their demand for the parliament's reſtoration, he anſwered, his power did not extend to that article, and therefore they were obliged to go on to London.

Commiſſioners ſent to London for that purpoſe. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 546. Phillips, p. 667. Whitelock, p. 688. Ludlow.

Theſe commiſſioners, ignorant of Monk's ſecret intentions, were no ſooner at London, than they made all poſſible haſte to conclude with the commitee of ſafety, and the rather, becauſe every thing was accepted which they propoſed. So, the treaty was concluded and ſigned the fifteenth of November, to the great diſſatisfaction of Monk, whoſe aim was to prolong the negociation, and then break off. It would be needleſs to inſert the treaty, by reaſon it was never executed. I ſhall only obſerve, that by the firſt article, a vigorous oppoſition to the King's reſtoration was agreed to by both parties. Monk, upon receiving the treaty, evaded the ratification, pretending, his commiſſioners had acted contrary their inſtructions, and thereby became ſtill more ſuſpected by the commitee of ſafety.

The members of the late parliament were not idle, while Monk was preparing to march into England. They were ardently indeavoring to reeſtabliſh themſelves, and wreſt from the officers their uſurped authority, without the leaſt thought of reſtoring the King. They believed, or pretended to believe, that Monk had no other view than the reſtitution of the parliament, and, in this belief, conſidered Monk's friends as their own. This was true in general, tho' ſome of Monk's adherents in London, better informed than the reſt, knew what they were to believe. However, all the friends of the Rump united to ſupport Monk's deſigns, imagining, the reſtoring the parliament was his ſole intention. For that reaſon, the members who had formed the council of ſtate, before the interruption of the parliament, being privately aſſembled, ſent Monk a commiſſion, conſtituting him general of the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

On the other hand, the governor of Portſmouth *, Monk's particular friend, declared for the parliament, and received into his garriſon Haſlerig, Walton, and Morley, three members of the houſe, the moſt inſenſed againſt the army. The commitee of ſafety, upon the firſt notice of this defection, ſent a detachment of the army to block up Portſmouth, but the ſoldiers deſerted their officers, declared for the parliament, and were received into Portſmouth as friends. Another detachment ſent from the army on the ſame errand, did almoſt the ſame thing, ſo that the commitee knew not on whom to rely. At the ſame time, Lawſon, vice-admiral, declared for the parliament againſt the army, and entered the Thames with ſeveral of his ſhips, to awe the commitee's adherents. Lambert, who commanded a body of the army in the North, being informed of the ill ſituation of the commitee's affairs, detached a † regiment to the aſſiſtance of his friends in London, but that regiment at St. Albans, declared for the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions, the commitee of ſafety ſeeing all this oppoſition, ſeemed diſcouraged. They took no meaſures for their own preſervation, and inſtead of aſſembling the army, ſuffered it to be diſperſed into quarters. It is likely, they feared to ſee the army together, ſince the ſoldiers of the two detaehments ſent to Portſmouth had deſerted. Mean while, Haſlerig, Walton, and Morley, finding themſelves ſufficiently ſtrengthened by the ſoldiers of the army, which had retired to Portſmouth, marched at the head of theſe troops towards London. Then it was that Fleetwood, and the reſt of the commitee of ſafety, were in the utmoſt perplexity. They durſt not truſt their own ſoldiers, and knew not what courſe to take. Whitelock, as appears in his Memorials, adviſed Fleetwood either to head the army, or agree with the King (3). He ſeemed to approve of this laſt courſe, but altering his mind, did neither. At laſt, his collegues and himſelf wanting capacity and reſolution to extricate themſelves out of ſuch an emergency, conſented to the meeting of the parliament, and voluntarily reſigned their uſurped authority. They had no ſooner given their conſent, but their whole party intirely abandoned them.

The Rump Parliament reſtored.

THUS on the twenty-ſixth of December, the parliament met peaceably, and named a commitee to govern the army in their name, and under their direction. Then they diſpatched expreſs orders to Lambert to diſperſe his forces, and ſend them into the quarters aſſigned by that ſame order. But Lambert's troops hearing the parliament was re-eſtabliſhed, had in ſome degree prevented this order, and put their general under arreſt, who was ſent priſoner to the Tower of London. At the ſame time ſir Henry Vane, and ſome other members of parliament, who had ſided with the army, were confined to their own houſes. Thus, by a revolution little expected, the firſt and moſt difficult part of Monk's undertaking, viz. the reſtitution of the parliament, was executed even before he left Scotland, and without having any other ſhare in it, than his intention to march into England (4).

The Rump reſtored, who meets the 26th of December.

Mean while, this revolution ſeemed intirely to deſtroy the hopes of the King, ſince a parliament ſo oppoſite to him was reſtored. His affairs were believed to be irrecoverably loſt. France and Spain began to think of making a firm and laſting alliance with the parliament, whereby his Majeſty would not have known where to retire for a ſubſiſtence. But tho' he himſelf feigned to be extremely afflicted, not to diſcover his ſecret, very probably, he was informed of Monk's intentions, and of the manner in which they were to be executed. (2) Monk's commiſſioners ſo far ſatisfied Lambert of the reality of Monk's intentions, that Lambert ſtoped his forces from marching northward. earl of Clarendon affirms, the King had only a very faint hope of being ſerved by Monk, in order to provide for his own ſecurity, yet I cannot believe, that Monk, however reſerved he might be to others, concealed his deſigns from the King, ſince there was no danger in the diſcovery (1).

Whitelock, p. 682. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 549.

Be this as it will, Monk before he left Scotland, by circular letters, aſſembled at Edinburgh two commiſſioners from every ſhire, and one from each borough, and communicated to them his intention of marching into England; reſcuing the parliament from the force put on them by the army, and reſtoring them to their authority. Theſe commiſſioners, who made a ſort of convention of eſtates, tho' the union of the two kingdoms denied them the name, offered Monk to increaſe his army with twenty thouſand Scots, and granted him thirty thouſand pounds * to inable him to maintain them. He accepted the money, but refuſed the troops, believing he wanted them not. Some Scotiſh writers affirm, that in diſmiſſing this aſſembly, he recommended them, to take all poſſible care in preſerving the peace and tranquility of the kingdom, and deſired them to abjure the King, and Royal family. But Gumble, who was his chaplain, and wrote his life, poſitively denies it. Thus much is certain; it was abſolutely neceſſary for him carefully to conceal his intention to ſerve the King, and his fear of betraying this ſecret, made him, on ſome occaſions, carry his diſſimulation to exceſs. He was, however, extremely ſuſpected by thoſe, who would not hear of the King's reſtoration. Theſe men were very numerous, not to mention the army, which aſſuredly had no ſuch intention, tho' unknown to them, their march was only deſigned for that purpoſe.

Armies in England. January 2. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 549. Phillips, p. 677.

On the ſecond of January 1659-60, Monk entered England with his army, and conſequently might now be informed of the Rump's re-eſtabliſhment. Some days after he received a letter from the ſpeaker, acquainting him with the late tranſactions, giving him thanks in the name of the parliament, for his kind intentions, and inſinuating, that if he thought it proper, he might not give himſelf the trouble of coming to London, ſince the parliament was in peaceable poſſeſſion of their authority: but this letter did not hinder his march.

Receives a letter from the parliament to ſtop his journey, but pays no regard to it. Ibid.

If it be conſidered, that the pretenſe he had hitherto alleged for his expedition into England, was the reſtitution of the parliament, and that he continued his march, tho' the parliament was reſtored, it will be eaſy to perceive, he had quite another motive than what was at firſt alleged. This pretenſe failing him, he was obliged to find another, and that was, to aſſiſt the parliament in reducing the army to obedience and ſubmiſſion. On his arrival at York, he found the lord Fairfax, formerly general to the parliament, at the head of ſome troops of that county, and in poſſeſſion of the city, in order to hinder the commitee of ſafety from being maſters thereof. The lord Fairfax received Monk into York without any difficulty, and they had many conferences together. Fairfax was a Preſbyterian, tho' Cromwell had made him ſubſervient to the Independents riſe. So, it would be hard to conceive what intereſt he could have in countenancing Monk's deſigns, if the Preſbyterian party had not ſecretly agreed to concur in the King's reſtoration.

Is received into York by the lord Fairfax. January 11. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 552. Phillips, p. 678. Burnet.

Whatever diſſimulation Monk had uſed, in pretending that he had no other view than to reſtore the Rump, the members of that parliament were too wiſe not to perceive, he had ſome other hidden deſign. But they heſitated between two opinions, in appearance equally probable, viz. that he intended either to advance himſelf in imitation of Cromwell, or to reſtore the King. For this reaſon, the Rump, a few days after their meeting, appointed a Council of State, conſiſting of twenty-eight members, of whom Monk was one, and ordered each counſellor to take the following oath:

The parliament ſuſpects him.

And impoſes an oath upon the members. Ibid. Whitelock, p. 683.

"I do hereby ſwear that I do renounce the pretended title of Charles Stuart, and the whole line of the late King James, and of every other perſon, as a ſingle perſon, pretending, or which ſhall pretend to the crown or government of theſe nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or any of them, and the dominions and territories belonging to them, or any of them; and that I will, by the grace and aſſiſtance of Almighty God, be true, faithful and conſtant to the parliament and commonwealth, and will oppoſe the bringing in, or ſeting up any ſingle perſon or houſe of lords, and every of them in this commonwealth."

However, this precaution did not remove the parliament's fears with regard to Monk, who daily became more ſuſpected, notwithſtanding all his care to conceal his intentions. It was therefore reſolved to ſend two of their members to him, under pretenſe of doing him honor, but in reality, to obſerve his proceedings. Scot and Robinſon were named, who found him at Leiceſter the twenty-ſecond of January (2). In this (3) he received alſo commiſſioners from London, with an addreſs, to deſire the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members in the year 1648. Scot one of the commiſſioners from the parliament, interrupted the London commiſſioner, who was reading the addreſs, and commanded him ſilence, looking upon this propoſal as tending directly to the deſtruction of the Republican parliament. Nevertheleſs, Monk received the addreſs. As he continued his march, he had many ſuch preſented him, ſo that it ſeemed the general ſenſe of the nation, that the Preſbyterians ſhould reſume the reins of government. Let us here reflect a little on this extraordinary change.

Monk receives an addreſs from London for the reſtitution of the ſecluded members. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 555. Phillips, p. 681.

Doubtleſs the ſecluded members in 1648 were Preſbyterians, who had, on all occaſions, ſhewn an extreme zeal againſt the King and church of England. If they had teſtified a deſire to reſtore the late King by the treaty of Newport, this was owing to conditions, which he looked upon as intolerable, and which neceſſity alone compelled him to grant. Nay, the parliament could not reſolve to allow ſome reſtrictions deſired by his Majeſty to their demands. If they voted that the King's conceſſions might ſerve for foundation to a peace, it was at a time when the army was in London, ready the next day to execute the violence which was acted. This party therefore cannot be conſidered as having been, at any time, favorable to Charles I. Since the ſixth of December 1648, they had been greatly ſubjected; the Royaliſts, Parliament, Protector, and army, having conſtantly been their enemies, ſo that they had no power: and yet, during Monk's march, this party not only revives, but even became ſuperior to all the reſt, and the whole nation ſeemed conſpiring to reſtore them the ſupreme authority, in demanding the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members in 1648. What could be the motive of ſo great a number of addreſſes on this account, preſented to Monk in his march? And why did Monk receive them ſo favorably? Certainly, when he left Scotland, his intention, however concealed, was to labor the King's reſtoration (1). But if the Preſbyterians had not ingaged to favor this reſtoration, the raiſing their party, and puting them in poſſeſſion of the government, would have been a very unlikely means for its accompliſhment. All that Monk could thereby gain, was, the King's reſtoration, on the ſame terms which his father had granted in the treaty of Newport, which was, doubtleſs, very far from his intention. Let us therefore conclude, that all theſe addreſſes were an effect, or conſequence of a ſecret agreement between the Royaliſts and Preſbyterians, whereby theſe laſt had conſented to his Majeſty's reſtoration, on conditions relating to their religion alone, without inſiſting, as they had before conſtantly done, on any terms relating to government. Without this ſuppoſition, the ſteps, afterwards taken for the King's reſtoration, can never be conceived, and, with it, all the proceedings are natural.

Burnet, p. 85.

Monk's diſſimulation.

This agreement was a ſecret carefully to be concealed, leſt its diſcovery ſhould produce an accommodation between the parliament and the army, in which caſe Monk, who had but five thouſand men, would have been little able to ſucceed in his deſigns. Wherefore, tho' he received all the addreſſes, he was very careful not to expreſs the leaſt ſigns of approbation, but contented himſelf with a general anſwer, ſaying, they ſhould be laid before the parliament (2).

The reaſon of it. Skinner. Phillips. p. 679.

Monk, as aforeſaid, had but five thouſand men (3). With this army it was impoſſible to withſtand the other, which was three times as numerous, and of which ſeveral regiments were now in London. If the parliament and army could have united together, they would, doubtleſs, have rendered all Monk's projects impracticable. But the parliament was ſtill more jealous of their own army than of Monk. They only ſuſpected that general of having ſecret deſigns, without knowing directly wherein they conſiſted. But it could not be doubted, that the general-officers of the army would become maſters, if their aſſiſtance was neceſſary. Therefore it was Monk's intereſt to foment this diſ-union, and how could he more ſucceſsfully do it, than by profeſſing an intire devotion to the parliament. He thereby removed from the parliament all thoughts of an union with the army, which appeared unneceſſary, while Monk's fidelity could be relied on. This was the true reaſon of Monk's extreme diſſimultation, and of his pretending, on all occaſions, that his march to London was only to ſerve and obey the parliament.

Demands that the forces in London withdraw to make room for him. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 555. Phillips. p. 680. R. Coke. Skinner.

When he came to St. Albans, within twenty miles of London, he wrote to the parliament, deſiring that the regiments in the city might be ſent to more diſtant quarters, it not being convenient, that troops which had ſo lately been in rebellion, ſhould mix with thoſe which were intirely devoted to the parliament, and come to offer their ſervice. With this letter he ſent the manner in which his ſoldiers might be lodged in London, and the quarters that might be aſſigned to the regiments which were to be removed. Tho' this demand was ſuſpected by many members to have in it ſome myſtery, it was however granted by a majority of voices, and the regiments in the city were ordered to withdraw. This ſhews, either that Fleetwood and Deſborough were no great politicians, if they did not ſee Monk's demand tended to make himſelf maſter of the city and parliament, or that they believed they had not a ſufficient influence over their inferior officers, to venture oppoſing it. It ſeems, they could reſolve nothing without Lambert, who was now priſoner in the Tower.

Refuſes the abjuration oath. Ibid.

However this be, Monk artfully improving the diviſion between the parliament and army, entered London, in triumph, the third of February 1659-60. After he had given orders for quartering his troops, he repaired to the council of ſtate, who immediately tendered him the abjuration-oath, to the taking of which all members were obliged. But he begged time to reſolve, ſaying, he had been informed ſtrong objections had been made to this oath, even in the parliament itſelf. Upon this refuſal he was denied admitance into the council, till he had taken the oath, and was obliged to withdraw.

The ſixth of February he went to the parliament, where by the mouth of the ſpeaker, he received the compliments and thanks of the houſe; to which he returned the ſubſequent anſwer:

Mr. Speaker,

"AMong the many mercies of God to theſe poor nations, your peaceable reſtitution is not the leaſt. It is (as you ſaid) his work alone, and to him belongs the glory of it; and I eſteem it as a great effect of his goodneſs to me, that he was pleaſed to make me, among many worthier in your ſervice, ſome way inſtrumental in it. To which I commonly anſwered, that you are now in a free parliament; and if there be any force remaining upon you, I would indeavor to remove it; and that you had voted to fill up your houſe, and then you would be a full parliament alſo; and that you had already determined your ſiting: and for the miniſtry, their maintenance, the laws, and univerſities, you had largely declared concerning them in your laſt declaration; and I was confident you would adhere to it: but as for

This ſpeech was not agreeable to all; ſome members complained, Monk ſpoke too poſitively, and aſſumed too great an authority: that he affected a popularity, which juſtly gave room for ſuſpicion: that he ingaged for the fidelity of the Iriſh officers, which, however, was to be doubted: In ſhort, that in ſaying, the Cavaliers were not yet to have a ſhare in the government, he gave that party hopes of being one day admited.

The city of London refuſe the payment of taxes. Phillips, p. 684. Skinner. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 824.

The parliament, two days after, had occaſion to try Monk's fidelity, and be aſſured, whether he was ſo devoted to their intereſt as he would have it appear. The common-council of the city of London, aſſembling the ſeventh of February, reſolved to pay no more taxes till the parliament was filled (1). They knew Monk's deſign was to reſtore the ſecluded members in 1648, and, doubtleſs, thought by this reſolution to advance the affair. They had nothing to fear from Monk, and knew the parliament would not recall the regiments which were removed from London, to force the city to obedience.

Monk ordered by the parliament to chaſtiſe the city for its inſolenſe. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 557. Phillips. p. 648. R. Coke. Whitelock.

Upon advice of this reſolution, the parliament ordered Monk to lead his army into the city, ſeize eleven members of the common-council, and pull down the chains, gates, and portcullices. Monk inſtantly obeyed the order (2). He aſſembled his forces, entered the city, and arreſted the eleven members of the common-council. Then he wrote to the parliament an account of his proceedings, praying them withal to moderate their rigor, with reſpect to the gates and portcullices. But the parliament, whether thro' animoſity againſt the city, or a farther trial of Monk's fidelity, and perhaps to ingage him in an irreconcileable quarrel with the city, inſiſted on a punctual compliance with their order, and were immediately obeyed. After this, he returned with his troops to Whitehall, which diſpleaſed the parliament, believing Monk ought not to have quited the city without their order.

The ſame, or the following day, Praiſe-God Barebone, formerly mentioned on occaſion of Oliver Cromwell's firſt parliament, preſented a petition to the houſe, ſubſcribed by many perſons, deſiring the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart might be taken by all perſons without exception, and he received the thanks of the houſe.

Monk by the remonſtrances of his friends comes to know his error in imbroiling himſelf with the city.

Monk's late proceedings aſtoniſhed both his friends and the city of London. The magiſtrates, inraged at this treatment, looked upon him as a perfidious man, who had only amuſed them with hopes of ſupporting the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members, in order to know their ſentiments, and as one abſolutely devoted to the parliament. On the other hand, his friends repreſented to him, that he was guilty of an irreparable error, in quarreling with the Londoners, who were alone able to ſupport him againſt a parliament, bent upon his ruin, whatever they might pretend. That this commiſſion was a ſnare, which had loſt him the confidence of the city, and expoſed him to the parliament's deſigns; beſide, without the aſſiſtance of London, he could never, with his ſmall army, be able to execute what he had projected (3).

Reſolves to repair it. Phillips, p. 685, 686. Skinner.

Monk, convinced by theſe reaſons, that he had carried his diſſimulation too far, thought only of repairing his error, by an open rupture with the parliament, in order to regain the eſteem of the city. He therefore ſent Clarges his confident, without loſs

But Clarges could obtain nothing from the lord-mayor, who was perſuaded that Monk was deceitful and treacherous, and fought only to deceive him. Notwithſtanding all this, Monk aſſembled his forces, with a reſolution to march once more into the city, and be reconciled to the magiſtrates, whatever might be the conſequence. At his departure, he ſent a letter to the parliament, writ with the approbation of his principal officers, complaining, "That "they gave too much countenance to Lambert, "Vane, and ſeveral who ingaged with the late "commitee of ſafety; and that they had permited "Ludlow and ſome others to ſit in their houſe, "who had been, by ſir Charles Coot, and ſome "of the Iriſh officers, accuſed of high-treaſon; "and had countenanced too much a late petition "to exclude the moſt ſober and conſcientious, "both miniſters and others, by oaths, from all "imployment and maintenance; and in fine, pe-"remptorily demanded, that by Friday next, they "would iſſue out writs to fill up their houſe; and "when filled, ſhould riſe at an appointed time, to "give place to a full and free parliament."

The parliament eaſily perceived by this letter, Monk ſought an occaſion of quarrel, which, as it was difficult to avoid, it was judged the wiſeſt courſe to vote Monk the thanks of the houſe, for his care, and that his deſires ſhould be ſatisfied without delay. At the ſame time, Scot and Robinſon were diſpatched to him with this reſolution. But, Monk was now marched into the city, and had, tho' with great difficulty, prevailed with the mayor to aſſemble the common-council that afternoon. Mean while the two commiſſioners of the parliament, having waited on Monk with the meſſage, returned with little ſatisfaction. He only told them, "All "would be well, if his letter was complied with." Upon this anſwer, the parliament voted, that the command of the army ſhould be lodged in five commiſſioners (1), of whom Monk himſelf was to be one, and that the Quorum of them ſhould be three; but when it was moved, that Monk ſhould always be one of the three, it was carried in the negative.

In the interim, Monk repairing to the common-council, made a ſpeech, in which he teſtified his concern for having accepted a commiſſion, ſo diſagreeable to the city in its execution. That he was forced to accept it, or reſign his command, which he thought proper to keep at that juncture, for the good of the city, and of the whole nation, whoſe happineſs and advantages he ſhould to the utmoſt of his power always promote. To give an unqueſtionable proof of his ſincerity, he communicated to the council his letter to the parliament, and anſwer to the two commiſſioners. As theſe laſt proofs were convincing, the council was appeaſed, and Monk looked upon as a friend come to their relief, notwithſtanding the tranſactions of the foregoing day. When the news of this reconciliation was diſperſed thro' the city, it was followed with ringing of bells and bone-fires in every ſtreet, at which numberleſs rumps were roaſted in contempt of the parliament (2). The Council of State, ſome days after, ſent to deſire Monk to come and aſſiſt them with his counſels, in regulating the national affairs: but he did not think fit to expoſe himſelf to this danger. He anſwered, that the inhabitants of London were ſo diſſatisfied, that his preſenſe was abſolutely neceſſary in the city, to keep them in awe. On the other hand, the lord-mayor and aldermen conjured him to ſtay in the city, acquainting him, that the parliament was ſecretly indeavoring to corrupt his army, and that ſir Arthur Haſlerig had written to ſeveral perſons in London to that end; ſo Monk took care to avoid this ſnare.

Monk being required by the council of ſtate to aſſiſt in their deliberations, refuſes. Phillips, p. 677.

Since Monk's union with the city, addreſſes for the re-admiſſion of the ſecluded members were more frequent than ever. Very likely, emiſſaries were diſperſed in ſeveral quarters, to incite the people to offer theſe petitions, which were always favorably received by Monk, it being neceſſary for him to ſupport his deſigns by the general inclination of the people. He knew what uſe was to be made of a Preſbyterian parliament, tho' many who ſigned the petitions imagined, that Preſbyterianiſm was going to have the aſcendancy.

Monk receives great numbers of petitions for the re-eſtabliſhment of the excluded members. Phillips, p. 687. Whitelock.

At laſt, on the eighteenth of February, Monk ſo managed that ſome of the ſiting members had a conference with ſome of the ſecluded, concerning their re-admiſſion. He wiſhed this might be done by common conſent. But the conference proved fruitleſs, becauſe the ſiting members could not, or would not, undertake for the parliament's accepting the conditions which might be agreed on. They were for leaving that to the determination of the parliament, who, doubtleſs, would have found means to prolong the affair. But Monk found himſelf indiſpenſably obliged to bring it to a ſpeedy concluſion, leſt a delay might produce an agreement between the army and parliament. This union was ſo natural, in the extremity to which the parliament affairs were reduced, that it is aſtoniſhing no indeavors were uſed to procure it. At leaſt, hiſtory is ſilent upon this head. So Monk, deſirous to improve ſo favorable an opportunity, reſolved to introduce the ſecluded members into the houſe, in ſpite of thoſe who were then ſiting. But as this could not be done without the army's aſſiſtance, he aſſembled his officers, to acquaint them with his intentions. All conſented, on certain conditions relating to their own intereſts, and which were poſitively promiſed. Then Monk made the ſecluded members ingage, that after their re-admiſſion, they would diſſolve the preſent parliament, and call a free one (3).

They were ſo ſuperior in number to the Independents, that the heads of that party, after a ſhort demur among themſelves, thought fit to withdraw, and abandon their cauſe.

Acts made by the parliament during the remainder of its ſeſſion. Phillips, p. 690, &c.

This parliament continued their ſeſſion but twenty-five days, during which they did ſeveral things, plainly ſhewing they were far from being enemies to his Majeſty. Some of their proceedings ſhall here be laid together, that I may not be obliged to break the thread of the narration. 1. They annulled all votes and orders made by the parliament ſince the ſixth of December 1648, againſt the ſecluded members. 2. They releaſed all the impriſoned friends of the King, and among the reſt ſir George Booth (1). 3. They conſtituted Monk, by act of parliament, captain general of the armies of the three nations. 4. They repealed the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart, and all the Royal Family. 5. They appointed a new Council of State conſiſting of one and thirty members, moſt of them Royaliſts, and well-diſpoſed to ſerve the King (2). 6. They made great alterations in the militia of London, and the ſeveral counties, and revoked all commiſſions granted by the Republicans. 7. They abrogated the ingagement "to be "true and faithful to the commonwealth without a "King, or houſe of peers," by which the lords, who were generally the King's adherents were reſtored to their right of conſtituting a ſeparate houſe in parliament. Laſtly, they diſſolved themſelves the ſixteenth of March, after having iſſued writs for a free parliament to meet the twenty-fifth of April, who were to reſtore the King, which was no longer doubted (3). However, as ſuch a change could not pleaſe every one, after ſo long an interruption of Kingly power, the parliament, before their ſeparation, thought it ſtill neceſſary to amuſe the public, or at leaſt to leave room to doubt whether the King's reſtoration was intended. Wherefore it was voted, firſt, that no perſon ſhould be admited to any military imploy, before he had ſworn to acknowlege the lawfulneſs of taking arms againſt the late King (4). Secondly, that no perſon who had appeared in arms againſt the parliament, ſhould on this new choice be elected. In all appearance, theſe reſolutions were only taken to prevent diſturbances from the male-contents, in the interval between the two parliaments. It is at leaſt certain, that the laſt was neglected in the new elections of Repreſentatives, among whom were numbers of Royaliſts. As the non-obſervance of it was to be queſtioned by the next parliament only, ſo till they ſhould meet there could be no inquiry.

But theſe deceitful votes were not capable of impoſing on the Republicans, who ſaw but too plainly, that the King's reſtoration was reſolved. To prevent this blow which muſt cruſh them intirely, they indeavored to perſuade Monk to take upon himſelf the government, and ſupply the place of Oliver Cromwell (5), chuſing rather to acknowledge him for governor or even ſovereign, than be expoſed to the King's vengeance. Monk having conſtantly rejected this offer, they applied to Clarges to deſire him to perſuade the general to accept the government. But Clarges diſcovered their propoſal to the Council of State, who, if Monk had not interceeded, would have puniſhed them ſeverely.

The Republicans indeavor to prevail with Monk to take the government upon himſelf. Phillips, p. 693. Warwick. But without ſucceſs. Phillips, p. 693.

This project failing, they privately excited a good number of officers of their own principles to draw up a declaration, by which they ingaged to ſupport the Republican government. This declaration was brought to the general to ſign, pretending it ſhould afterwards be ſubſcribed by the whole army. But Monk excuſed himſelf, alleging this precaution was needleſs after the vote, That no adherent of the King ſhould be elected to ſerve in the inſuing parliament. But of this evaſion they made no account, knowing, that it belonged to the houſe of commons to judge of the qualifications of their members. In ſhort, as they continued to importune him, he with an air of authority, forbad them to aſſemble without his miſſion.

An ingagement of ſome officers preſented to Monk to oblige him to abjure the King. He rejects it: Phillips, p. 694.

Forbids the officers to aſſemble without leave from him.

Cardinal Mazarine being ſpeedily informed of the Engliſh tranſactions, it was not difficult for him to perceive, that Monk had ſome great deſign in view: but as he could not judge whether that general was laboring for himſelf or the King, he ordered Monſieur de Bourdeaux, the French embaſſador at London, to offer his friendſhip to Monk, and every thing in his power, whatever were his deſigns. Probably, the cardinal, who had always treated the King with neglect, was but little, if at all, deſirous of his reſtoration, and would have been glad, Monk had been ploting for himſelf (6). But in caſe Monk intended to reſtore his Majeſty, the cardinal was willing to have ſome ſhare in it, in order to make amends for his harſh uſage of the King, on ſundry occaſions. The embaſſador applying to Clarges, intimated to him, that the cardinal was ready to ſerve the general in all his undertakings, and deſired a conference with him. But tho' Monk would not abſolutely refuſe the embaſſador a viſit, he ordered Clarges to tell him, it was on condition, he ſhould

She was zealous for the reſtoration of the King, and promiſed ſir Anthony, to watch her huſband, and inform him from time to time how matters went. Upon this notice ſir Anthony ſummoned the Council of State, and before them, indirectly charging Monk with what he had learned, propoſed, That to remove all ſcruples, Monk would at that inſtant take away their commiſſions from ſuch and ſuch officers in his army, and give them to thoſe whom he named. Sir John Greenvil diſpatched to Monk from the King. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 574. Phillips, p. 695. Monk anſwered his meſſage. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 574. Phillips. Skinner.

The day after the parliament's diſſolution, ſir John Greenvil, ſent by the King to general Monk, was introduced to him in the night. He informed him, the King expected great ſervices from him, and that he would finiſh a work ſo happily begun, and even very far advanced. Monk anſwered, he was always diſpoſed to ſerve his Majeſty to the utmoſt of his power: but the troops of the two armies were yet ſo averſe to his reſtoration, that the deſign could not be kept too ſecret, becauſe a diſcoverv would give occaſion to the Republicans to overturn it. Diſſimulation therefore was yet neceſſary, till the parliament which was to meet ſhould complete the work; and, in the mean time, it ſhould be his care to model the army to the King's advantage, by the removal of the moſt ſuſpected officers. He added, the better to execute the projected deſign, it was abſolutely neceſſary for the King to prepare a declaration capable of diſpelling the fears of thoſe who were moſt guilty, and promiſe a free and general pardon to all his ſubjects, except ſuch as ſhould be exempted by parliament; and that he would conſent to any act which ſhould be preſented to him for the payment of the arrears due to the army, and for the ſetlement of public ſales and diſpoſitions of lands to officers, ſoldiers and others; as alſo for toleration or liberty of conſcience; and that no perſon ſhould be moleſted on account of his religion, who did not diſturb the public peace. Laſtly, his advice was, that the King ſhould remove in time to ſome town of the United Provinces, to prevent his being arreſted by the Spaniards, which might ruin the whole deſign, ſhould they have any ſuch intention.

Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 578.

The King punctually followed theſe inſtructions, as will be preſently ſeen, and removed from Bruſſels to Breda, not without danger of being ſtopped at Bruſſels, according to the lord Clarendon.

Monk caſhiers ſeveral officers, and ſubſtitutes others more faithful in their places. Phillips, p. 697. Burnet. April 9.

Mean while, Monk made good uſe of the time which preceded the meeting of the parliament. He diſplaced, on diverſe pretenſes, ſuch officers as were moſt ſuſpected by him, and filled their poſts with others in whom he could intirely confide. Moreover, ſome officers, by his direction, framed an ingagement, in form of an addreſs to the general, by which they promiſed a ready obedience to the orders of the parliament, when aſſembled. Monk approved this ingagement which was preſented to him, and ordered it to be ſubſcribed by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland. This gave him a pretenſe to remove ſuch as refuſed to ſign it.

An' 1660. Lambert eſcapes out of the Tower, puts himſelf at the head of ſome troops. April 9. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 567, &c. Phillips, p. 698. R. Coke. Whitelock. Ludlow, Vol. II. p. 873.

While the hopes of the King and his party were daily increaſing, an accident happened, which might have been attended with ill conſequences, had it not been ſpeedily remedied. This was Lambert's eſcape out of the Tower, and his puting himſelf at the head of ſome troops (1). As he was greatly eſteemed by the ſoldiers, it was to be feared all the Republicans, who were very numerous in the army, would declare for him. Wherefore Monk loſt not a moment to prevent this danger before the miſchief ſpread too far. Lambert having aſſembled ſome diſcontented troops at Daventry, Ingoldſby was immediately ſent againſt him, with Monk's own regiment, and ordered to take ſome other troops in his way, and give him battle. This extreme diligence did the buſineſs effectually. As Lambert had not yet time to aſſemble many troops, Ingoldſby met him the twenty-ſecond of April, thirteen days after his eſcape, defeated, and ſent him to the Tower. Thus the panic which Lambert's eſcape had difuſed into the King's party was intirely diſpelled.

A forged letter diſperſed to prevent the the King's reſtoration. Phillips, p. 699.

The Republicans, two days before the parliament met, made another attempt to prevent the King's reſtoration, by diſperſing a forged letter from Bruſſels, in which it was ſaid, that the King only waited his reſtoration, to take full vengeance on all his oppoſers. It was alſo added, that his party was preparing to put them all to the ſword. This forged letter begining to do miſchief, the lords, and others of the King's party, publiſhed a declaration, ſigned by ſeventy perſons, in which they diſavowed the intentions aſcribed to them, and proteſted, that their deſire was to live peaceably, without any thoughts of revenge on the authors of their ſufferings.

Declaration of the King's party. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 578. Phillips, p. 700.

The twenty-fifth of April the new parliament met, in two houſes, the one of lords, the other of commons, agreeably to the ancient conſtitution (2). In the houſe of lords moſt were the King's friends. In that of the commons, it was found, that many Royaliſts were elected, notwithſtanding the above-mentioned vote. Some Preſbyterians, who were not in the ſecret, had a mind to complain, and moved for an examination of the election, but were not heard. Moſt of the Preſbyterian members were no leſs zealous than the Royaliſts for the King's reſtoration, which every one wiſhed, not ſo much, perhaps, out of affection to him, as to deliver the kingdom from the dominion of the Independents and Fanatics, and from the tyranny of the army, which they had ſuffered twelve years.

But Monk declined opening the letter, till he had received the parliament's directions. Mean while, the commons having adjourned themſelves for two or three days, Greenvil applied himſelf to the lords, and preſented to them a letter from the King, with a declaration dated the fourteenth of April.

The lords voted, immediately after the reading of this declaration, " That, according to the an- " cient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the " government is, and ought to be by King, lords, " and commons."

Vote of the lords in favor of the King. Phillips, p. 703,

Then, ſir John Greenvil came to the houſe of commons, and preſented a letter to them from his Majeſty, with the ſame declaration incloſed, which was read, as well as the letter directed to general Monk to be communicated to the council of ſtate and the army. Theſe papers, which three months before, would have lain unregarded on the table, were now conſidered as convincing proofs of the King's good intentions, and ſufficient reaſons for reſtoring him to the exerciſe of the kingly power, without requiring other conditions than what he ſhould himſelf be pleaſed to grant. The commons therefore readily agreed to the vote of the lords, and ſo the King ſaw himſelf reſtored without any of the conditions which had cauſed ſo long a war, and ſo great an effuſion of blood. This is a clear evidence, either that the Royaliſts were much ſuperior in num- ber in the houſe, which nevertheleſs is not very pro- bable, or that the Preſbyterians were willing to de- ſiſt from conditions which they had not long ſince ſo ardently demanded, for certain terms relating to their religion, which had been poſitively pro- miſed, but which, as they were never performed, gave afterwards too juſt cauſe of complaint.

The commons receive a letter from the King, with the de- claration. Id. p. 703.

The com- mons concur with the lords, and the King is reſtored without any conditions.

The King being effectually recognized, by the vote of both houſes, the commons ordered, that fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be given him, ten thouſand to the duke of York, and to the duke of Gloceſter five thouſand. Theſe princes had never before been maſters of ſuch ſums (1).

Preſents made by the com- mons to the King, duke of York, and duke of Gloceſter. Whitelock. Phillips. p. 705, 706. Clarendon, Vol. III. p. 592, &c. R. Coke.

Then the commons ordered, that all the journals ſhould be ſearched, and thoſe acts and orders razed out which were inconſiſtent with the government of King, lords, and commons. The army, the navy, and the city of London prepared addreſſes to congratulate his Majeſty on his reſtoration, and to promiſe him perfect obedience, and theſe ad- dreſſes were delivered to Clarges, who undertook preſenting them to the King. The King was pro- claimed in London with great ſolemnity the eighth of May, and commiſſioners from the parliament and city departed on the eleventh to wait on him at the Hague, where he expected them. Some Preſby- terian miniſters alſo repaired thither, as well to im- print on his Majeſty a ſenſe of the ſervice lately done him by their ſect, as to found his inclinations with regard to the liberty, which they had probably ſtipulated, before they ingaged in the affair of his reſtoration. The King confirmed by word of mouth what he had promiſed by his declaration: But when they beſought him not to revive the uſe of the common-prayer in his chapel, and that the ſurplice might be diſcontinued, he warmly anſwered, " That " whilſt he gave them liberty, he would not have " his own taken from him (2)."

(2) Burnet obſerves in the Hiſtory of his own Times, that ſuch unanimity appeared in the proceedings of the parliament for the King's reſtoration, that there was not the leaſt diſpute among them, but upon one ſingle point, yet that was a very important one. Hale, afterwards the famous chief-juſtice, moved, That a commitee might be appointed to look into the propoſitions that had been made, and the conceſſions that had been offered by the late King, and from thence digeſt ſuch propoſitions, as they ſhould think fit to be ſent over to the King. This was ſeconded, but by whom the biſhop forgot. As ſuch a motion was foreſeen, Monk was inſtructed how to anſwer it: he told the houſe, That he had information of ſuch numbers of incendiaries ſtill in the kingdom, that if any delay was put to the ſending for the King, he could not anſwer for the peace either of the nation or army. And as the King was to bring neither army nor treaſure with him, either to fright or corrupt them, propoſitions might be as well offered to him when he ſhould come over; ſo he moved for ſending commiſſioners immediately. This was echoed with ſuch a ſhout over the houſe, that the motion was no more inſiſted on. And this, ſays Burnet, was indeed the great ſervice Monk did. To the King's coming in without conditions, may be well imputed all the errors of his reign, and it may be added, many miſchiefs that followed afterwards, p. 88, 89.

BOOK XXIII.

CHARLES II, Twenty-ſixth King of England ſince the Conqueſt.

Charles II.

Hopes of the ſeveral parties at the King's arrival. Burnet.

THE face of England was intirely changed at the King's arrival, and joy, pleaſures, public and private rejoicings ſucceeded to trouble, fear, and conſternation. The people were ſo wearied with the life they led for twenty years paſt, that they believed it not poſſible to be in a worſe condition. Every one rejoiced to ſee a calm after ſo long a ſtorm, and expected to injoy a tranquillity, for many years ſought in vain. The Royaliſts and Epiſcopalians were at once raiſed to the height of their wiſhes, in beholding Charles II, on the throne of his anceſtors, and the Church of England about to reſume her former luſtre. The Preſbyterians flattered themſelves, that their late ſervices for his Majeſty would at leaſt, procure them an intire liberty of conſcience, and the free exerciſe of their religion. The Republicans, Independents, and Anabaptiſts could not, indeed, hope to be reſtored to the ſtate they had injoyed ſo many years, but expected at leaſt an intire impunity, agreeably to the Breda declaration. The regicides, that is, the late King's judges, were the only perſons who could not but expect the puniſhment they juſtly deſerved, and yet, even they deſpaired not of the King's clemency, as indeed, ſuch as caſt themſelves upon it, were not wholy diſappointed. It is not therefore ſtrange that the whole kingdom ſhould reſound with joyful tranſports, and unite in receiving with loud acclamations a King, who, according to the general expectation, was to reſtore the public tranquillity and happineſs, and place all things in their natural order.

Charles II.

Extreme prepoſſeſſion in favor of the King. Idem.

Charles II, at the time of his reſtoration, was thirty years of age, tho' little known to moſt of his ſubjects, becauſe he had long lived in foreign parts. His actions in the Weſt, during his youth, where he commanded for the King his father, had not been diſtinguiſhed by any advantageous event. His conduct in Scotland, when he was called to the crown of that kingdom, had not redounded to his honor, ſince, in his declaration publiſhed there, he ſcrupled not ſacrificing the King his father to his own private intereſts. In ſhort, the battle of Worceſter had gained him no reputation, in which ſome pretend he had been too careful of his perſon, tho' others ſpeak of his valor on that occaſion with great commendation. However this be, his defeat did not contribute to raiſe his fame as a general. Nevertheleſs, his friends, with a view to his reſtoration, had publiſhed ſuch extravagant praiſes of him, and with ſuch aſſurance, that, before his arrival in England, he paſſed there for an accompliſhed Prince, indowed with all the virtues and noble qualities of a hero. This prepoſſeſſion did more miſchief to England, than all the calumnies thrown upon the laſt King. Every one was thereby almoſt equally diſpoſed to put an intire confidence in the new King, believing that a Prince of ſuch a character could never abuſe it (1). It was hoped, that content with reſtoring the government to the ſtate it was in under Queen Elizabeth, he would avoid treading in the Hyde anſwered, "He thought the King had ſo true a judgment, and ſo good nature, that when "the age of pleaſure ſhould be over, and the idleneſs of his exile turned to an obligation to mind affairs, that he would have "ſhaken of theſe intaglements." steps of his father and grand-father, without attempting to extend his prerogative. This hope was the more readily entertained, as it was not doubted, but the example of his father had made a ſtrong impreſſion on him. Hereafter it will appear, to what exceſs this confidence was carried, and what uſe Charles made of it to begin the ruin of the liberty and religion of the Engliſh, which his ſucceſſor James II had certainly accompliſhed, had not God, by a moſt wonderful revolution, blaſted his deſigns, when he thought himſelf moſt ſecure of ſucceſs.

Deſign to render the King abſolute.

The project of rendering the King abſolute, and to imploy equally for that purpoſe the aſſiſtance of Catholics and Proteſtants, begun by James I, vigorouſly purſued by Charles I, interrupted by twenty years troubles, was eagerly reſumed under Charles II. If this be not granted as the baſis of the events of this reign, I do not think it poſſible to account for the conduct of King Charles II, unleſs it be believed, that he acted by mere caprice, without principles, maxims, or any deſign, and which cannot be thought of a Prince, who had as much wit and ſenſe as any in Europe. But to theſe particulars it is not yet time to deſcend, eſpecially as it is uncertain whether this project was formed at the begining of his reign, or owing to ſome favorable junctures. At leaſt the conduct of Charles, immediately after his reſtoration, gives no occaſion to ſuſpect he had already thought of it.

The King's religion. Burnet, P. 73, 74.

Charles had, as I have ſaid, imbraced the Catholic religion, before his return into England. Some ſay, he abjured the Proteſtant religion to cardinal de Retz, before he left France the laſt time. Others pretend, it was in the year 1659, in his journey to Fontarabia, in order to procure his reſtoration, by the aſſiſtance of the two crowns of France and Spain. However this be, the ſecret, known only to the earl of Briſtol, and ſir Henry Bennet, afterwards earl of Arlington, was ſo well concealed, that the public was ignorant of it, till after the King's death, when his ſucceſſor, James II, divulged it. But at preſent, it is a thing of which there is no room to doubt. It may be affirmed, his imbracing the Catholic religion was not thro' a principle of conſcience, ſince in the whole courſe of his life, he ſhewed no ſenſe of religion. The greateſt compliment a famous author thinks proper to pay him, is, to ſay he was no Atheiſt (1). This is confirmed by the character given of him by the earl of Mulgrave, who cannot be ſuſpected of a deſign to ſlander him. His ſentiments of religion in general may be judged of, by what dr. Burnet ſays of him, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, viz. that he ſcrupled not to communicate the ſame day in two different chapels, publicly in the Proteſtant, and privately in the Popiſh. However, he loſt no opportunity, in his ſpeeches to the parliament, to boaſt of his attachment to the Proteſtant religion, and his zeal for its advancement. Such behavior, ſo unworthy of a Chriſtian, cannot but be very injurious to his memory. Accordingly, thoſe, who have moſt indeavored to palliate his failings, have not been able to deny, he was a perfect maſter of diſſimulation.

Id. p. 73.

King Charles's governing maxim. Burnet, p. 94.

Beſide this, he had a maxim not much leſs dangerous, viz. that there was neither ſincerity nor chaſtity in the world out of principle; but that ſome had the one or the other out of humor or vanity; and believed no body ſerved him out of love, and therefore he was even with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they valued him. He was extremely affable, and ſo eaſy and complaiſant, that he ſeemed to take a pleaſure in beſtowing favors, by his manner of receiving the requeſts made to him. But he forfeited at laſt the eſteem and affection of his ſubjects, who had almoſt adored him in the begining of his reign, becauſe they diſcovered how little they could depend on kind words and fair promiſes, in which to exceſs he was liberal.

Charles II. An' 1660.

His faults. Burnet. Mulgrave.

He was ſo addicted to his pleaſures, that tho' he was very capable of buſineſs, had a good judgment, quick apprehenſion, and great penetration, his miniſters could hardly prevail with him to ſuſpend his pleaſures a few hours, and attend to affairs which required ſome application. But it happened alſo, ſometimes, that when he would apply himſelf to buſineſs, he diſpatched more in one day, than his miniſters in ſeveral.

As his miſtreſſes ingaged his whole time, ſo they conſumed all his treaſures. Tho' his revenues were larger than thoſe of any of his predeceſſors, except Henry VIII, and the parliament often granted him extraordinary ſupplies, he was ever in want, becauſe he ſpent his money without meaſure or diſcretion, as he received it. This threw him upon his parliament, and, rather than break with the commons, he was obliged to promiſe what he never intended to perform.

His good qualities.

Theſe are the principal faults imputed to King Charles II. But, it cannot be denied, on the other hand, that he had many good qualities, which might have produced happy effects, had he imployed them better. His wit was lively, his conception wonderful, and his judgment exquiſite. He knew the intereſts of the ſeveral Princes of Europe, better than any of his miniſters. During his exile, he had applied himſelf to the ſtudy of phyſic and mathematics, and more particularly to navigation, and the building of ſhips, in which he had made great progreſs. With theſe indowments, he might very eaſily have governed his dominions, in a manner glorious to himſelf, and advantageous to his ſubjects, and ſo made himſelf arbiter of Europe. And yet, his reign cannot be ſaid to have redounded much to his honor, or the peoples happineſs. The reaſon is, that becauſe of his attachment to his pleaſures, and natural remiſneſs, he delivered himſelf up to the counſels of his miniſters, and particularly of his brother the duke of York, who, during this whole reign, had but too great influence on the reſolutions of the King's council, into which he found means to introduce ſuch as he believed proper for the execution of his projects, with regard to church and ſtate.

Duke of York's character.

The duke of York was of a temper more active, violent, haughty, and revengeful. He had formed a deſign of raiſing the Royal authority to a great height, and withal of reſtoring the Catholic religion in England. He never ceaſed, thro' this whole reign, purſuing theſe projects, but more eſpecially, after he was aſſured, the King his brother could not expect any legitimate children. All the principal events of this reign, depending properly upon the humor and character of theſe two Princes, I thought it neceſſary to premiſe this deſcription of them.

Great licenciouſneſs in England. Burnet.

The King was received in London with extraordinary acclamations, and it began then to be perceived, that, under color of rejoicing for the King's reſtoration, the people were throwing themſelves into a diſſoluteneſs, which would not have been indured under the Preſbyterians and Independents; but which by the ill example of the King and court, daily increaſed during this whole reign.

(1) Burnet's words are, "He ſaid once to myſelf, he was no Atheiſt, but could not think God would make a man miſerable, "only for taking a little pleaſure out of the way." Vol. I. p. 93.

CHARLES II. AN' 1660.

The King forms his council.

His Majeſty's firſt care was to eſtabliſh a council, compoſed chiefly of thoſe who had ſhewn moſt zeal or affection for himſelf, or the King his father. He received, however ſome men into it, who ſeemed naturally to have no pretenſions thereto (1). This was the effect of his policy: for it appeared, in his conduct at firſt, that his principal aim was to ſuppreſs the former troubles, in which he could not better ſucceed, than by ſecuring a perfect reliance on his promiſes, publiſhed in his Breda declaration. His intention was to ſtifle, as much as poſſible, the enmities which had ſo long divided his ſubjects, and to unite them all in an obedience to the laws, and a ſincere attachment to his perſon as their true center. He labored this for ſome time with zeal, even, as I ſaid, to the receiving into his council men, who had profeſſed themſelves his greateſt enemies. Herein he imitated his grandfather Henry IV of France; but, as will hereafter be ſeen, he was not ſuffered long to purſue this courſe.

Chancellor Hyde his firſt miniſter.

Edward Hyde lord chancellor, and ſoon after earl of Clarendon, was the King's prime miniſter, in whom, with great reaſon, he had intire confidence. But, as very viſibly appears in his hiſtory of the civil wars, he was a mortal enemy of the Preſbyterians, and conſequently, little proper to preſerve the King in his reſolution of procuring, without diſtinction, tranquillity for all his ſubjects.

The parliament called a Convention.

No ſooner was the King arrived in England, than the aſſembly, which from the twenty-fifth of April had been honored with the name of parliament, was only called the Convention, the King being unwilling to own for parliament, an aſſembly which had not been ſummoned by his writs. But this change of name was of no long continuance.

June 1.

Two days after his arrival, the King went to the houſe of lords, where he ſent for the commons, and gave the royal aſſent to three acts; the firſt was, to change the convention into a parliament (2); the ſecond, to continue the monthly tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds for three months; and the third, to continue all judicial proceedings.

Acts paſſed by the Statutes 12 Car. 2.

The parliament chiefly Preſbyterians. R. Coke.

Had the directions and orders of the foregoing parliament been followed, the preſent ſhould have admited no member, who had either ſerved the laſt or preſent King. But this order having been neglected in the elections, all who had been choſen were admited without diſtinction or examination. As the ſcheme for the King's reſtoration was intirely formed when this parliament met, the Preſbyterians, who were much ſuperior in number, did not think proper to exclude the Royaliſts, with whom they had agreed to reſtore the King. Neither was it thought proper to exclude the Republicans, nor the Regicides themſelves, who were not conſiderable enough to obſtruct the agreed on project. This parliament is therefore to be looked on as an aſſembly, where the Preſbyterians had certainly a ſuperiority of voices, and it was this parliament that reſtored the King to the throne of his anceſtors, and, during their ſhort continuance, gave him very real marks of their zeal for his ſervice, and the reeſtabliſhment of peace and tranquillity in the kingdom (3).

Principal affairs of the parliament.

The parliamentary affairs, after the King's arrival conſiſted in three principal points. The firſt was an act of pardon or indemnity for whatever had paſſed ſince the begining of the troubles. This act was abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity both of the perſons and deſcendents of thoſe who had been concerned in the troubles, and were liable, if the laws had been ſtrictly executed, to be called to an account. For as, from the year 1642, the King's party had been deemed rebels by thoſe who were in power; the King, coming to rule in his turn, might have declared rebels all who had been in arms either againſt him or his father. The queſtion of right concerning the war between the King and the parliament, remaining undecided, it was natural for him, who had the power in his hands, to explain the laws in his own favor. Contrariwiſe, it was to be feared, that rigor, on this occaſion, would kindle a new flame. Beſide, it was very difficult nicely to explain wherein conſiſted the rights of the King and thoſe of the ſubject, conſidering the arguments on both ſides, and the infinite cavils to which ſuch a diſcuſſion was liable. In ſhort, explications of this nature had occaſioned the troubles, which, if it was poſſible, were intended to be buried in eternal oblivion. It was thought therefore that the beſt means to quiet the minds of the ſubjects was, an act of indemnity for every thing tranſacted during the troubles.

CHARLES II. AN' 1660.

An act of indemnity. Phillips. Kennet's Regiſter.

The army.

The ſecond buſineſs of the parliament was, to inable the King to diſband the army. There was no reaſon for keeping on foot an army which had been the principal cauſe of the diſorders commited of late years, and which would have been ſtill capable of diſturbing the peace of the kingdom under an able leader.

The King's revenues.

The third was the ſetling his Majeſty's revenue, ſince it was abſolutely neceſſary to give him wherewithal to ſupport the government, and put him in a condition to be feared and courted. On theſe three important affairs the parliament beſtowed their firſt care, and began with the act of indemnity, as being the moſt urgent. For this purpoſe the houſe of commons ſolemnly declared, in an addreſs preſented to the King by the whole houſe, that they accepted, in the name of themſelves, and all the commons of England, the gracious pardon offered by his Majeſty in his declaration from Breda, with reference to the exempting of ſuch as ſhould be excepted in an act of pardon. The lords likewiſe preſented a petition of the like import.

Proclamation in favor of the late King's judges. June 6. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 175. Phillips. Heath.

Immediately after, the King publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that all ſuch of the late King's judges as did not ſurrender themſelves within fourteen days, ſhould be abſolutely excluded from the general pardon. Tho' by the words of this proclamation, thoſe who ſurrendered themſelves could not be aſſured of their lives, it was nevertheleſs underſtood, that the King made uſe of this artifice only to have it believed, that he would not limit the power and reſolutions of the parliament on this point, and it was not doubted that the two houſes conſidered this proclamation as a fort of pardon, at leaſt for life, to thoſe who ſhould confide in it. Twenty of the late King's judges, in conſequence of this proclamation, voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves. Others withdrew out of the kingdom, and ſome were taken in attempting to eſcape.

(1) They were thirty in all. The dukes of York and Gloceſter, ſir Edward Hyde, general Monk, admiral Montague, [earl of Sandwich] the marquis of Ormond, the marquis of Dorcheſter, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Lindſey, Berkſhire, Norwich, Mancheſter, Northumberland, St. Albans, and Leiceſter; viſcount Say; the lords Wentworth, Seymour, Colepepper, and Roberts, Denzil Holles, ſir Frederick Cornwallis, ſir George Carteret, ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, colonel Howard, Arthur Anneſley, ſir Charles Berkley, ſir Edward Nicholas, and ſir William Morrice.

(2) And to prevent all doubts and ſcruples concerning this parliament, it was inacted, That the lords and commons then ſiting at Weſtminſter, were the two houſes of parliament, and ſo ſhould be declared and adjudged to be, notwithſtanding any want of the King's writs of ſummons. Statutes, 12. Car. 2. c. 1.

(3) Burnet ſays, theſe five following perſons, all Preſbyterians, had the chief hand in the reſtoration; ſir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, afterwards earl of Shaftſbury, ſir Arthur Anneſley, afterwards earl of Angleſey, Denzil Holles, created lord Holles of Iſield, the earl of Mancheſter, and the lord Roberts. p. 96.

While

CHARLES II. AN' 1660.

While the parliament proceeded in the bill of indemnity, ſome leading Republicans, who had not been the King's judges but had exerciſed civil or military imploys during the troubles, fearing to be called to an account, demanded of the King letters of pardon under the great-ſeal, in order to ſcreen themſelves from all proſecution. His Majeſty very readily granted their requeſt, ſhewing thereby that he really intended to perform his promiſe in his Breda declaration. For he was perſuaded, there was no better way to pacify the troubles, and give his ſubjects confidence, than the exact obſervance of his word.

The Republicans demand of the King particular letters of pardon.

The fifth of July, the city of London invited the King and the two Princes his brothers, the great officers of the crown, and both houſes of parliament to an entertainment, the magnificence whereof was ſuitable to the riches of the city which gave it, and the quality of the perſons invited.

The King, his brothers, &c. dine in the city. Phillips, p. 714.

Tho' the King really intended the act of indemnity ſhould be quickly diſpatched, it met with great obſtacles in the houſe of commons with regard to the clauſes which were to be inſerted. Some were for having no regard to the Breda declaration, but for making examples of all who had moſt ardently ſupported the late uſurpation. This raiſed a ſuſpicion that the King incouraged theſe men, and intended to ſuſpend the effect of his declaration by means of the parliament, till he was revenged of his enemies. This was alſo induſtriouſly diſperſed among the people in libels, tending to deſtroy all confidence in the King's promiſes, and revive the troubles by driving to deſpair thoſe who knew themſelves moſt guilty. To diſpel therefore theſe ſuſpicions, which might have produced ill effects, the King ſent a meſſage to the houſe, to preſs them to diſpatch the act of indemnity, and to make it agreeable to his declaration from Breda. This meſſage ſo quickened the debates, that a few days after, the act paſſed the houſe of commons, and was ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.

Prepared by the commons. Phillips, p. 716.

In this bill, the houſe of commons excepted for life and eſtate, but a few of the moſt notorious and active regicides. But the lords, incited by diverſe petitions of the widows, children, and relations of perſons executed by the ſentences of the courts erected during the uſurpation, were for excepting from pardon all who had been judges in thoſe courts. His Majeſty fearing new delays from this difference of ſentiments between the two houſes, came to the houſe of lords, the twenty-ſeventh of July, and in a pathetic ſpeech, indeavored to perſuade them to paſs the bill as ſent up by the commons. He repreſented to them "that he was obliged in honor "to perform what he had promiſed in his declara- "tion; that he never thought of excepting any but "the immediate murderers of his father; That "the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom intire- "ly depended upon the performance of his pro- "miſe, "which (ſays he) if I had not made, I "am perſuaded neither I nor you had now been "here:" I pray therefore let us not deceive thoſe "who brought or permited us to come together, "and earneſtly deſire you to depart from all par- "ticular animoſities and revenge, or memory of "paſt revocations, and paſs this act without other "exceptions than of thoſe who were immediately "guilty of the murder of my father."

The King's ſpeech to the lords. Ibid. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 183.

Amendments made by the lords to the bill of the commons. Phillips, p. 717.

This ſpeech, and a meſſage ſent by the King to both houſes on the ſame ſubject, determined the lords to conform to the declaration from Breda. They therefore, with two amendments, ſent the bill to the commons. The firſt concerned twenty perſons, who by the commons bill were liable to all the penalties it ſhould pleaſe the parliament to inflict, death excepted; tho' they were not the King's judges. The lords refuſed their conſent to this clauſe (1), becauſe it was contrary to the declaration from Breda. The other amendment related to the twenty judges of the late King, who voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves upon his Majeſty's proclamation of the ſixth of June: for the lords included in the pardon, both for life and eſtate, thoſe twenty, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves from the reſt by their confidence in the King's clemency; whereas the commons were only for granting them life, leaving them liable to forfeiture of eſtates, impriſonment, baniſhment, or ſuch other penalties as the parliament ſhould think proper. This was the ſubject of ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, which in the end produced an unanimity of ſentiments, according to which the act was formed. In one of theſe conferences, chancellor Hyde declared, That being imployed in an embaſſy to Spain, he was expreſly charged by his Majeſty to avow, "That the hor- "rible murder of his father was not the act of the "parliament, or people of England, but of a very "wretched and little company of miſcreants in the "kingdom." This was ſo agreeable to the commons, that they ordered ſuch of the privy-council, as were members of the houſe, to thank the King for his juſt defenſe of the parliament and people of England. At length his Majeſty repairing to the houſe of lords the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, gave the royal aſſent to the act of indemnity, which contained in ſubſtance:

CHARLES II. AN' 1660.

Forty-nine of thoſe who had been the late King's judges, with this diſtinction, that as to the twenty who had voluntarily ſurrendered themſelves, if they were condemned, their execution ſhould be ſuſpended till the King and parliament ſhould order the ſame.

Oliver Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Pride, and one and twenty others, who were dead, were made ſubject to confiſcations, and other penalties which the King and parliament ſhould ordain.

Phelps and ſir Arthur Haſlerig were put in the ſame condition.

Hutchinſon and Laſſels were declared incapable of exerciſing any office, and condemned to one years forfeiture of the revenue of their eſtates.

Moreover it was ordained, that Oliver St. John, and ſeventeen others named in this article, ſhould be excluded from any benefit by this act, if they accepted, or executed any office in England, either eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military.

All that had given ſentence of death in any of the late illegal High-courts of Juſtice, except colonel Ingoldſby and colonel Tomlinſon, were diſabled from being members in any parliament, or bearing any office in England or Wales.

Thoſe who had converted to their uſe any goods belonging to the church, were excluded from the benefit of this act.

Sir Henry Vane and Lambert were excepted from pardon, both as to life and eſtate.

The King likewiſe paſſed on this occaſion the acts following:

3. An act to fix the intereſt of money at ſix per cent.

4. An act for a perpetual anniverſary thankſgiving on the twenty-ninth of May, the day of his Majeſty's nativity and reſtoration.

After his Majeſty had given aſſent to theſe five acts, he made a ſpeech to both houſes, to teſtify how much he was pleaſed with them; concluding, "I am ſo confident of your affections, that I will "not move you in any thing that immediately "relates to myſelf: and yet I muſt tell you, that "I am not richer, that is, I have not ſo much "money in my purſe, as when I came to you. Preſents made by the parliament to the King's brothers.

The commons obſerving what the King ſaid concerning his brothers, made a preſent to the duke of York of ten thouſand pounds, and to the duke of Gloceſter ſeven. After this they proceeded to ſetling the King's revenue, and reſolved to raiſe it to twelve hundred thouſand pounds, which was more than any King of England had ever injoyed, Henry VIII excepted (1). But before this could be compleated, the King came to the parliament the thirteenth of September, and paſſing ſome bills that were ready, they adjourned themſelves to the ſixth of November. The acts paſſed on this occaſion were:

Duke of Gloceſter dies. Sandford. Phillips, p. 730.

The ſame day died the duke of Gloceſter, the King's brother. This Prince, twenty years of age, was unexpectedly taken out of the world by the ſmall-pox. As he had many good qualities, the King his brother, who tenderly loved him, appeared more concerned for this loſs, than for any misfortune he had undergone.

During the adjournment, the King appointed commiſſioners for trial of the regicides. The number of thoſe concerned in the late King's death, as judges, officers of the court of juſtice, and others, amounted to fourſcore and one; of whom twenty-five were dead; nineteen had made their eſcapes; ſeven others, for having been leſs ingaged in the crime were thought worthy of the King's clemency, and thirty received ſentence of death: but of theſe, twenty, who had ſurrendered themſelves upon the proclamation of the ſixth of June, were pardoned as to life, but reſerved for other penalties, as impriſonment, baniſhment, and forfeiture of eſtate. So, ten only were executed, namely, Harriſon, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, Axtel. What appeared moſt remarkable in the death of theſe men was, that not one expreſſed any ſigns of repentance, or did not think himſelf a martyr. Two only were prevailed on to pray for the King. They were almoſt all Anabaptiſts, Enthuſiaſts, Fifth-Monarchy-Men, who believed no violence unlawful to advance the kingdom of Chriſt, and all of mean birth, except Carew and Scroop.

Oct. 16, 17, 19.

A few days after the adjournment of the parliament, the King publiſhed a proclamation concerning religion, containing eight articles, moſt of which preſcribed certain rules to the biſhops in the exerciſe of their ſpiritual juriſdiction. The two laſt merit a particular notice, becauſe they diſcover that the Preſbyterians were not like to continue long undiſturbed. The VIIth ran, that a certain number of divines ſhould be appointed to reviſe the liturgy, and make ſuch alterations in it as ſhould be judged neceſſary, and that ſcrupulous perſons ſhould not be puniſhed or troubled for not uſing it at preſent. The VIIIth was concerning ceremonies, to which, for the preſent, no perſon ſhould be obliged to conform. This reſtriction, for the preſent, clearly ſhews, that thoſe who adviſed the King to this proclamation, had no deſign of leaving the Preſbyterians in poſſeſſion of that liberty which had been promiſed them by the Breda declaration, and, doubtleſs, by general Monk, when they ingaged to promote the King's reſtoration.

Nine of the old biſhops who were yet living, were reſtored to their ſees without any difficulty (2). Seven or eight others were newly conſecrated for other dioceſes; alſo Coſins, againſt whom ſo many complaints had been brought before the parliament in 1640, for the ſee of Durham, where he had once been prebend (3). Biſhopricks and eccleſiaſtical preferments were offered to the moſt eminent Preſbyterian-miniſters, but all refuſed except Reynolds, who imbraced the biſhoprick of Norwich (4).

brother to Prince Rupert. It is pretended, the Queen indeavored to perſuade his Majeſty to marry Hortenſia Mancini neice to cardinal Mazarine: but her propoſal being coldly received, ſhe adviſed him to purſue the negociation already begun, of his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal. Thus much is certain, ſhe propoſed to the King the marriage of the Princeſs Henrietta, with the duke of Orleans, to which ſhe found no objection. If we credit ſome authors, ſhe had two other ends in her viſit. The firſt was to draw the King her ſon into the intereſt of France againſt Spain. The ſecond, to perſuade him to remove the chancellor, for whom ſhe had no reſpect, as he himſelf declares in his hiſtory. But the King, to pleaſe his mother, could not be prevailed on to part with ſo ſerviceable and affectionate a miniſter.

The parliament meeting the ſixth of November, appointed a commitee to congratulate the Queen-mother on her return to England. Shortly after, the commons made a preſent of ten thouſand pounds to each of the two Princeſſes her daughters.

The parliament meets. Phillips. Echard.

The duke of York had, ſince his return to England, married Ann, chancellor Hyde's eldeſt daughter, to which he was in ſome meaſure compelled (1). The young lady proving with child, there were not wanting perſons to diſſuade the duke from ſo unequal a match. But the King's affection then for the chancellor, over-ruled all conſideration of the injury which the duke his brother, and the Royal family, might receive from it. He ſignified to the duke, that it would oblige him not to uſe any ſhifts, and plainly told him, "he muſt drink "as he had brewed," to which the duke ſubmited from a motive of obedience. This match may eaſily be imagined, was not in the leaſt agreeable to the Queen-mother, who hated the chancellor. Accordingly ſhe for a long time refuſed ſeeing her daughter-in-law, tho' at the preſſing inſtances of his Majeſty ſhe at laſt conſented to receive her reſpects. But during her ſtay in England, ſhe ever treated her with ſo much coldneſs, that her averſion to the marriage was very viſible.

The parliament having, in their firſt ſeſſion, diſpatched every thing relating to the act of indemnity, applied their next care to put the King in a condition of diſbanding the army. To this end, ſeveral ſums were granted him, and as the money was raiſed, regiments were broke, ſo that this work was finiſhed in a few months. Thus, the army, which had ſo long been the terror of England, was reduced to Monk's ſingle regiment. But in diſbanding this army, his Majeſty introduced a novelty, which diſpleaſed many people. He formed, for his ordinary guard, two regiments, one of horſe, and one of foot, in imitation of the practiſe in France, and other kingdoms. This was ſo much like a ſtanding army, which the Engliſh have always oppoſed, that many began then to fear, the King had ill deſigns upon the public liberty. His predeceſſors had no other guards than the gentlemen penſioners, eſtabliſhed by Henry VII.

Money granted for diſbanding the army.

The King inſtitutes guards. R. Coke. p. 105.

The diſbanding of the army being in ſuch forwardneſs, the King told the parliament, it was his intention to diſſolve them in December. Whereupon, the commons, to give his Majeſty a freſh inſtance of their zeal, confirmed and renewed their former reſolution, of granting the King an annual revenue of twelve hundred thouſand pounds. But the time being too ſhort to ſetle the funds on which this revenue was to be raiſed, the houſe thought it more proper to imploy what remained, in preparing the bills to be paſſed, before the diſſolution.

The vote of the 1200,000 l. to be ſetled on the King confirmed.

Little care has been taken to ſhew the reaſons inducing the King to diſſolve a parliament, which had been ſo favorable to him, and expreſſed ſuch zeal for his ſervice. It is my private opinion, that the miniſtry, and particularly the chancellor, looked with no good eye upon a parliament, which had ſo many members of that in 1640, and who, in all appearance, whatever they might pretend, had not relinquiſhed their ancient principles concerning the King's prerogative. They believed, doubtleſs, it would be very difficult to manage ſuch a parliament at their pleaſure. Beſide, very probably, the chancellor, a great enemy of the Preſbyterians, had formed the deſign of depriving them of their promiſed liberty, which would have been impoſſible, if this parliament had ſubſiſted. They believed therefore, that in the preſent favorable diſpoſition of the people to his Majeſty, their credit would be ſufficient to have a new parliament, more proper for the execution of their deſigns. This conjecture is confirmed by the tranſactions of the inſuing parliament. It muſt however be ſaid for the chancellor, that tho' he deteſted the maxims of the parliament in 1640, with reſpect to the Royal authority, yet he went not the lengths of the adverſe party, nor believed it for the intereſt of England, to have a King, whoſe will ſhould be law. This is manifeſt, from an incident at the very time I am ſpeaking of. A member of the commons, mr. Alexander Popham, who had a conſiderable influence in the houſe, offered his Majeſty, that provided he was ſupported by the court-party, he would undertake to procure an act, for ſetling on him, and his ſucceſſors, two millions a year, which would free him from any dependence on parliament, except in extraordinary caſes. The King, pleaſed with the propoſal, ſpake to the chancellor of it, as of a project advantageous to his intereſt. But he bravely anſwered, "That the beſt revenue his Majeſty could have, "was the affection of his ſubjects, and if he would "truſt to them, he would never want ſupplies in "time of need." Nor was he ſatisfied only with giving this anſwer to the King, but even took pains to undeceive the earl of Southampton, then lord treaſurer, who had approved of the project, and by very ſolid reaſons, convinced him, that the ſucceſs of it would be the kingdom's ruin. It is pretended, the chancellor's oppoſition to Popham's propoſal, was one of the chief cauſes of his diſgrace.

Welwood, p. 109. Echard.

The parliament, before their diſſolution, ordered the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, to be taken out of their graves, drawn on a hurdle to Tyburn, and there hung from ten o'clock till ſun-ſet, and then buried under the gallows. At the ſame time an act of attainder paſſed, not only againſt theſe four, but againſt the nineteen judges of the late King, who were fled from juſtice, among whom was Ludlow, author of the Memoirs under his name.

William Drake, citizen and merchant of London, about the ſame time, publiſhed a book, intitled, The Long Parliament revived; in which he indeavored to prove, that the ſaid parliament was not yet legally diſſolved. The commons brought an impeachment of high-treaſon againſt the author, but had not time to bring it to a trial.

At this time likewiſe ſeveral officers, who had ſerved under Cromwell, Deſborough, Morgan, Overton, and ſeveral others, were arreſted upon an uncertain report of a plot to ſecure the King's perſon, ſeize the Tower, and kill the Queen-mother; but it did not appear that this rumor had any good foundation.

At laſt, on the twenty-ninth of December, the King came to the parliament, and gave the Royal aſſent to the following acts:

Acts. Kennet's Regiſter. p. 334, &c.

1. An act for levying the arrears of the twelve months aſſeſſment.

2. An act for the farther ſupplying ſeveral defects in the act for diſbanding the army.

3. An act for ſix months aſſeſſment, at ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, to begin the firſt of January.

4. An act for the better ordering the ſelling of wines by retail, and for preventing abuſes in the mingling, corrupting, and limiting the prices of the ſame.

5. An act for erecting a poſt-office.

6. An act for an impoſt upon ale, beer, cider, and other liquors, to hold for his Majeſty's life.

7. An act for the raiſing of ſeventy thouſand pounds for his Majeſty's farther ſupply.

8. An act for the attainder of ſeveral perſons guilty of the horrid murder of Charles I.

9. An act for confirmation of leaſes and grants for colleges and hoſpitals.

10. An act to prohibit the exportation of wool, and fuller's-earth.

11. An act for prohibiting the planting of tobacco in England and Ireland.

12. An act for taking away the court of wards and liveries, together with Tenure in Capite, knights ſervice, and purveyances, and for ſetling a revenue upon his Majeſty in lieu thereof (1).

After giving the Royal aſſent to theſe acts, the King made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

Id. p. 339. Echard.

"I Will not entertain you with a long diſcourſe, the ſum of all I have to ſay to you, being to give you thanks, very hearty thanks: and I aſſure you, I find it a very difficult work to ſatisfy myſelf in my own expreſſions of thoſe thanks. Perfunctory thanks, ordinary thanks for ordinary civilities, are eaſily given; but when the heart is full as mine, it is a labor to thank you. You have taken great pains to oblige me; and therefore it cannot be eaſy for me to expreſs the ſenſe I have of it. I will inlarge no further to you upon this occaſion, than to tell you, when God brought me hither, I brought with me an extraordinary affection and eſteem for parliaments. I need not tell you how much it is improved by your carriage towards me. You have out-done all the good and obliging acts of your predeceſſors towards the crown; and therefore you cannot but believe, my heart is exceedingly inlarged with the acknowlegment. Many former parliaments have had particular denominations for what they have done: they have been ſtiled Learned and Unlearned, and ſometimes have had worſe epithets: I pray let us reſolve, that this be for ever called the Healing and the Bleſſed Parliament. As I thank you, tho' not enough, for what you have done, ſo I have not the leaſt doubt, by the bleſſing of God, but when I ſhall call the next parliament (which I ſhall do as ſoon as you can reaſonably expect or deſire) I ſhall receive your hearty thanks for what I have done, ſince I parted with you. For I deal truly with you: I ſhall not more propoſe any one rule to myſelf in my actions and counſels than this: 'What is a parliament like to think of this action, or this counſel?' And it ſhall be a want of underſtanding in me if it will not bear that teſt. I ſhall conclude with this, which I cannot ſay too often, nor you too often where you go: 'that, next to the miraculous bleſſing of God Almighty, and indeed as an immediate effect of that bleſſing, I do impute the good diſpoſition and ſecurity we are all in, to the happy act of indemnity and oblivion:' that is the principal corner-ſtone which ſupports this excellent building, that creates kindneſs in us to each other; and confidence is our joint and common ſecurity. You may be ſure, I will not only obſerve it religiouſly and inviolably myſelf, but alſo exact the obſervance of it from others: and if ever any perſon ſhall have the boldneſs to attempt perſuading me to the contrary, he will find ſuch an acceptation from me, as he would have, who ſhould perſuade me to burn Magna Charta, cancel all the old laws, and to erect a new government after my own invention and appetite."

This flatering ſpeech was received by the people with great applauſe, every one hoping, that a Prince of this character would have no other view, than the cauſing his ſubjects to live in peace and plenty. After the King had done ſpeaking, the chancellor made a ſpeech to both houſes, much longer than the King's, but tending to the ſame end, namely, to perſuade them, that the King being extremely tender of his people, all his actions would be directed to render them happy. He forgot not to mention the pretended conſpiracy, for the ſubverſion of the preſent government. But without entering into particulars, contented himſelf with aſſuring, that the conſpiracy was real, and Ludlow, one of the fugitive regicides, deeply concerned. This inſinuation was neceſſary for two purpoſes. The firſt was to convince the people of the neceſſity of puting the militia into the King's hands, to inable him to ſuppreſs the male-contents. The ſecond, to get a pretenſe for the breach of the King's promiſe, in his Breda declaration, by the indiſpenſable neceſſity of providing for the ſafety of the ſtate, againſt the ill-deſigns of ſectaries. This will appear more clearly hereafter. When the chancellor had ended his ſpeech, he declared the parliament diſſolved.

The parliament diſſolved.

Thus ended this parliament, about eight months after the firſt meeting, and ſeven after his Majeſty's reſtoration. I have obſerved already, that moſt of the members were Preſbyterians, or at leaſt, that party was ſuperior in the parliament. For this reaſon, no doubt, ſome writers magnifying what this parliament did for the King, and their diſpoſition in his favor, have inſinuated, it was a ſort of miracle, that they did not at once throw up all the liberties of their country on the King's reſtoration. But this is a groundleſs exaggeration. For if all the acts of this parliament be conſidered, not one will appear to ſupport this opinion. They recalled the King, but that certainly will not be thought ſtrange. They voted a revenue of twelve hundred thouſand pounds for his Majeſty, but it was only a vote which was executed by the next parliament. They paſſed the act of indemnity at the King's preſſing inſtance, and which was indeed neceſſary. They granted him a ſupply to pay off the fleet and the army; but could this be avoided without indangering the public tranquillity? After all, they preſented the King with an inconſiderable ſum, for his occaſions, and his brothers and ſiſters, with thirty-ſeven thouſand pounds: but was any thing more juſt or more natural than to inable him to maintain his houſhold, till his revenues were ſetled? There is nothing therefore in the actions of this parliament which infers a diſpoſition of throwing up the nation's liberties. But it will be ſeen, that the diſpoſition, which is groundleſly ſuppoſed in this parliament, was really and truly in the next: and that after doing too much, they were forced to alter their meaſures, and uſe extraordinary methods in oppoſing the deſigns of that very King, to whom they had given almoſt unlimited power. This ſecond parliament however has not been cenſured, while the compliance of the firſt has been induſtriouſly aggravated. The reaſon of this difference is very obvious, viz. that the ſecond parliament beſt follows the views and principles of the writers who have thus remarked on the former. In ſhort, if it be conſidered, that the firſt parliament ſat only ſeven months after the King's reſtoration, and that the ſecond continued eighteen years, it will be eaſily perceived, to which of the two may moſt juſtly be aſcribed the deſign of throwing up the national liberties.

Death of the Princeſs of Orange. Sandford.

The concluſion of this year brought his Majeſty a new cauſe of affliction in the death of the Princeſs of Orange his ſiſter, who died of the ſmall pox the twenty-fourth of December, at the age of twenty nine (1). She left but one ſon, who was afterwards King of England by the name of William III.

Other deaths. * William Seymour.

This ſame year died the earl of Hertford *, lately reſtored to the title of duke of Somerſet. He has been often mentioned in the reign of Charles I. Doctor Hammond the famous divine, died a little before the King's reſtoration.

The Royal Society founded. Sprat. Kennet.

It was this year alſo that the Royal Society was erected by the King's letters patent, who beſide granted it all the neceſſary incouragement towards a diſcovery of the ſecrets of nature, and of what is moſt curious and neceſſary in Natural Philoſophy and Mechanics.

It will not be improper before we cloſe this year, briefly to mention the tranſactions of Scotland, from the time of the King's reſtoration.

Affairs of Scotland. Burnet. Lenard.

After the King left Scotland, with an army to invade England, the Engliſh intirely conquered that nation, under the command of general Monk, who ſerved the parliament. If after that the King thought of Scotland, it was only to cheriſh the diſcontents, and try, by means of his adherents, to excite a revolt. For tho' he had been recogniſed and crowned in that kingdom, he always conſidered his intereſts as directly oppoſite to thoſe of that nation, or at leaſt, of the governing party. He never loved the Scots, and his belief of their ſelling the King his father to the Engliſh parliament, greatly inflamed his prejudice againſt them, nor was it diminiſhed by his reſidence in that country. His reſtoration to the Engliſh throne rendered him doubly maſter of Scotland; firſt, becauſe he was its natural King, and had even been crowned there; ſecondly, becauſe Scotland had been conquered by the Engliſh. Nothing would have been eaſier than to leave Scotland in dependence upon England, there not being any probability, that the Scots would ever be able to recover their liberty. It even ſeems, the King was not averſe to this opinion, ſince he left Scotland to be governed by the Engliſh, more than two months after his reſtoration. But he at length reſolved on reſtoring that kingdom to its ancient form of government. For this purpoſe, Monk wrote in his Majeſty's name to the Engliſh commiſſioners who had been imployed as judges there, to diſcontinue their functions the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt; and at the ſame time proclamation was made, for the convening of the commitee of eſtates, till a parliament ſhould be called. The King named the great officers of the kingdom, and took care to chuſe for theſe poſts, and for his council, ſuch as were believed moſt firmly devoted to him. The earl of Glencairn was made lord chancellor; the earl of Crawford, lord-treaſurer; the earl of Caſſilis, juſtice-general; the earl of Lauderdale, firſt ſecretary of ſtate, and general Midleton, the King's commiſſioner. Theſe men, as well as thoſe who compoſed the council, had been always ſtrongly attached to the King's intereſt. Thus the Scots, freed from the yoke laid on them by Cromwell, were exactly in their former ſtate, as before the troubles in 1637, that is, under the government of a King and miniſters of the very ſame principles with Charles I, and the miniſters of that time. But there was this diſadvantageous difference, that they were no longer able to make themſelves feared, being intirely ſubdued. They were ſoon made ſenſible of what they were to expect. Some of their miniſters aſſembling for the drawing up a Remonſtrance concerning their grievances, were ſent to priſon by the commitee of eſtates, without any examination of the nature, motive, or language of the remonſtrance, as if the bare deſign of preſenting it had been criminal. Moreover a proclamation was publiſhed againſt all unlawful aſſemblies and ſeditious writings, on ſuppoſition, that the aſſembly of the miniſters and their petition were of that nature. This might have ſatisfied the Preſbyterians, who were the body of the Scotiſh nation, what was preparing for them, and that they had no remedy but ſubmiſſion and patience.

CHARLES II. AN' 1660.

Burnet. p. 110.

They had ſtill another very convincing proof. The marquis of Argyle repairing to London to pay his duty to the King (2), was arreſted, ſent to the Tower, and afterwards to Scotland, to be tried on an impeachment of high-treaſon (3). The King's declaration from Breda, had not mentioned Scotland. So, the Scots were expoſed to the reſentment and vengeance of their adverſaries. Among theſe, chancellor Hyde was one of the moſt violent, as he has plainly diſcovered in his hiſtory of the civil wars, and unhappily for the Scots, he was prime miniſter in England, and had the chief direction of the King's affairs. Some of the Engliſh council indeed were of opinion, it would be very advantageous to the King, to ſuffer the Scots to injoy the benefit of this Breda declaration. But the contrary advice prevailed, whether from the King's and his counſellor's animoſity, or from a deſire of thoſe who had faithfully ſerved his Majeſty in his troubles, of injoying the eſtates of the convicted.

Burnet. p. 113.

This reſolution being taken, the King ſummoned a parliament in Scotland, to meet the twelfth of December, and publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that he left it intirely to this parliament, to examine the conduct of his ſubjects of Scotland; and that after his honor was vindicated, and his prerogative eſtabliſhed, he would grant a pardon which would witneſs how much he deſired the happineſs of his people. What method he took to procure this happineſs to the Scots will appear.

Affairs of Ireland. Cox.

As for Ireland, the King commited the government of it to ſir Maurice Euſtace, chancellor, and the earls of Orrery and Montrath, in quality of lords-juſtices, till a lord-lieutenant ſhould be nominated.

Fifth-Monarchy-Men, who believed themſelves bound in conſcience to uſe their utmoſt indeavors to advance the kingdom of Chriſt on earth. As I have ſpoken elſewhere of theſe men, and as their principles are ſufficiently known by their tragedies acted at Munſter, and ſeveral other places, it will be needleſs to give a more particular account of their tenets (1). The ſixth of January, as the King was attending the Queen-mother and his ſiſter the Princeſs to Dover, in their return to France, about fifty of theſe men, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, aſſembled in the evening in St. Paul's church-yard, and killed a man who upon demand, had anſwered, "For God and the King." This giving an alarm to the city, ſome trained-bands were ſent againſt them, whom theſe men quickly routed, and then marched thro' ſeveral ſtreets, and at laſt retired to Cane-wood (2), from whence a party of horſe and foot, ſent by general Monk, diſlodged them, and took ſome priſoners. But this prevented not the reſt from returning to the city, where they fought furiouſly, till they were obliged to take ſanctuary in a houſe. They there defended themſelves like men fearleſs of death, or rather, as ſecure from all danger, under the protection of Jeſus Chriſt. Here it was, that Venner, being wounded, and twenty of his men killed, with as many of the aſſailants, was taken with the reſt of his followers. A few days after, they were all tried, condemned, and executed, without any confeſſion of guilt, perſiſting in their extravagances to the laſt. Two young men only ſhewed ſome ſigns of penitence.

January 17. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 361.

The court takes occaſion from this inſurrection to forbid conventicles. January 10. Id. p. 357.

Tho' this attempt could not juſtly be conſidered as the conſequence of a deſign formed by a whole party, and tho' the Anabaptiſts had been all guilty, there was no reaſon to blame the other Sects, yet the court urged this inſurrection to confirm the rumors of a conſpiracy againſt the government. His Majeſty took occaſion to publiſh a proclamation, forbiding all meetings and conventicles, under pretenſe of religion, and commanding the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to be tendered to all perſons diſaffected to the government, and in caſe of refuſal, they were to be proſecuted on the ſtatute of the ſeventh of James I.

A remark upon this ſubject.

Doubtleſs it will be thought ſtrange, that by reaſon of the extravagance of ſome Anabaptiſts, all the other ſects ſhould be included in the prohibition of all meetings on account of religion, contrary to the expreſs terms of the Breda declaration. But it will be immediately ſeen, that the ruin of the Preſbyterian party was now reſolved, and that pretenſes were ſeeking to execute this reſolution, particularly ſuch as might create a belief, that what was done, tended only to ſecure the King's perſon and government. The end propoſed was to inſinuate that religion was no way concerned, but only the ſtate, and thereby obviate the objection which would naturally have been drawn from the Breda declaration, wherein the King ſolemly promiſed, that no perſon ſhould be moleſted for his religion. To ſucceed the better in this project, an admirable expedient was deviſed. This was to range, under the ſame denomination, all the ſects differing from the church of England, in order to impute to the whole body, conſiſting of theſe ſectaries, what could have been charged but to one, had they been diſtinguiſhed. This denomination was, that of Diſſenters, or Non-conformiſts; under which were comprehended, as well the Preſbyterians, as the Papiſts, Anabaptiſts, and other ſects. Thus, by this affected confuſion, all the Non-conformiſts were charged with the faults of one of the ſects compriſed under that name; and, as if they had made but one body, puniſhed without diſtinction, on pretenſe of keeping them in awe, and preventing them from diſturbing the ſtate. The Catholics, the Independents, the Anabaptiſts, were Non-conformiſts. Precautions therefore were to be taken againſt the Non-conformiſts, and conſequently againſt the Preſbyterians, becauſe their enemies were pleaſed to comprehend them under the ſame general appellation. Undeniable proofs of what I advance, will hereafter appear. The truth is, the Preſbyterians only were directly aimed at, whoſe ruin was determined, notwithſtanding the declaration from Breda. For indeed it is not likely, that a King, who had privately imbraced the Romiſh religion, would turn proſecutor of the Catholics: and the Independents and Anabaptiſts made then ſo inconſiderable a figure, that the King's miniſters had but little reaſon to fear them. But tho' there had been cauſe to ſuſpect them, why were they not diſtinguiſhed from the Preſbyterians, who had given no room for ſuch ſuſpicions? All this was only to ſave, in ſome meaſure, the King's honor, at a time when his promiſes, contained in his declaration from Breda, were openly evaded. This name of Non-conformiſts, is therefore to be conſidered as a very ambiguous term, which indeed ſignifies men who do not conform to the church of England, but not in the ſenſe which was given it, viz. of a body of men inſeparably united, compoſed of all the Diſſenters, and acting with the ſame views, and for the ſame intereſt.

The name of Non-conformiſts applied indifferently to all ſectaries.

Conference at the Savoy between the biſhops and Preſbyterian miniſters. Account of that Conference. London 1661. Collier. Baxter.

Some of the Preſbyterian miniſters obſerving, they were induſtriouſly confounded with ſects among whom they had no relation, petitioned the King for a conference between them and the biſhops, in order to examine wherein conſiſted their differences, and the objections they had to the Book of Common-prayer. The King granted their requeſt, and immediately named twelve biſhops, as principals, and nine other clergymen as aſſiſtants; and on the Preſbyteryan ſide, twelve miniſters as principals, and nine others as aſſiſtants, to confer together at the biſhop of London's houſe, who then lodged in the Savoy (3). The commiſſion ran: "That "the commiſſioners appointed ſhould act for four "months, from the twenty-fifth of March, and "particularly were ordered to adviſe upon and re-"view the Book of Common-prayer;——to take "into their ſerious and grave conſiderations, the "ſeveral directions and rules, forms of prayer, "and things in the ſaid Book of Common prayer "contained; and to adviſe and conſult upon and "about the ſame, and the ſeveral objections and "exceptions which ſhall now be raiſed againſt the "ſame; and (if occaſion be) to make ſuch reaſon-"able and neceſſary alterations, corrections, and "amendments, as ſhall be agreed upon to be need-"ful and expedient, for giving ſatisfaction to "tender conſciences, and the reſtoring and conti-"nuance of peace and unity in the churches under "his Majeſty's government and protection——And "to certify to his Majeſty in writing, under their "ſeveral hands, the matters and things whereupon "they ſhall ſo determine, to be by his Majeſty ap-"proved, &c." Thus the King gave a power to

AN' 1661. It was eaſy to foreſee from the very begining of this conference that it would be fruitleſs. For tho' the miniſters had already acquainted the King and the chancellor that they could decide nothing, ſince they were not authoriſed by their brethren, the biſhop of London* immediately told them, that as themſelves had requeſted this conference, they were to produce all their exceptions to the Liturgy in writing at once, together with the additional forms and alterations deſired. The miniſters anſwered, as they had before done to the King and the chancellor, that they could decide nothing, without having firſt conſulted their abſent brethren, and from them received a commiſſion in form. This intimated a deſire, that they might be permited to meet in ſynod, and debate together on theſe matters: but ſuch requeſt was never intended to be granted. They were therefore urged, only to declare their own ſenſe, when it was ſeen, that they could not be brought to act as deputies of a body, by which indeed they were not commiſſioned. To this it was anſwered, that they were willing to give their particular ſentiments in writing, provided, the biſhops, at the ſame time, would bring in their utmoſt conceſſions, that when both were compared, a judgment might be made of the ſucceſs. But the biſhops abſolutely rejected this propoſal. At laſt, the miniſters conſented to produce at once all their exceptions, reſerving to themſelves, however, a power to make additions according to the anſwers they ſhould receive, and their offer was accepted. Whereupon, the exceptions were drawn up, and an anſwer given in by the biſhops, who accepted a reply, and at length ſome ſlight alterations in the Liturgy were agreed on. But, beſide that the miniſters conſidered theſe alterations as inſufficient, there was an invincible obſtacle to an agreement, which was, that the miniſters not being commiſſioned, whatever they ſaid, could be eſteemed no other than their private opinion.

* Sheldon.

I ſhall not enter farther into this conference, becauſe, to underſtand it, requires a competent knowledge of the Engliſh Liturgy, and the manner in which Divine Service is celebrated, which cannot be ſuppoſed with regard to the generality of foreigners, for whom this hiſtory is deſigned (1). I ſhall content myſelf therefore with ſome general remarks, to aſſiſt the reader to apprehend wherein conſiſted the differences between the church of England and the Preſbyterians, and the conduct of both ſides.

Obſervations upon the differences between the Churchmen and Preſbyterians.

In the whole reign of King James, and the fifteen firſt years of Charles I, the Preſbyterians were oppreſſed, or, at leaſt, may be ſaid, not to be treated by the church of England as Chriſtian charity ſeemed to require. From the begining of the parliament of the third of November 1640, the church of England was perſecuted in her turn, and Epiſcopacy itſelf at laſt intirely aboliſhed. When the Independents became maſters of the parliament and army, the Epiſcopalians ſtill continued under oppreſſion, and tho' the Preſbyterian church-government was outwardly preſerved, there was nevertheleſs an intire liberty for all Proteſtant ſects, which the Preſbyterians conſidered as a violent perſecution. This ſtate continued till the begining of the year 1660, when Monk, forming the deſign of the King's reſtoration, believed it could not be effected without a reſtitution of that very Preſbyterian parliament which had aboliſhed Epiſcopacy. This expedient was crowned with ſucceſs: and by the united indeavors of the Preſbyterians and Epiſcopalians, the King was at laſt replaced on the throne. The reſtoration of his Majeſty produced that of the church of England, which was at once in almoſt the ſame ſtate ſhe had been before the year 1640. However, there was this difference, that, during the troubles, the number of the Preſbyterians was exceedingly increaſed, and thereby were grown much more formidable than under the reign of King James, and the firſt fifteen years of Charles I. It was therefore the intereſt of the church of England, either to ruin intirely the Preſbyterian party, which could ſtill raiſe freſh troubles in the church and ſtate, or by ſome ſmall conceſſions, ingage them to unite with the national church. And for this laſt end, the conference now mentioned ſeemed intended.

CHARLES II. AN' 1661.

But religious conferences ſedom meet with a happy ſucceſs; firſt, becauſe the two parties muſt be equally animated with ſuch a ſpirit of peace and charity, rarely to be found, among men; and, if I may venture to ſay it, ſtill more rarely among churchmen. Secondly, becauſe in theſe conferences, one of the parties is uſually ſuperior, and in poſſeſſion of power, and therefore not very willing to quit that advantage, to be reduced to an equality. So, no ſucceſs can be expected, unleſs one of the parties will yield every thing to the other. This recalls to my mind a ſaying of a French Catholic, a man of wit, to a miniſter after the concluſion of the religious war in France: "If (ſaid he) you had "come to a compoſition with us while the ſword "was in your hand, we might have made you "ſome conceſſions; but now that you are con-"quered, we would not yield you ſo much as the "chriſtening of bells." The caſe was much the ſame in England, at the time I am ſpeaking of. We have ſeen the conceſſions of Charles I, in the Newport treaty, with regard to Epiſcopacy, which, if it was not intirely given up by him, was however reduced to a very low ebb. But after the reſtoration of Charles II, the uſe of the ſurplice was of too great conſequence to religion, to be relinquiſhed. Thirdly, the animoſity between the two parties, generally retards the ſucceſs of ſuch conferences. The one cannot bear to receive laws from the other, nor think of revoking what has been once advanced. Fourthly, inſtead of thinking ſeriouſly on peace, both parties ſeek only to ſurpriſe one another. Laſtly, it too often happens, that theſe conferences are granted by the prevailing to the oppreſſed party, only to have it ſaid, that peace was offered, but rejected by the oppoſite ſide. There is room to believe, that in this conference all theſe circumſtances met, and therefore its ſucceſs is not to be wondered at; for, in ſhort, it broke off without any effect, and, as too commonly happens, each party threw the blame on the other.* Mr. Baxter, in his relation of it, ſays, that the biſhops were abſolutely againſt all conceſſions. But in another relation it is ſaid, the Preſbyterians were ſo obſtinately attached to their opinions, that they would not recede from a ſingle point, and that at laſt, upon the biſhop of Durham's propoſal, being required to declare in writing what they thought ſinful in the Liturgy, they put into the liſt all the articles which hindered their joining with the church of England, without one exception. They thereby ſhewed, that they conſidered all the forms and practiſes of the church of England as ſinful, even to the uſe of the ſurplice, and conſequently a refuſal of any accommodation, unleſs their opinions were intirely conformed to. Theſe are the mutual accuſations of the two parties, on which I am far from deciding any thing as to the truth of the facts. All I can ſay, without wronging either party, is, that the Preſbyterians ought to have receded from ſeveral points, which are manifeſtly indifferent; that the biſhops ſhould not have ſcrupled to give up the ſame. But people were then very far from being inclined to charity and condeſcenſion.

The King crowned. Phillips. Kennet's Regiſter.

During this conference at the Savoy, the King was magnificently crowned the twenty-third of April, being St. George's day.

A new parliament, and how compoſed.

The parliament, which had been ſummoned for the eighth of May, met on the day appointed. The repreſentatives, for the moſt part, were elected agreeably to the wiſhes, and doubtleſs by the influence of the court. The major part were High-church-men, that is, violent enemies of the Preſbyterians; great aſſerters of the minuteſt ceremonies of the church; and moſt devoted to the King and Royal prerogative. They literally followed the principles of Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, which had cauſed the troubles in the late reign. In ſhort, this parliament may be ſaid to be compoſed by chancellor Hyde, prime miniſter, and on the twentieth of April created earl of Clarendon. Let it alſo be remarked, that this parliament was called the Pensionary Parliament, becauſe it was afterwards diſcovered, that many of the members received penſions from the court. It is true, many will not allow that it was ſo at firſt, but pretend, that by the length of time, and changes upon death, the new members ſuffered themſelves to be corrupted. I cannot however help obſerving, that, at the very begining, this parliament did things in favor of the King, which no other had ever done; and that it was ſome time before they retracted their extravagant maxims concerning the Royal prerogative. This ſhews, the parliament was early bribed, notwithſtanding the inſinuations of ſome to the contrary. It may however be conceived how acceptable this parliament was to his Majeſty, ſince it continued almoſt eighteen years, on which account it was more juſtly called the Long Parliament than that of 1640.

As religion, whether Popiſh or Preſbyterian, and the Royal prerogative, are concerned in almoſt all the tranſactions of this reign, it is abſolutely neceſſary to inform the reader of ſome things concerning the hiſtorians; otherwiſe, they will be extremely imbaraſſed, when they read of tranſactions in ſome authors, quite contrary to what they find in others. My deſign is, therefore, by a few remarks on this ſubject; firſt, to prevent their being inſenſibly, and for want of examination, biaſſed by the opinions or prejudices of hiſtorians. Secondly, to incline; and thirdly, to aſſiſt them, in ſome meaſure, to make this examination.

Remark upon the hiſtorians of Charles II.

There are three ſorts of authors who have writ the hiſtory of this reign. The firſt are thoſe, who profeſs to be High-church with regard to religion; and with reſpect to the government, aſcribe to the King an almoſt unlimited power, provided the King be of their party. Theſe are, in a word, what are called the High-fliers, or rigid Tories. They are good Proteſtants, but, however, much leſs the Papiſts enemies than the Preſbyterians. For they will ſcarcely allow the latter to be Chriſtians, becauſe they have no biſhops. Now, according to their principles, no valid ordination can be had without biſhops, and conſequently no valid adminiſtration of the ſacraments; whence it follows, that Preſbyterians baptized by miniſters unordained by biſhops, are not truly baptized.

There is another ſet of writers of this reign, who, being Proteſtants, imbrace not the extravagant principles of the former, either concerning the church or government. Theſe are thoſe who are called Whigs, among whom there is a mixture of Churchmen and Preſbyterians.

Laſtly, there are Popiſh hiſtorians, whoſe tenets and principles are ſufficiently known.

Each of theſe authors have wrote the hiſtory of this reign according to his principles; for this reaſon what is praiſed and approved by one hiſtorian, is blamed and cenſured by another. For inſtance, as to this ſecond parliament, ſome openly inſinuate, that the firſt years tranſactions, whether for extending the Royal power, or oppreſſing the Preſbyterians, were agreeable to reaſon, juſtice, and the good of the kingdom; but what was done after the breach with the King, was only the effect of cabal and corruption. Others on the contrary maintain, that this parliament's zeal, whether for the King or againſt the Preſbyterians, was an extravagant zeal which threw them upon meaſures very detrimental to the kingdom, and unavoidably ingaged them to favor the ill deſigns of the court; but perceiving at laſt the ill uſe made of this diſpoſition, they eſpouſed the true intereſts of the nation, in oppoſing his Majeſty's deſigns.

The Popiſh hiſtorians are of the ſame principles with the High-flying Tories concerning the government. But, as King Charles's deſign of introducing Popery into England is very unwillingly owned by the Tories, the Papiſts on the contrary make it a glorious deſign, as being very juſt and religious.

A man who reads the ſeveral hiſtories of this reign muſt therefore prepare himſelf to meet theſe contrarieties, and to chuſe that ſcheme which appears moſt coherent and beſt ſupported. For this end, it will be proper to adhere only to plain facts, without regarding the frequent inſinuations of hiſtorians, moſt of whom ſuppoſe without ceremony their own ſcheme, even in the facts they relate. I own this is difficult: but I ſuppoſe the reader's ſearch is after truth, which he will never attain, if he implicitly follows, without examination, the firſt hiſtorian who falls in his way. Wherefore, I thought it proper to inform him before hand of what he is to expect, and withal to leave him at liberty to examine my ſcheme as well as that of others. But to return to the parliament.

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 434.

The King going to the houſe the eighth of May, made a ſpeech, in which, after ſome expreſſions of his great affection for his people, he recommended two bills, which he had prepared to confirm the act of indemnity. He repeated the ſame words he had ſaid to the laſt parliament: adding, that they might be as ſevere as they pleaſed againſt new offenders, but he ſhould not think him a wiſe man or his friend, who ſhould perſuade him to infringe the act of oblivion, or to conſent to a breach of a promiſe ſo ſolemnly made when he was abroad. Laſtly, he communicated to them his intended marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, which, with the approbation of his whole council, had been reſolved.

He acquaints them with his marriage.

The chancellor's ſpeech, Id. p. 435, &c.

The earl of Clarendon, lord-chancellor, afterwards inlarged on the particulars mentioned by the King in his ſpeech, but chiefly upon two points untouched by his Majeſty. The firſt related to the ſeditious ſermons of certain preachers, which tended to renew the old troubles, and whoſe licenſe it was neceſſary to curb. The ſecond point on which he inſiſted, was the late inſurrection, which he agravated in the ſtrongeſt expreſſions, intimating, that by intercepted letters it might be concluded, the combination reached very far, and if the vigilance of the lord-mayor had not prevented it, the city had been in danger of being reduced to aſhes. He did not name the authors of the ſeditious ſermons, becauſe his deſign was not to accuſe this or that perſon, or any particular ſect, but only to obtain a general order againſt the preachers who were not of the church of England. As to the pretended conſpiracy diſcovered by a multitude multitude of intercepted letters, as he aſſerted, it does not appear that any one was proſecuted in conſequence of theſe letters, or that others, beſide Venner and his companions, were proved to be concerned in it. It is therefore apparent, this ſpeech tended only to incenſe the parliament againſt the Sectaries or Non-conformiſts in general, under color of providing for the ſafety of the King and the ſtate, in ſuppoſition, that it was only from them any danger could be feared. This will hereafter appear to be more than a mere conjecture.

Kennet's Regiſter, p. 442.

Sir Edward Turner, the duke of York's attorney-general, being choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, on the recommendation of the court, both houſes unanimouſly voted their thanks to the King for the gracious communication of his reſolution to marry, and went in a body to congratulate him. Then the houſe of commons ordered all their members to receive the ſacrament according to the preſcribed liturgy within a certain time, upon pain of being expelled the houſe.

The commons ordered to receive the ſacrament in the church of England. Id. p. 446.

The two houſes jointly ordered, the twentieth of May, that the writing called the Solemn League and Covenant ſhould be burned by the common hangman; which was performed with great rejoicing. Three days after, the following acts were alſo ordered to be conſumed. The act for erecting a High-court of Juſtice for trying and judging Charles Stuart, &c. The act for ſubſcribing the ingagement againſt a King and houſe of peers: the act for declaring the people of England to be a commonwealth, &c. The act for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart, and another for the ſecurity of the Protector's perſon.

Several acts burned by the common hangman. Id. p. 450. Phillips. May 29.

The zeal of the two houſes breeding in the Republicans a fear, that the act of indemnity, paſſed in the late parliament, would not be ſufficient for their ſecurity, if it was not confirmed by the preſent, addreſſed the King for this confirmation. Upon their petition, the King wrote to both houſes the ſecond of June, earneſtly recommending to them to paſs the bill he had prepared. He even told them plainly, however neceſſary the bills might be, which were ready for the Royal aſſent, he had no mind to paſs them till the act of indemnity was likewiſe preſented to him. This letter having produced the deſired effect, his Majeſty came to the parliament the eighth of July, and paſſed the following acts:

Kennet, p. 478.

Acts. Statute b. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 491.

An act to confirm the act of indemnity paſſed in the late parliament.

An act to impower the King to receive from his ſubjects a free and voluntary contribution for his preſent occaſions.

After this the King made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, reminding them of his declaration from Breda, and of that ſigned by his adherents when his reſtoration began to be talked of, in which they promiſed to renounce all memory of former unkindneſſes, and vowed all imaginable good will to each other. "Therefore, continues he, let it be "in no man's power to charge me or you with "breach of our word or promiſe."

Order concerning ſome Regicides. Id. p. 490. Heath, p. 501. * On Jan. 30.

Theſe two acts being diſpatched, the parliament proceeded with vigor in finiſhing the other bills which were before them, and in particular, one for the confiſcation of the eſtates of twenty-one Regicides deceaſed, and to puniſh three, who were ſpared as to life, but liable to other penalties. Theſe were the lord Monſon, ſir Henry Mildmay and Robert Wallop. It was ordered, that they ſhould be drawn upon ſledges with ropes about their necks to the gallows at Tyburn, and from thence conveyed to the Tower, there to remain priſoners during their lives.

The King, on the thirtieth of July went to the houſe, and gave the Royal aſſent to ſeveral acts. CHARLES II. AN' 1661.

Other acts. Statute b.

1. An act for the ſafety and preſervation of the King's perſon and government; which had three remarkable clauſes.

The firſt, that if any perſon ſhould compaſs, imagine or intend the King's death, deſtruction, or bodily harm, to impriſon or reſtrain his Royal perſon, or depoſe him, or ſhould levy war againſt him within or without his realm, or ſtir up any foreign power to invade him; or ſhould declare or expreſs ſuch his wicked intention, by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and adviſed ſpeaking, he ſhould, being thereof legally convicted, be adjudged a traitor.

The ſecond, that if any man ſhould maliciouſly or adviſedly publiſh or affirm his Majeſty to be an Heretic or a Papiſt, or that he indeavored to introduce Popery; or ſhould ſtir up the people to hatred or diſlike of his Royal perſon and government: that every ſuch perſon ſhould be made incapable of any office or imployment either in church or ſtate.

The third, that if any man ſhould maliciouſly and adviſedly affirm, that the parliament, begun in Weſtminſter the third of November 1640, is yet in being, or that any covenant or ingagement ſince that time impoſed on the people, doth oblige them to indeavor a change of the government either in church or ſtate, or that either, or both houſes of parliament have a legiſlative power without his Majeſty, that then every ſuch offender, being legally convicted thereof, ſhould incur the penalties of a Præmunire mentioned in the ſtatute of the ſixteenth of Richard II.

The other acts now paſſed were:

An act to repeal the law made in the ſeventeenth year of Charles I, for the excluſion of biſhops from the houſe of peers.

An act to prevent tumults and diſorders commited under pretenſe of preparing or preſenting petitions to the King or parliament.

An act to declare the ſole right of the militia to be in the King.

An act to impower his Majeſty to diſpoſe of the land-forces.

An act for the regulation and government of his Majeſty's navy and forces by ſea.

An act to impoſe certain pains and penalties upon perſons and eſtates of thoſe who had a hand in the horrible murder of the late King.

An act for the collection of the great arrear of the duty of exciſe.

An act for providing neceſſary carriages for the King in all his progreſſes and removals.

The parliament adjourned.

After theſe acts had received the Royal aſſent, his Majeſty thanked the two houſes for them, and particularly for that which reſtored the biſhops to their ſeats in parliament, and alſo that concerning the militia. This done, he gave them leave to adjourn to the twentieth of November.

A convocation. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 480. &c. Collier.

When the King called this parliament, he had no intention to aſſemble the clergy, he believing, the Savoy conference was equivalent to a convocation. But dr. Heylin, in a letter to a miniſter of ſtate, ſhewed, that this conference ought not to hinder the King from aſſembling the clergy. He alleged, among other reaſons, that the clergy could not be bound by the acts of the Savoy aſſembly. This was preciſely what the Preſbyterian miniſters, appointed by the King, had alleged, to ſhew they had no power to act for their brethren. This convocation did nothing conſiderable, except granting the King a benevolence by virtue of that act above-mentioned (1).

(1) In this ſeſſion, the Papiſts petitioned the parliament for the repeal of the penal laws againſt them, and for toleration of their religion. See Kennet's Regiſter, p. 472, &c.

During

Affairs of Scotland. Burnet. Collier. Echard.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the parliament of Scotland proceeded with no leſs vigor. Being aſſembled in January, they began firſt with abrogating and annulling the ſolemn league and covenant of the two kingdoms; and commanded that none of his Majeſty's ſubjects preſume, on pretenſe of any authority whatſoever, to require a renewing or ſwearing to the ſaid league and covenant, without his Majeſty's ſpecial warrant and approbation.

Kennet, p. 427.

They next declared the power of the militia to be in the King alone, and the act of the ſixteenth of January 1647, by which the late King was delivered to the Engliſh, to be infamous, diſloyal, and contrary to all laws divine and humane.

Epiſcopacy therereceived. May 8. Burnet, p. 139. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 441.

Epiſcopacy was reſtored in Scotland, and for that purpoſe, four Preſbyterian miniſters, Sharp, Hamilton, Barwell and Leighton came to London, where, after being ordained deacons and prieſts, they were conſecrated biſhops by his lordſhip of Wincheſter. All four renounced their firſt ordination as invalid, and before their departure, obtained from the King a declaration of his pleaſure to reſtore in Scotland the government of the church by archbiſhops and biſhops, as it was in the year 1637. Upon this declaration, the privy-council of Scotland ſtrictly diſcharged all eccleſiaſtical meetings at ſynods and preſbyteries, &c. till they ſhould be authorized by the archbiſhops and biſhops. An act was alſo paſſed in the Scotiſh parliament to prohibit all meetings and conventicles in private houſes for religious worſhip. By another act the right of patronage was revived. And laſtly, by another, it was ordained, that all perſons in any public office, ſhould ſign a ſolemn declaration againſt the national covenant in 1638, and the ſolemn league and covenant in 1643, in which they declared it unlawful to ſubjects upon pretenſe of reformation, or any other pretenſe whatſoever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or take up arms againſt the King, or thoſe by him commiſſioned.

The marquis of Argyle beheaded at Edinburgh. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 430. Burnet. May 11.

The marquis of Argyle having been ſent priſoner to Edinburgh, was there tried, condemned and beheaded the tweny-ſeventh of May. Many believed, that revenge, and the avarice of ſome perſons (1) who hoped for the confiſcation of his eſtates, were more powerful motives for his ſentence, than juſtice. A few days before his death, the remains of the unfortunate marquis of Montroſe were ſolemnly intered, and the head of the marquis of Argyle was ſet up in the ſame place.

June 7, Heath.

In England the bodies of ſir Charles Lucas and ſir George Liſle, who were ſhot at Colcheſter in 1648, were likewiſe honorably intered.

Complaints of the Royaliſts. Burnet, p. 165. Echard.

During the receſs of the Engliſh parliament, the Cavaliers or Royaliſts made great complaints of the King's ingratitude, for ſuffering them to periſh with hunger, while, by the act of indemnity, he procured his enemies the ſecure injoyment of immenſe riches, acquired by illegal means. The city ſwarmed with libels on this ſubject. One, among the reſt, writ by L'eſtrange, told the King bold truths with great freedom. But his Majeſty paſſed them by unregarded, believing, the leaſt he could do for the loyal ſufferers, was to let them complain, ſince it was neither in his inclination (2) nor power to reward them.

Rumors of a conſpiracy. Heath.

To ſtop theſe complaints, the city was filled with rumors of projects and plots againſt the King's perſon and government (3). But many believed this only an artifice to inſenſe the parliament againſt the Non-conformiſts in general, and the Preſbyterians in particular, and furniſh a pretenſe to proceed againſt them. The Preſbyterians were always confounded with the other ſects, under the denomination of Non-conformiſts, who were charged with ill intentions againſt the government, tho' thitherto the Preſbyterians had given no cauſe of ſuſpicion, at leaſt nothing was proved. The moſt plauſible thing urged, was, that the Independents, Anabaptiſts, and other Republicans, ſeeing the Preſbyterians no better treated than themſelves, formed great projects, in hopes of being joined by the Preſbyterians at a proper juncture. Thus much is certain, the project of the act of uniformity, which will be mentioned hereafter, was now formed, and the rumors, true or falſe, of plots carried on by the Non-conformiſts, might be very uſeful to palliate the breach of the Breda declaration, under color of providing for the ſafety of the ſtate. For the Preſbyterians could not be attacked on account of religion, without a moſt manifeſt violation of the King's promiſe.

Algier expedition proves abortive. July. Heath, p. 500. Kennet's Regiſter.

The earl of Sandwich, vice-admiral, being ſent with a fleet to Liſbon, to bring home the new Queen, appeared before Algier to make a treaty with the Corſairs, or by force reduce them to reaſon. But he found them ſo well prepared, that he was obliged to return to Liſbon without doing any thing.

The parliament meets.

On the twentieth of November the parliament aſſembling, his Majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, without any neceſſity, they being only adjourned. He gave for reaſon, that it was to have the pleaſure to ſee the biſhops reſtored to their places in parliament. He then deſired the commons,

Remarks upon this ſpeech.

When his Majeſty publiſhed his Breda declaration, and expreſſed ſo much zeal for paſſing an act of indemnity, agreeably to it, he did not think it out of his power to give a poſitive promiſe, that no perſon

Charles II. An' 1661.

perſon ſhould be moleſted on account of religion. But, in all appearance, ſince the elections of members for this new parliament had been made, according to the wiſh of the miniſtry, in favor of High-church, it was ſuggeſted to the King, that the beſt expedient to obtain whatever he deſired, was to ſacrifice the Non-conformiſts to the parliament. It is not very ſtrange, that a Prince of his character, who had ſecretly imbraced the Roman Catholic religion, or, to ſpeak more properly, had no religion at all, ſhould not think it a point of honor to ſupport the Preſbyterians, at the hazard of loſing the affection of his parliament. He viſibly begins therefore to uſe evaſions, in the concluſion of this ſpeech; and by talking in general of perſons, laboring to trouble the peace of the kingdom, furniſhes his parliament with a pretenſe of treating the Non-conformiſts with rigor, as diſturbers of the public tranquillity. As to religion, he leaves the care of it to the parliament, as of a thing too difficult for him. By this he intirely departs from his Breda declaration, and the act of indemnity, which till now he had ſo much inſiſted on.

The Preſbyterians perſecuted.

This ſpeech was a ſignal to the perſecution which, ſoon after, broke out againſt the Non-conformiſts, and particularly the Preſbyterians, for they alone were properly pointed out. We ſhall ſee preſently, that upon rumors of conſpiracies forming againſt the ſtate by the Non-conformiſts, without diſtinction of any ſect, acts were grounded, which manifeſtly deſtroyed the Breda declaration, as well as that publiſhed by the Royaliſts, when the King's reſtoration was in hand.

I ſhall briefly ſtate the argument uſed to ſupport this perſecution. True it is, the King generouſly pardoned the offenſes commited before this declaration: but he did not promiſe to pardon ſuch as ſhould be afterwards commited. Now, ſince the King had been reſtored, the Non-conformiſts were ploting to diſturb the government. It is therefore neceſſary to take all poſſible precautions, to diſable them from puting their deſigns in execution. In anſwer to this argument, it is needleſs to urge the ſlender foundation of theſe pretended plots, for which no man was ever puniſhed, or even proſecuted (1). It is enough to remark, that it ſuppoſes, what is intirely falſe, that the Non-conformiſts made but one body, becauſe their enemies had been pleaſed to give them all one common appellation. And yet, upon this ſuppoſition ſo notoriouſly falſe, it was thought lawful, to deprive all the ſects, and particularly the Preſbyterians, of the benefit of the Breda declaration, only becauſe their enemies were pleaſed to confound them with the Independents and Enthuſiaſts, under the ſame title of Non-conformiſts. I do not think it neceſſary to dwell any longer on demonſtrating the weakneſs of this argument. But it was ſufficiently valid, for thoſe who had the power in their hands.

Petition of the parliament. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 563.

To prepare the way for the deſigned alteration, ſolely founded upon rumors of an imaginary conſpiracy, the parliament thought proper to ſupport theſe rumors, by a petition to the King for a proclamation, to order all officers and diſbanded ſoldiers to depart twenty miles from London. It was natural to infer from thence, that there were grounds for fear, which was indeed the deſign of this proclamation.

A ſupply granted to the King. Ibid.

The ſame day, the commons voted the King a ſupply of twelve hundred thouſand pounds for his preſent occaſions, that is, to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſed. This was the firſt fruits of his condeſcenſion, with regard to the Breda declaration.

Then, the parliament reſumed the affair of the twenty regicides, who had voluntarily rendered themſelves upon the proclamation of the ſixth of June, and had yet lain under ſentence of death. It was aſked of them, what they had to ſay, why judgment ſhould not be executed upon them? They alleged the King's proclamation, on which they had relied, believing it was his intention to pardon them. This did not prevent a bill from being brought in for their execution, which was read twice, and then dropped, probably, on the King's powerful ſollicitation in favor of the convicted, who could not have been executed without great prejudice to his honor and faith.

Some regicides called before the parliament. Nov. 25. Id. p. 563, 567. Heath. p. 502.

As I ſaid, the rumors of plots were abſolutely neceſſary to ſerve for foundation to what was intended to be done. The earl of Clarendon mentioned theſe plots at the cloſe of the late parliament, and his Majeſty did the ſame at the opening of this. To ſtrike a greater blow, the earl of Clarendon poſitively affirmed, at a conference between the two houſes, that there was a real conſpiracy to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, and which had been contriving ever ſince March. He named ſeveral perſons ingaged, and gave an exact deſcription of the manner how it was to be executed. He ſaid, tho' the deſign ſeemed diſconcerted as to the city of London, where the officers and diſbanded ſoldiers had been invited to repair the eleventh of the inſtant December, it was ſtill purſued in the country. The lords upon this information, named a commitee of twelve of their houſe, to whom they deſired the commons to add a proportionable number of their members, to examine this horrid deſign, that the execution of it might be prevented, and the kingdom's peace ſecured.

The chancellor ſupports the rumor of the plot. Kennet's Regiſter. p. 582.

Doubtleſs it muſt appear ſtrange to all, who are not biaſſed by paſſion or party, that a plot, of which the court ſo well knew all the circumſtances; the parties ingaged; the day of its deſigned execution in London; the indeavors ſtill uſed to promote it in the country, and concerning which a multitude of letters had been intercepted, that this plot, which was examined by a numerous commitee of both houſes, ſhould not be attended with the death of any of the complices, nor even with the proſecution of one ſingle perſon. It was, however, upon this ſole foundation, that the corporation act, of which I am going to ſpeak, and all the proceedings againſt the Non-conformiſts, were builded.

A remark upon this ſubject.

His Majeſty on the twentieth of December came to the houſe, and paſſed the two following acts. Ibid. Acts. Statute b.

An act granting the King twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds, for his preſent occaſions, to be levied by a monthly tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds, for eighteen months.

An act for regulating corporations.

This act, which was called the Corporation-act, ran, That in order to perpetuate the ſucceſſion in corporations, in the hands of perſons well affected to the government, it was ordained, that every mayor, alderman, and common-council-man, or any other officer in a corporation, ſhould be obliged, beſide the common oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and a particular declaration, againſt the ſolemn league and covenant, to take an oath, declaring, "That it was not lawful, upon any pre- "tenſe whatſoever, to take arms againſt the King; "and that he did abhor that traiterous poſition, of "taking arms by his authority againſt his perſon, "or againſt thoſe commiſſioned by him."

liſhed government, there had been nothing in it extraordinary. But in this oath, the King was ſuppoſed to be ſole maſter of the government, which is manifeſtly falſe, ſince he can neither make nor repeal a law without the concurrence of parliament, and conſequently, the ſovereign authority does not reſide in him alone. This ſuppoſition was exactly like that of the parliament of 1640, that the ſupreme authority reſided in the people, or their repreſentatives in parliament, the abſurdity of which was expoſed by Charles I, in almoſt every one of his papers. They are both equally falſe, and to ſhew that the people of England do not think them true, we need only obſerve the abſurd conſequences they have produced, and which, by the Engliſh, have been conſtantly rejected. By the maxim of the parliament of 1640, they believed, they had a right to aboliſh Monarchy, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. By the maxim contained in this oath, James II believed he had a right to introduce a new religion, and eſtabliſh an abſolute power. But the Engliſh nation thought themſelves bound by neither the one nor the other of theſe extravagant maxims. Charles II was reſtored, notwithſtanding the deciſion of the parliament of 1640; and James II was dethroned, notwithſtanding the deciſion of this parliament, which had ordered the oath we are ſpeaking of, tho' the act was aſſented to by the King. In England it is impoſſible to mark out the degree of obedience due from the people to the King, or the parliament, when they are diſunited. The reaſon is evident, becauſe the eſſence of the government conſiſts in their union. It is in the King and parliament united together, that the abſolute power, neceſſary to all governments, is lodged. Wherefore, to ſay, that "upon any pretenſe or reaſon what-"ſoever," it is not lawful to reſiſt the King or the parliament, is, properly throwing up the liberties of the nation to the mercy of the one or the other. The High-churchmen, of which this parliament was principally compoſed, had then extraordinary ideas of the Royal authority. And I know not whether they have yet intirely loſt them. But it is certain, many of them at laſt opened their eyes, and ſaw the dangerous conſequences of their maxims, and even this parliament did not think fit to admit them all, as will hereafter appear.

When theſe acts were paſſed, the parliament was adjourned to the tenth of January.

Death of the Queen of Bohemia.

Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I, Electreſs Palatine and Queen of Bohemia, died at London the thirteenth of February (1).

Report of the conſpiracy made by the chancellor. Parker. Kennet's Regiſter.

The parliament meeting the tenth of January, the firſt thing the lords did, was to receive the report of the commitee, appointed to examine the conſpiracy, ſuppoſed to have been forming now almoſt a year, but which had yet produced no effect. The earl of Clarendon, who made the report, ſays, that two perſons, viz. Wildman and Salmon were particularly ingaged, and that a liſt of one hundred and forty officers of the late army had been found with the latter; and it was farther diſcovered, that the conſpirators were to have had a meeting at London the tenth of December, and deſigned to have ſecured Shrewſbury, Coventry, and Briſtol, by the cloſe of January: that where they moſt were prevalent, they were to begin with horrible aſſaſſinations, which moved one of them to ſay, that the fugitive judges of the late King were entertained in France, Holland, and Germany, and held a ſtrict correſpodence with the Engliſh conſpirators, and were incouraged by foreign Princes: that they had bought a large quantity of arms, and boaſted, if they could once ſet foot in England, they ſhould not want means to carry on their work. That this had been diſcovered by one of the complices, and confirmed by ſuch intelligence from abroad, as never failed: that many met at Huntington, and rode about the town in the night, to the great terror of his Majeſty's good ſubjects: that it might be wondered, ſome propoſals were not made to remedy the impending evil, but the King, having confered with the duke of Albemarle, had ordered two troops of horſe to Shrewſbury, and as many to Coventry, who, in their way, had diſperſed a great knot of thieves, and taken twenty: That a rumor was ſpread, that the appointing of this commitee was only a plot of the court to govern by an army, but the commitee was very ſenſible of the reality of the danger, and hoped the two houſes would be ſo too: that ſince their enemies were united for their deſtruction, they ſhould alſo unite for their own preſervation.

A remark upon this ſubject.

When it ſhall be conſidered, that after a ſtrict examination of this conſpiracy by a numerous commitee of both houſes, the whole amounted only to a liſt found on a man of one hundred and forty officers, without any other circumſtance; and concerning one of the complices not named; to ſecret intelligence that never failed; to a company of men aſſembled about Huntington, in the night, for ſome unknown reaſon; that not one of theſe pretended conſpirators, who ſurely muſt have been known by the perſon who made diſcovery of the whole plot, was either puniſhed or proſecuted for this ſuppoſed crime: that in ſhort the noiſe of this conſpiracy ceaſed directly after the Uniformity-act had paſſed: when theſe things, I ſay, are conſidered, who can help thinking it a mere invention, to give ſome color to this act. The government durſt not attack the Preſbyterians directly on account of their religion. The declaration from Breda was too expreſs on that head. But they were to be charged with new crimes, in order to be deprived of the benefit of that declaration. They were not even accuſed of attempting to diſturb the ſtate, ſince the King's reſtoration; but the Non-conformiſts in general were accuſed in order to puniſh the Preſbyterians, as if they made but one body with Independents, Anabaptiſts, Enthuſiaſts, becauſe to all theſe ſects was given the common appellation of Non-conformiſts.

The King's ſpeech to the commons. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 638.

The King ſent for the commons the firſt of March to Whitehall, and reproached them, tho' very civilly, with having done nothing towards the ſetling of his revenues. He artfully inſinuated, that the late troubles had principally been owing to the wants and neceſſities of the crown, thereby intimating, that this had obliged his father to ſtretch the Royal prerogatives. He added, that there was ſtill in the kingdom a Republican party, who promiſed themſelves a ſecond revolution, and therefore the only way to diſappoint their hopes, was to inable the crown to ſupport itſelf, and ſecure them. He continued his ſpeech in this manner:

"———Gentlemen, I hear you are very zealous "for the church, and very ſollicitous, and even "jealous, that there is not expedition enough uſed "in that affair. I thank you for it, ſince I pre-"ſume it proceeds from a good root of piety and "devotion: but I muſt tell you, I have the worſt

Charles II. An' 1661.

" luck in the world, if after all the reproaches of " being a Papiſt while I was abroad, I am ſuſpected " of being a Preſbyterian now I am come home. " I know you will not take it unkindly, if I tell " you that I am as zealous for the church of Eng- " land, as any of you can be, and am enough ac- " quainted with the enemies of it on all ſides; that " I am as much in love with the Book of Common- " prayer as you can wiſh, and have prejudice " enough to thoſe who do not love it, who, I hope " in time will be better informed, and change " their minds; and you may be confident I do as " much deſire to ſee an uniformity ſetled as any " amongſt you. I pray truſt me in that affair: " I promiſe you to haſten the diſpatch of it with all " convenient ſpeed; you may rely upon me in it. The King's deſign in this part of his ſpeech, was to obtain, that when the act of uniformity ſhould be paſſed, the execution of it might be left intirely to him, in order to have it in his power to diſpenſe with whom he pleaſed. This he afterwards diſcovered in words more clear and preciſe, tho' the parliament would not grant his deſire.

An' 1662. Act againſt the Quakers. Statute-b. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 675. May 2.

The commons being returned to their houſe prepared ſeveral bills, and among the reſt one againſt the Quakers, for refuſing the oaths. Not that they believed themſelves freed by this refuſal from the obligations impoſed by theſe oaths, but becauſe they conſidered all oaths as unlawful. This act, and another for the repairing of the ſtreets and high-ways in and about London, were paſſed by commiſſion.

Id. p. 687, &c.

At length, on the ſeventeenth of May, the King coming to the parliament, gave his aſſent to ſeveral acts, of which I ſhall only mention the moſt important.

Other acts. Statute-b.

An act for the uniformity of public prayers, and the adminiſtration of the Sacrament.

An act for the better regulation and ordering of the ſtanding forces of the nation.

An act for laying a perpetual and annual tax of two ſhillings on every chimney-hearth in each houſe, alms-houſes excepted.

An act to impower his Majeſty to levy, for the next inſuing three years, a tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, if neceſſity ſhall ſo require.

Moreover, the commons ordered ſixty thouſand pounds over and above the ſum of twelve hundred thouſand pounds, granted by a former act, to be diſtributed among the poor Cavaliers, who had been ſufferers in the late troubles.

After the paſſing of theſe acts, the parliament was prorogued to the eighteenth of February.

Among theſe acts three are particularly remarkable.

Act of uniformity. Ibid. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 676, &c.

Every miniſter was obliged by the act of uniformity, on pain of loſing all his eccleſiaſtical preferments, to conform to the worſhip of the church of England, according to the new Book of Common-prayer, before the feaſt of St. Bartholomew next, from whence it was called the Bartholomew-act. Every miniſter was alſo obliged to ſign the following declaration: " I do here declare my unfeigned " aſſent and conſent to all and every thing con- " tained and preſcribed in and by the Book in- " titled the Book of Common-prayer, &c." Beſide this, every perſon was obliged to ſign a declaration contained in the militia-act, in which declaration he was not only to promiſe to conform to the Liturgy of the church of England, but likewiſe to renounce the ſolemn league and covenant, declaring it to be an unlawful oath, and impoſed upon the ſubjects of this realm againſt the known laws and liberties of the kingdom.

Charles II. An' 1662.

The penalties annexed to this act were many, particularly,——" No perſon ſhould be capable of any " benefice, or preſume to conſecrate and adminiſter " the holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, be- " fore he be ordained prieſt by Epiſcopal ordina- " tion, upon pain to forfeit for every offenſe the " ſum of one hundred pounds."

Remarks upon the act.

I ſhall make but three obſervations upon this act; the firſt ſhall be in the very words of the declaration from Breda: " And becauſe the paſſion and un- " charitableneſs of the times have produced ſeveral " opinions in religion, by which men are ingaged " in parties and animoſities againſt each other, " which, when they ſhall hereafter unite in a free- " dom of converſation, will be compoſed or bet- " ter underſtood; we do declare a liberty to tender " conſciences, and that no man ſhall be diſquieted " or called in queſtion for differences of opinion " in matters of religion, which do not diſturb the " the peace of the kingdom; and that we ſhall be " as ready to conſent to ſuch an act of parliament, " as upon mature deliberation ſhall be offered to us " for the full granting that indulgence."

If this clauſe be compared with the act of uniformity, it will eaſily be ſeen, what care the King's own miniſters, who were the real authors or promoters of this act, had of his honor, and what regard he himſelf payed to his promiſe. Nevertheleſs, ſome did then and do ſtill conſider this act as the great ſupport and bulwark of the church of England, and extol the authors as deſerving the everlaſting praiſes and bleſſings of the church; while others, perhaps, no leſs ſincerely attached to that church, looked upon it as her great reproach.

My ſecond remark is, that thus were the Preſbyterians requited for their dependence on the promiſe made by the King's party, in the aſſurance of which they had ſo chearfully labored for his reſtoration, according to the directions received from his friends.

My third obſervation is, that by an artifice the moſt groſs, not only conſpiracies were invented which had no reality, but which, tho' they had been true, could not have been imputed to the Preſbyterians, who were not to anſwer for the crimes of the other ſects.

Perhaps it may be imagined, that being a Preſbyterian, I ſpeak out of intereſt and paſſion. But I proteſt, I have always had, and ſtill have, a profound reſpect and extreme veneration for the

(1) There were added ſome new collects, as the " Prayer for all conditions of men," and the " general thankſgiving," and the " Prayer for the high court of parliament," and a new office was made for " Baptiſm of ſuch as were of riper years," and two more, one for the thirtieth of January, the other for the twenty-ninth of May. In the collect for the parliament, the King was ſtiled, " our moſt religious King," an epithet that gave great offenſe, and occaſioned much indecent raillery. Some new holy-days were added alſo, as St. Barnabas, and the converſion of St. Paul, and more leſſons were taken in out of the Apocrypha, particularly the ſtory of Bell and the Dragon. church of England, to which I always conformed during my reſidence there, and am ready to do it again, were I to return. But this does not oblige me to conſider all her members as free from failings, paſſions and prejudices; eſpecially on the preſent occaſion, wherein, as an hiſtorian, truth requires of me to ſhew clearly ſo material a point of hiſtory, as this treachery uſed to the Preſbyterians. For it was at their ruin the uniformity act was principally levelled (1).

The act concerning the militia, intitled, "An "act for the better regulating and ordering the "ſtanding forces of the nation," contained, among others, the following clauſe:

"Foraſmuch as within all his Majeſty's realms "and dominions, the ſole and ſupreme power, "government, command and diſpoſition of the "militia, and of all forces by ſea and land, and of "all forts and places of ſtrength, is, and by the laws "of England ever was, the undoubted right of "his Majeſty, and his Royal predeceſſors, Kings "and Queens of England; and that both or either "of the houſes of parliament, cannot, nor ought, "to pretend to the ſame; nor can, nor lawfully "may raiſe, or levy any war offenſive or defenſive "againſt his Majeſty, his heirs or lawful ſucceſ-"ſors, &c."

An oath injoined.

By this act it was ordained, that all lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, officers and ſoldiers, ſhould take the following oath: "——I do declare, "and believe, that it is not lawful upon any pre-"tenſe whatſoever to take arms againſt the King; "and that I do abhor that traiterous poſition, that "arms may be taken by his authority againſt his "perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned "by him, in purſuance of ſuch military commiſ-"ſions."

When the words in the latter part of the oath, viz. "commiſſioned by him," came to be debated in the houſe of commons, a great lawyer (2) moved, that the word "lawfully" might be added to make all clear. But the attorney-general ſir Heneage Finch anſwered, "That it was not neceſſary; for "the very word commiſſion imported it; ſince if "it was not lawfully iſſued out to lawful perſons, "and for lawful reaſons, it was no commiſſion." And the whole houſe aſſented to this interpretation. The ſame difficulty offered in the houſe of lords (3), was removed in the ſame manner (4). But in ſuppoſing that by commiſſioned could be only meaned lawfully commiſſioned, where would the damage have been of adding the word lawfully, in order to take away all obſcurity, if the parliament had intended to put any reſtriction upon the Royal power?

Suppoſe now the King inveſted with ſuch a power, had attempted to abrogate all the old, and ſubſtitute new laws, at his pleaſure; to aboliſh the uſe of parliaments, and force his ſubjects to imbrace the Popiſh religion; which way could they have maintained their liberties and religion, ſince there would be no ſupreme court to call the King to an account, and ſince by this oath it would be high-treaſon to take arms againſt him upon any pretenſe whatſoever? Theſe are the uſual effects of ſtate factions. Each party, when ſuperior, thinks only of doing the contrary of what the other has done, without conſidering the conſequences, and generally both run into extremes. The parliament of 1640, incenſed againſt Charles I, for attempting to ſtretch his prerogative, are not content to reduce him within due bounds, but aſſume alſo privileges inconſiſtent with the conſtitution, and proceed at laſt intirely to deſtroy Monarchy. The parliament of 1661, not ſatisfied with reſtoring the King to his juſt rights, inveſt him with an unlimited power, and render him as abſolute as any Monarch in the univerſe.

Charles II. An' 1662.

Chimney act.

The annual tax of two ſhillings upon every fire-hearth, not only to this King for life, but to his ſucceſſors for ever, ſhewed, that this parliament acted not upon a bare motive of zeal and affection for the reigning King, but alſo ſeemed to have an intention of puting the Kings of England in a condition to ſupport themſelves without parliaments, by aſcribing to them ſo great a power. And indeed, this ſingle tax amounted to about two hundred and fifty ſix thouſand pounds a year, which, together with tonage and poundage, exciſe, and other duties, made the revenue of his Majeſty double to any of his predeceſſors; ſo fearful was this parliament of not ſufficiently ſhewing their zeal for Monarchial government, which had been, many years, ſo unworthily handled.

Echard.

The ſeſſion of parliament being ended, the court was wholly imployed in preparing for the reception of the new Queen, who was daily expected. She left Liſbon the fifteenth of April, and arrived at Portſmouth the fourteenth of May, where the King received her (5). A report was ſpread, that the marriage was ſolemnized by Sheldon, biſhop of London, tho' others, who believe themſelves better informed, ſay, the Queen refuſed to be married by any but a Catholic prieſt; that the King conſented to it, and therefore very few perſons were preſent at the ſolemnity (6). This marriage had been propoſed by D. Franciſco de Mello, the Portugueſe embaſſador, to general Monk (7), at the time when he was laboring the King's reſtoration. The embaſſador's aim, was to procure Portugal a powerful aſſiſtance from England, ſince by the Pyrenean treaty, the King his maſter had from France no farther expectations. To prevail with Monk, and by his means, with the King, he ingaged, that the King of Portugal ſhould give with the Princeſs his ſiſter, three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, the town of Tangier upon the coaſt of Africa, and the Iſle of Bombay in the Eaſt-Indies. Monk, pleaſed with theſe offers, propoſed this match to the King immediately after his arrival (8). His Majeſty approved the project, and accordingly it was concluded in the year

Burnet. Echard.

1661 (1). Some pretend chancellor Hyde ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the marriage on an information, that the Princeſs of Portugal, by ſome natural infirmity, was incapable of bearing children, but that the King took this for an artifice of the court of Spain to prevent a marriage, which could not but prove diſadvantageous to their great deſigns on Portugal. Others ſay, the chancellor was the chief author of this match. Before the conſummation of the marriage, the King, in a treaty with Portugal, ingaged to aſſiſt that kingdom againſt Spain (2), and in the nineteenth article, obliged himſelf never to reſtore Dunkirk to that crown.

D'Ablancourt. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 471.

When this marriage was conſummated, the Queen-mother arrived in England (3), with deſign, as it ſeemed, to ſpend the reſt of her days. The King aſſigned Somerſet-houſe for her reſidence, and allowed her ſufficiency to keep a ſplendid and magnificent court. But ſhe did not, it ſeems, find in England, the ſatisfaction ſhe expected, for after three years ſhe returned to France.

Arrival of the Queen-mother. July 28. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 733. Heath.

The moſt remarkable tranſaction at the Engliſh court, in the remaining part of this year, was the ſale of Dunkirk. The King looked upon this place as his property, ſince it was ſurrendered to Cromwell by France, in conſideration of the ſuccors ſhe had received in the war with Spain. Whether this reaſon was ſolid or not, it is certain, the King believed he had power to diſpoſe of the town as he pleaſed. The two years large ſupplies granted him by parliament were all conſumed, and his coffers empty, tho' his extraordinary occaſions had been only the diſbanding of the army, and payment of the arrears due to the navy. Whatever were his Majeſty's motives to part with this important place, he reſolved to ſell it to the French, by whom it was gladly purchaſed. The negociation for this ſale began in July 1662, and ended in October following. The King's firſt demand was twelve millions of Livres, and count d'Eſtrades, who managed this affair for Lewis XIV, offered but fifteen hundred thouſand. This great difference between the ſum demanded and offered, was the ſole ſubject of the negociation. Each however feigned, to be unwilling to recede, tho' both were equally impatient, the one to ſell, and the other to purchaſe, and both knew each other's intention. Charles told count d'Eſtrades by his chancellor, that four ways were propoſed for the diſpoſal of Dunkirk. The firſt was, to ſurrender it to the Spaniards, who offered what price the King ſhould be pleaſed to demand. The ſecond was, to treat with the Dutch, who offered immenſe ſums. The third was, to put it into the parliament's hands, who would keep it, without diminution to the King's pretenſions as Sovereign. The fourth, which he thought moſt juſt and ſuitable to his intereſts, was to ſell it to the King of France. There was alſo a fifth way propoſed by the earl of Sandwich, which was to demoliſh and fill up its harbor, and ſo render it intirely uſeleſs.

The ſale of Dunkirk. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 723, 733, 802. D'Eſtrades's letters.

CHARLES II. AN' 1662.

The King of France anſwered, He much doubted the offer of the Spaniards, who had not yet been able to pay his Queen's portion, tho' on that payment depended the validity of her renunciation: that it would be more advantageous to the King of England, to make a free gift of the place to the Spaniards, than to receive for it twenty millions from the Dutch, which, moſt certainly, they would not give. And, as to delivering it to the parliament, the King knew better than he how dangerous it was to increaſe the parliament's authority.

In ſhort, Charles came to ſeven millions of Livres, and the count d'Eſtrades offered him two, and then two and a half, and at laſt three. But the King his maſter had given him power to offer four, at the very time that Charles conſented, that the ſale ſhould be fixed at five millions. The King of France was obliged to come up to his price, when he found nothing would be abated, and that he run the riſk of being diſappointed, if he ſtood out any longer. There was alſo ſome difficulty about the time of payment; the King of England would have all the money at once upon delivery of the place, and the King of France offered to pay it at ſeveral times. At laſt it was ſetled, that one half ſhould be paid down, and the other in two years, at two ſeveral payments.

Dr. Burnet, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, p. 173. ſays, that Charles laviſhed away the money received for Dunkirk, among his miſtreſs's creatures (4). Others aſſure, that with one part he diſcharged his ſiſter the ducheſs of Orleans's dowry, and with the other aſſiſted Portugal. R. Coke.

The reaſons alleged by the chancellor to the count d'Eſtrades, to ſhew the King was under a neceſſity to ſell Dunkirk, were, that his coffers being empty, he could only by that means be inabled to aſſiſt Portugal. But in England, this reaſon was not to be urged, becauſe all knew what vaſt ſums the King had received from the parliament. To ſcreen therefore the diſhonor of this ſale, it was pretended, that the gariſon and repairs of the fortifications coſt the King immenſe ſums to no purpoſe; that "the ſea was ſo tempeſtuous, and the grounds ſo "rowling upon every ſtorm, that their would ne- "ver remain a certain ſteerage to that port (5)." Echard, Vol. III. p. 84.

On this occaſion ſeveral pamphlets were publiſhed, tending to ſhew the injury done to the nation in the ſale of Dunkirk to France, and others to palliate, or to demonſtrate the neceſſity of its diſpoſal.

But the greateſt diſpute concerning this ſubject was upon two queſtions, Whether the propoſal came from France or England? And whether the earl of Clarendon, as he was generally accuſed, was the author and promoter of this ſale, or, as ſome pretend, proteſted he would not be concerned? I find

(1) The Spaniſh embaſſador oppoſed this marriage to the utmoſt of his power. He propoſed to the King a Proteſtant Princeſs namely, either the Princeſs of Denmark, or of Saxony, or of Orange. But, as biſhop Burnet obſerves, King Charles pretended a contempt to the Germans, and of the northern crowns. France had no ſiſter. Spain had only two Infanta's; the eldeſt whereof was married to the King of France, and the ſecond was to go to Vienna. So the houſe of Portugal only remained to furniſh the King a Wife.——— France ſtrenuouſly promoted this marriage, and to ſucceed the better, offered the earl of Clarendon a penſion of ten thouſand pounds a year; but the earl rejected that offer with great indignation. Burnet, p. 172.——— The miſtreſs here mentioned was Barbara Villers, the King's firſt miſtreſs, afterwards created ducheſs of Cleveland. See Burnet, p. 94.

(5) Theſe were the words of the earl of Sandwich, according to Echard. Burnet ſays, count Schomberg, who was lately come into England, adviſed, in oppoſition to all this, that the King ſhould keep it, for conſidering the naval power of England, it could not be taken, and that the holding it would keep both France and Spain in a dependence upon the King. But he was ſingular in that opinion. Clarendon ſaid, he knew nothing of thoſe matters, but appealed to Monk's judgment, who was for ſelling it, p. 173.

Charles II. An' 1662.

mr. Echard, in his Hiſtory of England, and dr. Burnet, in that of his own Times, intirely clear the earl of Clarendon. It is however a fact, as certain as a fact of this nature can be, that the earl of Clarendon propoſed, negociated the ſale, and concluded it. To prove this truth, I need only quote the letters of count d'Eſtrades, who was commiſſioned to manage this affair, and conſequently knew more of it than any other. It muſt be ſaid, however, in excuſe of mr. Echard and dr. Burnet, that when they wrote this part of their hiſtories, count d'Eſtrades's letters, concerning the Dunkirk negociation, were not publiſhed, and that they knew no more of this affair, than what they had received from the earl of Clarendon's friends.

Count d'Eſtrades, being embaſſador at London the begining of the year 1662, had ſecretly agreed with his Majeſty, that the French King ſhould ſupply him with a certain ſum of money, to inable him to aſſiſt Portugal. But this was to be kept very ſecret, becauſe of the Pyrenean treaty, by which Lewis had ſolemnly ingaged to give no aſſiſtance to Portugal, either directly or indirectly. This ſecret, however, took air, and occaſioned a letter from Lewis to count d'Eſtrades, dated the fourth of March, in which are theſe words: "——— You may tell "the King of England, that what is known here "of the money of Havre, came from Fox him-"ſelf, who has not been very careful to keep the "ſecret. This was partly the cauſe of all the ſenſe-"leſs noiſe made in Paris, which doubtleſs muſt "have reached London, that I am treating for "Dunkirk with the ſaid King for a ſum of money, "in order to exchange it with the King of Spain, "for Cambray, or Aire, and St. Omer. You "know better than any man, whether I had ever "ſuch a thought."

It is not unlikely, that this was an inſinuation which begot in Charles the thought of ſelling Dunkirk to France; but the ſale was not mentioned till ſome months after. Count d'Eſtrades being returned to France in April this year, was appointed embaſſador extraordinary to Holland. But as he was on his journey, he received a letter from the King of England, of the ſeventeenth of July, deſiring him to come to London, where he wiſhed to communicate to him an affair propoſed by the chancellor. Count d'Eſtrades, with his maſter's leave, went to London, and there received from him a letter, in which he told him, "——— You may "gueſs with what impatience I expect the arrival "of your packet, which is to inform me of the "reaſon of the King of Great Britain's deſiring to "ſpeak with you, and obliging you to defer your "journey to Holland, &c."

As all the other letters, till October, ſhew, that count d'Eſtrades was imployed only in this negociation during his ſtay at London, there is no reaſon to doubt, that the firſt propoſition for Dunkirk's ſale, came from England.

As to the part the earl of Clarendon acted in this affair, clearly appears in a letter of the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, written by count d'Eſtrades to the King his maſter, wherein he gives an account of a conference he had with the earl of Clarendon. Theſe are his words: "The chancellor added, that the "thought of this treaty came from him, and did "not conceal, that the neceſſity of the Engliſh "affairs had inſpired him with it. That the "King, the duke of York, and himſelf, were "alone of this opinion, and that Monk, the lord-"treaſurer, and the earl of Sandwich were ſtill to "be managed, whom he could not hope to gain, "but by the great ſums which would accrue to the "King: that having already propoſed it to them "from the urgent occaſions of the ſtate, they had "offered an expedient to preſerve the place "for the King, and eaſe him of this expenſe.——

Charles II. An' 1662.

"I muſt not forget to tell your Majeſty, that the "chancellor hinted to me, that the King had pre-"cautions to obſerve with the Queen his mother "on this affair: that therefore the King had told "the Queen, that his ſending for me into Eng-"land, was to deſire my application to your Ma-"jeſty, for a ſum of money to be lent him in his "preſſing neceſſities, and that he had ordered the "chancellor to confer with me upon it. The chan-"cellor added, that the King and he were "agreed, that the King ſhould complain much "of my non-compliance, with regard to this "loan, and that the chancellor particularly ſhould "tell the Queen, by way of ſecret, that I was a "ſtrange man, and he very much miſtaken, if by "what I had ſaid to him, I did not intend to de-"mand for ſecurity of this loan, ſome cautionary "town, as England had formerly done by France "and Holland, in a like caſe: but that he had "pretended not to underſtand me, as being a de-"mand to which he would never adviſe his maſ-"ter to conſent. All this diſguiſe is uſed to pre-"pare the Queen to believe, that ſhe knew ſome-"thing of the treaty, if it ſhould come to a con-"cluſion, and that neceſſity was the motive to it. I "am likewiſe to complain of the chancellor, as of a "man who blindly deſires to procure advantages "for his maſter, without regarding the intereſt of "your Majeſty. The whole proceeding confirms "me in the opinion, that they have a mind to a "treaty, and that they are reaſonable in every "thing but the price."

In another letter of the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, count d'Eſtrades wrote to the King, that the chancellor told him,——"That when it ſhould be "known for how ſmall a ſum this treaty was to be "made, the King could not avoid reproach, and "that, at the leaſt, he (the chancellor) would be "liable to public cenſure, which might indanger "his life. That therefore it was his opinion to "make a preſent of it to your Majeſty, and leave "the reward to your generoſity: but as he was not "maſter, and was highly concerned to take care "of himſelf in ſo nice an affair, he was obliged "to conceal his ſentiments, and pretend to adhere "to thoſe of others, that he might not be taken "for the principal author of the treaty.——He far-"ther inlarged upon the importance of this place, "and the advantages which your Majeſty might "receive from it, if you ſhould ever deſign to "make conqueſts upon Flanders, &c."

Theſe letters demonſtrate, that the earl of Clarendon, ſon of the chancellor, was ill-informed, when he told dr. Burnet that his father kept himſelf intirely out of that affair. It may however be ſaid, p. 173. in the chancellor's juſtification, that poſſibly the thought of ſelling Dunkirk came firſt from King Charles; that perhaps the chancellor indeavored to diſſuade him from it, and not ſucceeding, had a mind to give him a proof of his obedience, in taking this negociation upon himſelf, in order to manage it to the King's advantage. For dr. Burnet, in his character of this miniſter, obſerves, that tho' a reſolution was taken contrary to his ſentiment, he executed it with the ſame zeal, as if propoſed by himſelf. But this is only a bare poſſibility, which every one will regard as he ſees beſt.

Three regicides executed. Echard. Ludlow. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 662.

While the King and his firſt miniſter were imployed in this negociation, three of the late King's judges, who had found means to eſcape out of the kingdom, were publicly executed at Tyburn. They had, after wandering thro' Low and High-Germany, ſetled for ſome time at Hanaw under borrowed names, and returned in the ſpring to Delft in Holland, having appointed their wives to meet them them there, in order to learn the ſtate of affairs in England, and what hopes were left for them; but ſir George Downing, the King's reſident at the Hague, and formerly of their party, having intercepted their letters, obtained the conſent of the States to ſeize and put them on board an Engliſh veſſel, which brought them to England, where they were executed. The names of theſe three Regicides were Corbet, Okey, and Berkſtead.

Proceedings againſt Vane and Lambert. June 2. State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 231.

This execution was followed with the trial and condemnation of ſir Henry Vane and general Lambert, who had been particularly excepted in the act of indemnity, tho' they were not among the King's judges, becauſe they were conſidered as the chief authors of the troubles. Vane had been confined, ſoon after the King's arrival, on a bare ſuſpicion of framing ſome plot againſt the ſtate. But tho' he was excepted in the act, he had, by means of his friends, found ſo much favor from the ſame houſe of commons, who had excepted him, that they petitioned the King, jointly with the peers, that he might not ſuffer death, which was granted. He was therefore kept in priſon without being tried, till the time I am ſpeaking of. But this ſecond parliament being compoſed of men of a different character from the firſt, the commons addreſſed the King to bring him as well as Lambert to their trials. In vain did he allege in his defenſe the petition of the firſt parliament, and many other reaſons; he was ſentenced to die as a traitor. Lambert was alſo tried and condemned, but was reprieved at the bar, juſt as ſentence was about being pronounced. He was confined in the iſle of Guernſey, where he lived a priſoner thirty-ſix years (1). Sir Henry Vane met not with the ſame favor from the King. This, it is pretended, was owing to his inſolent behavior at his trial. But many believed him a ſacrifice to the manes of the earl of Strafford, to whoſe death he had greatly contributed. His indiſcretion and inſolence, as well at his trial as his execution, have been extremely aggravated. But it is eaſy to ſee it was only to ſave the King's honor, who having poſitively promiſed a pardon to all except the King's judges, could not avoid granting a pardon to Vane, without violating his promiſe, and eſpecially after ſparing his life at the requeſt of the late parliament (2). It was much apprehended he would inſiſt upon this point in his laſt ſpeech, therefore drummers were placed under the ſcaffold, who, as ſoon as he began to ſpeak, upon a ſign given, drowned his voice. All the favor he could obtain from the King, was to be beheaded. Great care was taken after his death to publiſh the King's inclination to pardon him, if he had not been provoked by his inſolence. But this is a thing very difficult to prove.

The Preſbyterian miniſters quit their livings rather than ſubmit to the act of uniformity. Kennet's Regiſter. p. 747, &c. Baxter's Life. Burnet.

St. Bartholomew's day being come (3), on which the act of uniformity was to take place, two thouſand Preſbyterian miniſters choſe rather to quit their livings, than ſubmit to the conditions therein contained. It was expected, that a diviſion would have happened among them, and that a great number would have choſe rather to conform to the church of England, than be reduced to beggary. It was not therefore without great ſurpriſe, that they were all ſeen to ſtand out, not ſo much as one ſuffered himſelf to be tempted (4). As this is a conſiderable event of this reign, it will not be improper to inquire into the cauſes of this rigor againſt the Preſbyterians: I ſay the Preſbyterians, becauſe it was not the other ſects that the church of England moſt dreaded.

CHARLES II. AN' 1662.

A remark upon it.

1. It cannot be denied, that the High-church-men, who prevailed in parliament, acted in a ſpirit of revenge. But this revenge ſhould not appear very ſtrange, conſidering the perſecution, and at laſt, the intire deſtruction, brought upon the Epiſcopal church by the Preſbyterians, if honor had not been wounded, nor any promiſe made to the party. The church of England was the national church, which had flouriſhed from the reformation, to the time of the war between Charles I and the parliament, when the Preſbyterians intirely ſubverted it. It was therefore but juſt to reſtore it to its former condition. But it was injuſtice to violate the promiſe made to the Preſbyterians, eſpecially as they had greatly contributed to the King's reſtoration, and withal, to that of the very church which perſecuted them, after being re-eſtabliſhed by their aſſiſtance.

2. But revenge was not the ſole cauſe of the preſent rigor exerciſed againſt them. The deſire of ſelf-preſervation was no leſs concerned. Experience of what had paſſed, taught the church of England, that if the Preſbyterians ſhould ever find an opportunity like that which they once had, they would not fail to improve it. They were always irreconcileable enemies, tho' in the preſent juncture they were unable to do any hurt, and obliged to ſue for mercy. It was therefore undoubtedly, the intereſt of the church of England, to uſe all poſſible precautions to hinder the increaſe of a party already too powerful, and which, probably, would never ceaſe contending for the ſuperiority.

3. We have ſeen what were the notions of this parliament, and of High-church, concerning the Royal prerogative, and to what height it was carried. The Preſbyterians, as well as the other ſects, were known to follow quite contrary maxims, and if they were not intirely Republicans, at leaſt, they indeavored to reduce the Royal power within very narrow bounds, as appeared in the reſolutions and conduct of the parliament of 1640. But while the church of England had no ſuſpicion of the King's religion, and believed him a zealous member, it was her intereſt to ſupport and extend the prerogative, and conſequently to diſable the Preſbyterians from proſecuting their maxims.

4. The church of England's intereſt required, that ſhe ſhould improve ſo favorable an opportunity, which perhaps might never return. It was ſeen, how greedy the King was of money, to throw it away with the greateſt profuſion, and that he could not be without the aſſiſtance of his parliament, and the church had the good fortune to have a parliament conſiſting of her moſt zealous members; and diſpoſed to ſacrifice to the King a little of the nation's

(2) His friends perſuaded him to make ſome ſubmiſſion to the King, in order ſo ſave his life; but he ſaid, "If the King "did not think himſelf more concerned for his honor and word, than he did for his life, he was very willing they ſhould "take it. Nay, I declare (ſaid he) that I value my life leſs in a good cauſe, than the King can do his promiſe." State Trials, Vol. II. p. 455.

(3) The Preſbyterians remembered, what a St. Bartholomew's had been held at Paris ninety years before, which was the day of that maſſacre, and did not ſtick to compare the one with the other. Burnet, p. 185.——There was a great debate in council a little before St. Bartholomew's day, whether the act of uniformity ſhould be punctually executed or not. Some moved to have the execution of it delayed till the next ſeſſion of parliament. Others were for executing it in the main, that is, to let ſome eminent men preach in their churches, till they ſhould die, and to put curates to read the Common-prayer. The earl of Manchester laid all theſe things before the King with much zeal. Sheldon, on the other hand, preſſed the execution of the law. Id. p. 192.

(4) Burnet inſinuates, that their leaders took great pains to have them all ſtick together, infuſing it into them, that if great numbers ſtood out, it would ſhew their ſtrength, and produce new laws in their favor.——So it was thought, that many went out in the crowd to keep their friends company, p. 192.

treaſure,

Charles II. An' 1662.

treaſure, provided the King would, in his turn, make them a ſacrifice of the Preſbyterians. Tho' he was not ſuſpected to be a Papiſt, it could not be thought, he would, from a pure principle of honor and honeſty, quarrel with a parliament ſo favorable to him, for the ſake of the Preſbyterians, whom he neither did, nor had reaſon to love. There was nothing therefore but what might be expected from his complaiſance, provided care was taken to ſupply him with money. Such a juncture was not to be neglected.

5. But there was another ſtill more powerful cauſe of the parliament's ſeverity againſt the Preſbyterians. This was the intereſt of the Papiſts, who had ever a great influence during this reign. Some made an open profeſſion of their religion, and yet were looked upon with a very favorable eye by the court. Others, after the King's example, pretended to be good Proteſtants, and zealous members of the church of England, in order to be more ſerviceable to their party. The firſt uſed their utmoſt indeavors to incite the parliament to treat the Preſbyterians ſeverely, in order to deſtroy a party which had ſo openly declared againſt the Royal prerogative. The others concealing themſelves under a falſe zeal for the Proteſtant religion, labored with the ſame ardor, to excite the enmity of the heads of the church of England, and of thoſe whom they knew to be moſt warm, againſt men, who would not ſpare them, if they ever ſhould have it in their power to ruin them, as they had manifeſtly ſhewn. But while they were thus zealouſly laboring to bring things to extremities, they were alſo indeavoring, on the other hand, by their emiſſaries, to incourage the Preſbyterians, and exhort them to the cloſeſt union, by inſinuating it to be the moſt effectual means to defeat the meaſures of their enemies. They were told, their number was ſo great, that, in all likelihood, it would deter the parliament from attempting the ruin of ſo many at once, for fear of exciting new troubles. Whereas, if their party ſhould divide, they would be inſenſibly and irrecoverably loſt. In ſhort, to induce them the more eaſily not to deſpair, they were told, the King, provoked with the ill treatment they received, notwithſtanding his promiſe to them, would protect them openly if they would remain united; but a diviſion would put it out of his power to do them any ſervice. It is certain, the court was in this diſpoſition, not from any pity to the Preſbyterians, or regard to the King's honor, but from the hopes that the union among the Non-conformiſts would procure them more favorable conditions, of which the Papiſts might make an advantage. But when I ſay the court, I do not pretend to include the earl of Clarendon, tho' prime miniſter. This juſtice muſt be done him, to ſay, that not only he did not contribute to the deſigns of the King and the Papiſts, but was the man who broke their meaſures, by ſecret intrigues, well knowing what was concealed under this feigned moderation of the King to the Preſbyterians. However, the King, the duke of York, and the other leading Papiſts, believed it neceſſary, to puſh the Preſbyterians, and then incourage them to hold together, that the danger ariſing from their union might prevail with the parliament to grant to all the Non-conformiſts in general, a toleration which ſhould extend to the Papiſts. This is not a bare conjecture. All the King's proceedings demonſtrate this was the project he had formed.

Burnet, p. 124. Kennet.

Charles II. An' 1662.

I have already mentioned the corporation act, made to prevent diſaffected perſons from being admited into offices. For the better executing this act, the parliament appointed commiſſioners, who were imployed all this year in viſiting corporations, and inſpecting the conduct of the members. A very extenſive power was given to theſe commiſſioners, with abſolute authority to turn out of the corporations, all members who were in the leaſt ſuſpected. For the deſign of this act was to diveſt of all credit, every perſon not intirely devoted to the King and the church of England. This power was exerciſed with all imaginable rigor: ſo that the corporations had not one member left, who was not of the ſame principles with the houſe of commons. Moreover, the walls of Gloceſter, Coventry, Northampton, Leiceſter and Taunton were, by order of theſe commiſſioners, demoliſhed, becauſe theſe towns had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their fidelity to the parliament.

Rigorous execution of the corporation act. Heath, p. 512.

About the end of the year a conſpiracy was diſcovered, formed by the Fifth-Monarchy-men, and upon the informations of ſome of the complices, ſix were executed. Nevertheleſs, many believed, this was only an artifice to excuſe the ſeverity practiſed againſt the Non-conformiſts. The ground of this ſuſpicion was, that in a plot formed to ſeize and kill the King, the duke of York, and general Monk, and to ſeize the Tower, and caſtle of Windſor, only ſix conſpirators were diſcovered, namely, George Phillips a ſerjeant of foot, Thomas Tonge a diſtiller, Francis Stubbs a cheeſemonger, James Hind a gunner, John Sellers a compaſs-maker, and Nathaniel Gibbs a felt-maker. Few could believe that ſuch men ſhould ever think of ſucceeding in a deſign of that nature. It is true, that to render this conſpiracy more probable, it was ſaid, the old colonels were to aſſemble their diſbanded forces, and Ludlow, then in Switzerland, to come and head them. But tho' ſuch an undertaking required perſons of ſome diſtinction, yet only theſe ſix wretches who were executed (1), could be diſcovered. At leaſt, if the conſpiracy was real, the plotters had yet made no great progreſs (2).

Six conſpirators executed, Dec. 22.

To finiſh the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this year, I ſhall briefly add, that after the earl of Sandwich left Liſbon, to conduct the Queen into England, vice-admiral Lawſon, ſailed with a ſquadron to Algier, and forced thoſe people to a peace with England. As the King was in poſſeſſion of Tangier, they doubtleſs believed it would not be advantageous to have him for their enemy. Shortly after, the King declared Tangier a free port, and inveſted it with great privileges.

Peace with Algier. October 5. Collect. of Treaties, Vol. III. p. 264, 267.

The King had already diſcovered, how agreeable it would be to him to have the management of the uniformity act, but the parliament had returned no anſwer to his deſire. Before this act, the Preſbyterians had behaved in a manner which gave no juſt cauſe of complaint againſt them, and the King had made them a poſitive promiſe, either that he would never conſent to the act, or procure them a particular exemption; but he performed neither: his aim having been only to keep them united, by giving them hopes of his protection. After the act was paſſed, he ſtill continued feeding their expectations; and hence it was, that they addreſſed the King and council, for a diſpenſatiom from the penalties annexed to the uniformity bill. This petition would doubtleſs have been rejected, if his Majeſty had not ſignified to the council the obligation

The King's conduct to the Preſbyterians.

(1) Only Phillips, Tonge, Gibbs, and Stubbs, were executed. John Sellers was afterwards made the King's Hydrographer, and publiſhed ſeveral maps, charts &c. See Heath, p. 513.

(2) However, as Ludlow obſerves, this ſerved the court for a pretenſe to ſeize five or ſix hundred perſons; to diſarm all thoſe they ſuſpected; to make thoſe they had taken give bonds not to take up arms againſt the King; and to increaſe their ſtanding guards. Vol. III. p. 114.

he was under to grant their requeſt. Some time after he publiſhed a declaration, dated the twenty-ſixth of December, but it did not appear till the begining of January 1662-3. In this declaration, after an aſſurance of his firm adherence to the act of uniformity, he ſaid however, that for the ſake of others, he was willing to diſpenſe with ſome matters in it (1). Upon this declaration, mr. Calamy, a Preſbyterian miniſter, being in the church * of which he had the cure before the execution of the act, and finding the miniſter, who was expected, did not come, aſcended the pulpit and preached, for which he was commited to Newgate by the lord-mayor of London. But in a few days he was diſcharged by the King's expreſs order.

His Majeſty, as we have ſeen, intended to gain ſome advantages for the Preſbyterians, in order to procure the ſame for the Papiſts. This was his ſcheme, and as it was directly contrary to the earl of Clarendon's principles, mortal enemy of the Preſbyterians, and no friend of the Papiſts, it is not ſurpriſing, it ſhould be formed without this miniſter's privity, whoſe credit, for that reaſon, began now to decline. Nay, the King had plainly ſhewn, he had not the ſame affection for him, by obliging his intimate friend ſecretary Nicholas, worn out with age, to reſign his poſt to the chancellor's profeſſed enemy, ſir Henry Bennet, afterwards earl of Arlington. This ſufficiently diſcovered, that his intereſt with the King was ſenſibly diminiſhed. On the contrary, tho' the King affected great zeal for the Proteſtant religion, the choice of Bennet to be ſecretary of ſtate, ſhewed his inclination for the Roman Catholic, as Bennet was ſtrongly ſuſpected of being a Papiſt in his heart, and known for their Protector. It is ſaid, he and the earl of Briſtol had induced the King to change his religion at Fontarabia, and that Bennet durſt not return to England, till after the death of the lord Culpeper, who had threatened him to diſcover it to the parliament. Be this as it will, Bennet being Clarendon's enemy, this laſt could not but eſteem his adverſary's advancement to the poſt of his intimate friend, as a prelude to his own diſgrace.

The King's deſign in favoring the Preſbyterians.

The King's declaration in favor of the Preſbyterians, was a farther indication of the chancellor's fall. This declaration had been reſolved and prepared, without his knowlege, at Somerſet-houſe, where the Queen-mother reſided, and probably by a Catholic junto, or by ſecret favorers of that religion. Thoſe who knew Clarendon's principles, readily judged, he had no hand in it. They had reaſon to be afterwards confirmed in their opinion, when every one evidently ſaw, the King, in his pretended compaſſion for the Preſbyterians, deſigned only to procure a toleration for the Catholics. The chancellor, however, kept his poſt for ſome years, tho' his credit was greatly diminiſhed.

The parliament meeting the eighteenth of February, the King made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he confined himſelf to one ſingle point, namely, his declaration concerning the uniformity act. His words were theſe:

" ——— To cure the diſtempers, and compoſe " the different minds among us, I ſet forth my de- " claration of the twenty-ſixth of December, in " which you may ſee, I am willing to ſet bounds " to the hopes of ſome, and to the fears of others; " of which, when you ſhall have examined well " the grounds, I doubt not but I ſhall have your " concurrence therein. The truth is, I am, in my " nature, an enemy to all ſeverity for religion and " conſcience, how miſtaken ſoever it be, when it " extends to capital and ſanguinary puniſhments, " which I am told were begun in Popiſh times: " therefore, when I ſay this, I hope I ſhall not " need to warn any here, not to infer from thence, " I mean to favor Popery. CHARLES II. AN' 1662.

The commons are alarmed. Ibid.

This ſpeech, with the declaration of the twenty-ſixth of December, alarmed the houſe of commons. It may almoſt be affirmed, that whatever the commons had done in favor of the King, was only to procure his aſſent to the act of uniformity, and yet they ſaw him not only diſpenſe with this act, but even deſire a power to diſpenſe with it, that is, to ſet it aſide when he pleaſed: that this was not only in favor of the Preſbyterians, who had a better claim to indulgence than the other ſects, but moreover, in favor of all the Non-conformiſts. Nay, it was eaſy to perceive, from what he ſaid concerning the Catholics, that his intention was, in caſe his deſires were complied with, to prevent their being diſtinguiſhed from the Proteſtant ſects. This juſtice ought to be done to the High-church party, that tho' their enemies frequently brand them for Papiſts, on account of their extreme attachment to certain forms and ceremonies, yet are they as far removed from the eſſence of Popery, as the other Epiſcopalians, and even the Preſbyterians themſelves: this they have demonſtrated on ſeveral very remarkable occaſions.

The houſe of commons, which, as I ſaid, was chiefly compoſed of High church men, found in the King's demand, two articles equally oppoſite to their principles, namely, indulgence for the Preſbyterians, and indulgence for the Catholics. Wherefore they reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the King, wherein, after the neceſſary compliments, they proceeded in the manner following:

(1) His words are, "——As for what concerns the penalties upon thoſe who (living peaceably) do not conform thro' ſcruple " and tenderneſs of miſguided conſcience, but modeſtly, and without ſcandal, perform their devotions in their own way, we ſhall " make it our ſpecial care, without invading the freedom of parliament, to incline their wiſdom at this next approaching ſeſſions, " to concur with us in making ſome ſuch act for that purpoſe, as may inable us to exerciſe with a more univerſal ſatisfaction, that " power of diſpenſing, which we conceive to be inherent in us."

Addreſs of the commons about the King's declaration. Feb. 27. Phillips. Kennet. Echard.

"——It is with extreme unwillingneſs and reluctancy of heart, that we are brought to differ from any thing which your Majeſty has thought fit to propoſe: and tho' we do no way doubt, but that the unreaſonable diſtempers of ſome men's ſpirits, and the many mutinies and conſpiracies which were carried on during the late intervals of parliament, did reaſonably incline your Majeſty to indeavor, by your declaration, to give ſome allay to thoſe ill humors, till the parliament aſſembled; and the hopes of indulgence, if the parliament ſhould conſent to it; eſpecially ſeeing the pretenders to this indulgence, did ſeem to make ſome titles to it, by virtue of your Majeſty's declaration from Breda. Nevertheleſs, we your Majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, who are now returned to ſerve in parliament from thoſe ſeveral parts and places of your kingdom for which we were choſen, do humbly offer to your Majeſty's great wiſdom, that it is in no ſort adviſeable, that there be any indulgence to ſuch perſons who preſume to diſſent from the act of uniformity, and the religion eſtabliſhed: for theſe reaſons we have conſidered the nature of your Majeſty's declaration from Breda, and are humbly of opinion, that your Majeſty ought not to be preſſed with it any further; 1. Becauſe it is not a promiſe in itſelf, but only a gracious declaration of your Majeſty's intentions, to do what in you lay, and what a parliament ſhould adviſe your Majeſty to do; and no ſuch advice was ever given or thought fit to be offered, nor could it be otherwiſe underſtood, becauſe there were laws of uniformity then in being, which could not be diſpenſed with but by act of parliament. 2. They who do pretend a right to that ſuppoſed promiſe, put the right into the hands of their repreſentatives, whom they choſe to ſerve for them in this parliament, who have paſſed, and your Majeſty conſented to the act of uniformity. If any ſhall preſume to ſay, that a right to the benefit of this declaration doth ſtill remain after this act paſſed, 3. It tends to diſſolve the very bonds of government, and to ſuppoſe a diſability in your Majeſty and the houſes of parliament, to make a law contrary to any part of your Majeſty's declaration, tho' both houſes ſhould adviſe your Majeſty to it.

"We have alſo conſidered the nature of the indulgence propoſed, with reference to thoſe conſequences which muſt neceſſarily attend it. 1. It will eſtabliſh ſchiſm by a law, and make the whole government of the church precarious, and the cenſures of it of no moment or conſideration at all. 2. It will no way become the gravity or wiſdom of a parliament, to paſs a law at one ſeſſion for uniformity, and at the next ſeſſion (the reaſons of uniformity continuing ſtill the ſame) to paſs another law to fruſtrate or weaken the execution of it. 3. It will expoſe your Majeſty to the reſtleſs importunity of every ſect or opinion, and of every ſingle perſon alſo, who ſhall preſume to diſſent from the church of England. 4. It will be a cauſe of increaſing ſects and ſectaries, whoſe numbers will weaken the true Proteſtant profeſſion ſo far, that it will at leaſt be difficult for it to defend itſelf againſt them: and which is further conſiderable, thoſe numbers, which by being troubleſome to the government, find they can arrive to an indulgence, will, as their numbers increaſe, be yet more troubleſome, that ſo at length they may arrive to a general toleration, which your Majeſty hath deeclared againſt, and in time ſome prevalent ſect will at laſt contend for an eſtabliſhment; which, for ought can be foreſeen, may end in Popery. 5. It is a thing altogether without precedent, and it will take away all means of convicting recuſants, and be inconſiſtent with the method and proceedings of the laws of England. Laſtly, it is humbly conceived, that the indulgence propoſed will be ſo far from tending to the peace of the kingdom, that it is rather likely to occaſion great diſturbance. And on the contrary, that the aſſerting of the laws and the religion eſtabliſhed, according to the act of uniformity, is the moſt probable means to produce a ſetled peace and obedience throughout your kingdom; becauſe the variety of profeſſions in religion, when openly indulged, doth directly diſtinguiſh men into parties, and withal gives them opportunity to count their numbers; which, conſidering the animoſities that out of a religious pride will be kept on foot by the ſeveral factions, doth tend directly and inevitably to open diſturbance. Nor can your Majeſty have any ſecurity, that the doctrine or the worſhip of the ſeveral factions, which are all governed by a ſeveral rule, ſhall be conſiſtent with the peace of your kingdom. And if any perſon ſhall preſume to diſturb the peace of the kingdom, we do in all humility declare, That we will for ever, and on all occaſions, be ready with our utmoſt indeavors and aſſiſtance to adhere to, and ſerve your Majeſty, according to our bounden duty and allegiance."

Charles II. An° 1662.

This addreſs, notwithſtanding the weakneſs of the reaſons alleged in it, produced the effect the commons expected, which was, to let the King know, it would be in vain to indeavor obtaining from the parliament a power to diſpenſe with the uniformity act. He anſwered in writing, about three weeks after, that he was unwilling to reply to their reaſons, tho' he found he had been miſunderſtood, but renewed his thanks for their declaration to aſſiſt him againſt any perſon that ſhould preſume to diſturb the peace of the kingdom.

The King's anſwer. March 16. Echard.

As in his Majeſty's ſpeech and declaration, there were two articles which gave an alarm to the parliament, the one relating to the Non-conformiſts in general, the other concerning the Papiſts in particular, the commons, after acting againſt the former, reſolved alſo to proceed againſt the latter. To this purpoſe, they obtained the concurrence of the lords, for an addreſs to be jointly preſented to the King, wherein both houſes ſaid, "That his Majeſty's lenity towards the Papiſts, had drawn into the kingdom a great number of Romiſh prieſts and and Jeſuits: they were therefore humble ſuitors to him, to iſſue out a proclamation to command all Jeſuits, and all Engliſh, Iriſh, and Scotiſh Popiſh prieſts, and all ſuch other prieſts as have taken orders from the ſee of Rome, or by authority thereof (except ſuch foreign Jeſuits or prieſts, as by contract of marriage are to attend the perſons of either of the Queen's, or by the law of nations to attend foreign ambaſſadors) to depart this kingdom by a day, under pain of having the penalties of the law inflicted upon them." The King anſwered in writing: "That he was not a little troubled, that his lenity and condeſcenſion towards many of the Popiſh perſuaſion (which were but natural effects of his generoſity and good nature, after having lived ſo many years in the dominions of Roman Catholic Princes; and out of a juſt memory of what many of them have done and ſuffered in the ſervice of his father and himſelf) had been made ſo ill uſe of, and ſo ill deſerved, that the reſort of Jeſuits and prieſts into this kingdom, had been thereby increaſed, with which his Majeſty was and is highly offended. But that he would iſſue out a proclamation as he was deſired,

"desired, and take care it should be more effectual "than any proclamation of that kind had ever "been. He declared farther to both houses, and "all his loving subjects, That as his affection and "zeal for the Protestant religion, and the church "of England, had not been concealed or un-taken "notice of in the world, so he was not, nor ever "would be, so sollicitous for the setling his own "revenue, or providing for the peace and tran-"quillity of the kingdom, as for the advancement "and improvement of the religion established, and "for the using and applying all proper and ef-"fectual remedies to hinder the growth of Popery, "both which he in truth looked upon the best ex-"pedients to establish the peace and prosperity of "all his kingdoms."

A proclama- against Romish priests. April 9. Ibid. Kennet's Hist.

Accordingly the proclamation was published, but no better observed than all those published for the same purpose, since the begining of the reign of James I. As it was not then known the King was a Catholic, his assurances of zeal for the Protestant faith were taken for so many truths, which removed all suspicion of his having the least design to restore that religion in England. As we are now better informed, we are better able to judge of his intentions.

The King demands a supply; June 12. Echard.

This affair being terminated, the commons proceeded next to examine the state of the King's ordinary revenue, and to think of means to raise it according to their promise, to twelve hundred thousand pounds (1). But as this affair required a long discussion, the King, who designed an immediate prorogation of the parliament, thought proper to make an attempt for a speedy and extraordinary supply from the commons, till his revenues should be setled. For this purpose he sent for them to the banqueting-house, and in a speech, the most flattering, pathetic, and affectionate, he had ever yet made, demanded a present supply of money, without which he assured them it was impossible to struggle with the difficulties under which he labored. He offered to shew, that the twelve hundred thousand pounds formerly granted him, had been, to the last penny, disposed of for the public service. But he well knew there was no danger in the offer, tho' it was not easy to imagine to what public use this money had been applied.

has it granted.

However that be, the commons, moved with the King's great affection for his people, and his ardent zeal for the Protestant religion, granted him four intire subdies, and the clergy in convocation, following their example, gave him the same.

The chancellor's credit declines. Echard.

Mean time, the earl of Clarendon's credit daily declined, not that his affection for the King was lessened, but, probably, because the King, entering into new projects advantageous neither to the state nor religion, did not believe this minister a proper instrument to assist him in the execution thereof. If the chancellor's enemies had met with incouragement from the King, he would have been already disgraced; but his services, affection, and fidelity, as well during the King's exile, as since his restoration, could not be easily forgot. Wherefore he was continued, not only in his post, but even in some degree of favor, which made the Papists fear, he would at last recover his credit, and break all their measures. This probably ingaged the earl of Bristol, a professed Papist, to indeavor the chancellor's utter destruction, by impeaching him before the lords of high-treason, believing doubtless, the King would not be displeased to see him fall by this means, without his having any hand in it.

Burnet, p. 196, 197.

But if it was easy to accuse the chancellor, it was difficult to draw an impeachment so plausible and coherent as to make him appear criminal. The articles exhibited against him by the earl of Bristol, were to this effect:

CHARLES II. AN' 1663.

Articles of accusation against him. July 10. State-trials, Vol. II. p. 550. Kennet.

1. That he had indeavored to alleniate the hearts of his Majesty's subjects, by artfully insinuating to his creatures and dependents, That his Majesty was inclined to Popery, and designed to alter the established religion.

2. He had said to several persons of his Majesty's privy-council, "That his Majesty was dangerously "corrupted in his religion, and inclined to "Popery: that persons of that religion had such "access, and such credit with him, that unless "there were a careful eye had unto it, the Protes-"tant religion would be overthrown in this king-"dom."

3. Upon his Majesty's admiting sir Henry Bennet to be secretary of state, in the place of sir Edward Nicholas, he said, "That his Majesty had "given ten thousand pounds to remove a zealous "Protestant, that he might bring into that place "of high trust a concealed Papist.

4. In pursuance of the same traiterous design, several friends and dependents of his have said aloud, "That were it not for my lord chan-"cellor's standing in the gap, Popery would be "introduced into this kingdom.".

5. That he had persuaded the King contrary to his reason, to allow his name to be used to the Pope and several cardinals, in the sollicitation of a cardinal's cap for the lord Aubigney, great almoner to the Queen: in order to effect which, he had imployed mr. Richard Bealing, a known Papist; and had likewise applied himself to several Popish priests and jesuits for the same purpose, promising great favor to the priests here, in case it should be effected.

6. That he had likewise promised to several Papists, he would do his indeavor, and said, "He "hoped to compass the taking away all penal "laws against them;" to the end they might presume and grow vain upon his patronage, and by their publishing their hopes of a toleration, increase the scandal indeavored by him to be raised throughout the kingdom.

7. That being intrusted with the treaty betwixt his Majesty, and his royal consort the Queen, he concluded it upon articles scandalous and dangerous to the Protestant religion: moreover he brought the King and Queen together, without any setled agreement about the performance of marriage-rites: whereby the Queen refusing to be married by a Protestant priest, in case of her being with child, either the succession should be made uncertain for want of due rites of matrimony, or else his Majesty be exposed to a suspicion of his being married in his own dominions by a Romish priest.

8. That having indeavored to alienate the affections of the King's subjects upon the score of religion, he made use of all malicious scandals and jealousies to raise to himself a popular applause of being "The zealous upholder of the Protestant "Religion."

9. That he further indeavored to alienate the affections of the King's subjects, by venting in his own discourse, and those of his emissaries, opprobrious scandals against his Majesty's person, and course of life, such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless necessity should require it.

(1) The particular branches of the revenues were, the customs, the excise, the crown-lands, the hearth-money, the post-office, the first-fruits and tenths, the coinage, the alienation-office, with other lesser matters, which in all amounted to eleven hundred thousand pounds, or thereabouts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 102.

10. That

Charles II. An' 1663.

10. That he indeavored to alienate the affection of the duke of York, from his Majeſty, by ſuggeſting to him, "That his Majeſty intended to "legitimate the duke of Monmouth."

11. That he had perſuaded the King, againſt the advice of the lord-general, to withdraw the Engliſh garriſons out of Scotland, and demoliſh all the forts built there, at ſo vaſt a charge to this kingdom; and all without expecting the advice of the parliament of England.

12. That he indeavored to alienate his Majeſty's affections and eſteem for his preſent parliament, by telling him, "That there was never ſo "weak and inconſiderable an houſe of lords, nor ne-"ver ſo weak and heady an houſe of commons; "and particularly, That it was better to ſell Dun-"kirk, than to be at their mercy for want of "money."

13. That, contrary to a known law made laſt ſeſſions, by which money was given and applied for the maintaining of Dunkirk, he adviſed and effected the ſale of the ſame to the French King.

14. That he had, contrary to law, inriched himſelf and his creatures by the ſale of offices.

15. That he had converted to his own uſe vaſt ſums of public money raiſed in Ireland by way of ſubſidy, private and public benevolences, and otherwiſe given and intended to defray the charge of the government in that kingdom.

16. That having arrogated to himſelf a ſupreme direction of all his Majeſty's affairs, he had prevailed to have his Majeſty's cuſtoms farmed at a lower rate than others offered, and that by perſons, with ſome of whom he went a ſhare, and other parts of money reſulting from his Majeſty's revenues.

Rejected by the lords. Kennet. Echard.

Without entering into the particulars of this charge, I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, it was unanimouſly rejected, as improbable, and even contradictory (1). For beſide, as the earl of Clarendon was known to be no leſs prejudiced againſt the Papiſts than the Preſbyterians, it could not but appear ſtrange, that an open and declared Papiſt, as the earl of Briſtol was, ſhould accuſe the chancellor of favoring the Romiſh religion, and, on the other hand, of inſinuating, that the King was a Papiſt, in order to alienate the affection of his ſubjects. But what appears ſtill more extraordinary in this impeachment, is, that the inſinuations the chancellor was accuſed of, concerning the King, were true in themſelves, and that the earl of Briſtol pretended to repreſent them as ſlanders.

The revenue of the poſt ſetled on the duke of York. Ibid.

In this ſeſſion, the parliament granted the duke of York the poſt-office revenues (2), and wine-licenſes. Theſe revenues, which afterwards conſiderably increaſed, inabled the duke of York to keep a ſeparate court, and live independent of his brother.

The parliament prorogued. Kennet.

On the twenty-ſeventh of July, the King gave his aſſent to the ſubſidy-act and ſome others, after which he prorogued the parliament to the ſixteenth of March the following year 1663-4.

The King makes a progreſs. Auguſt. Phillips. Echard.

Soon after, the King and Queen made a progreſs into the Weſt, where they were received with great pomp and magnificence, particularly at Oxford. This was only a journey of pleaſure, and after five or ſix weeks ſpent in it, they returned to London in October.

A plot of the Republicans and Independents.

While the King was on his progreſs, a conſpiracy was diſcovered, carried on by the old Republicans and Independents, to reſtore the commonwealth. It is pretended, they were to ſeize ſeveral towns, particularly in the North, where they fancied themſelves ſtrongeſt, and then raiſe a general inſurrection. But being diſcovered by one of the complices, many were apprehended, and twenty-one convicted, and executed the January following. It was aſſured, that Ludlow and Lambert were to head theſe rebels, tho' the firſt never ſtired out of Switzerland, whither he had fled for refuge. As for Lambert, beſide that he never left the Iſle of Guernſey where he was confined, if any proofs had appeared againſt him, he would doubtleſs not have been ſpared. It is true, Ludlow in his Memoirs, ſeems to own, there was, this year, ſome project ſet on foot by the Republicans in England.

This year died dr. Juxon archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was ſucceeded by Gilbert Sheldon biſhop of London (3).

Dr. Juxon dies. June 4, 1663.

The parliament meeting the ſixteenth of March, his Majeſty, in a ſpeech to both houſes, demanded a repeal of the triennial act made in 1641. To come to this demand, he inlarged on the late conſpiracy, which he ſaid was ſtill on foot, and that there were men, who, on pretenſe that this parliament was at an end by ſome clauſe in the triennial bill, fancied they might aſſemble themſelves, and chuſe new members. He deſired the two houſes not to leav an act in being, which paſſed in a time very neglectful of the dignity of the crown, or the ſecurity of the people. Laſtly, he told them, he loved parliaments: that never King was ſo much beholden to them as himſelf, nor did he believe the crown could ever be happy without frequent parliaments: but he would never ſuffer a parliament to aſſemble by the means preſcribed by that bill. He then told them, that the four ſubſidies granted the laſt ſeſſion, had fallen very ſhort of what he expected, or they intended: that the revenues of the exciſe, and tonage and poundage were greatly diminiſhed by the frauds of brewers and merchants, and the tax upon chimnies declined, the laſt half year having brought in leſs than the former. He therefore prayed them to let him have the collecting of this tax by his own officers.

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Kennet. Echard.

An' 1664. The act for triennial parliaments revoked.

The commons returning to their own houſe, proceeded immediately upon a bill to repeal the triennial act, and making another in its room, viz. That the ſiting of parliament ſhould not be diſcontinued above three years at moſt. This bill being ready, and paſſed by the lords, the King came to their houſe the fifth of April, and gave it the Royal aſſent.

Cauſe of the Dutch war. Phillips. Echard. R. Coke.

His Majeſty had ſometime ſince reſolved on a war with Holland: but it is difficult to know the true motive of this reſolution: for the cauſes alleged were only general, except the taking of two ſhips in the Eaſt-Indies, valued at the moſt but at eight or ten thouſand pounds ſterling. If ſome Engiſh hiſtorians are to be credited, the King had no thoughts of this war: the Dutch were aggreſſors, and being incouraged by promiſes of great aſſiſtance from France, fought a quarrel with England. They alſo pretend, it was ſolely at the preſſing inſtances of the parliament, that the King was drawn into it, to revenge the wrongs and damages done by the Dutch to the Engliſh in India, Africa, and elſewhere. But as theſe hiſtorians deſcend not to particulars, but keep to generals, the reader would be very ill informed, if he adhered only to what they ſay. I ſhall therefore relate here what I meet with in others, who more fully explain this matter.

Baſnage.

The twenty-ſeventh of April 1662, the States-general of the United-Provinces made a treaty with the French King, by which both parties ingaged to aſſiſt each other, in caſe of any attack upon either in Europe.

Sept. 24.

The ſame year they made a like treaty of league and alliance with the King of England. This related to another made in 1659, between England and the States before the King's reſtoration, and ſeemed to be renewed only to remove the defect of that of 1659, made on the part of England by an unlawful authority. However, it happened, in the interval between the two treaties, that the Dutch had ſunk or taken two Engliſh ſhips in the Indies, called the Bonadventure and the Good-Hope, which occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between the two powers (1). The Engliſh pretended, theſe two ſhips were attacked without any juſt cauſe, and the Hollanders maintained the contrary. In the treaty of 1662, the affair of theſe two ſhips was again brought on the carpet; but as their value was inconſiderable, it was not thought proper to delay a treaty advantageous to both nations. It was agreed therefore, that the Engliſh ſhould be allowed to proſecute the proceſs commenced on account of theſe ſhips, and the States to depoſite fourſcore thouſand florins by way of ſecurity to pay the full value in caſe the affair was given againſt them. Some time after, another diſpute aroſe on the ſame ſubject, and this was, the King pretended, that the States-general were judges of this proceſs; to which the States replied, that it belonged to the cognizance of the admiralty of Amſterdam, who only had a right to decide it. The affair remained in this ſtate till April this year 1664, when the commons, after an inquiry into the obſtructions of the trade of the nation, voted, and obtained the concurrence of the lords to their vote, "That the wrongs, diſhonors, and indignities done to his Majeſty by the ſubjects of the United Provinces in India, Africa, and elſewhere; and the damages done by them to the Engliſh merchants, are the greateſt obſtructions of the trade of England. That the ſame be ſpeedily preſented to his Majeſty, and he be moved to take ſome effectual courſe for redreſs of theſe injuries, and all other of the like nature, and for prevention of the like for the future. And in proſecution thereof, they will with their lives and fortunes aſſiſt his Majeſty, againſt all oppoſitions whatſoever." In purſuance of this reſolution, the two houſes preſented, the ſame day, an addreſs to the King, to which, on the morrow, they received this anſwer in writing: "That he was pleaſed with their zeal for the advancement of trade, and the removal of all obſtructions which might hinder the ſame; being convinced, that nothing would more contribute to the honor of the nation, and the proſperity of his people. That he would examine the particular complaints which had been repreſented to his parliament, and order his miniſter in Holland to demand ſpeedy reparation, and in caſe of a denial, he relied on their promiſe and declaration to ſtand by him."

Echard. D'Eſtrades.

Vote of the parliament againſt the Dutch. Echard. Kennet. Phillips.

The parliament addreſſes the King.

His anſwer. April 27, 28. Echard.

It is eaſy to perceive, that no particulars were ſpecified either in the addreſs or the anſwer, and that hitherto all was confined to generals. It will afterwards appear, that the Engliſh always kept to the ſame expreſſions, till the negociation of peace, when they were obliged to declare wherein conſiſted the injuries they complained of, the principal of which was found to be the loſs of two ſhips before mentioned. It is now time to ſhew, that when theſe grievances were exhibited to the parliament, the King had before reſolved on war, and that theſe were only complaints deſigned to furniſh a pretenſe, and ingage the parliament to grant him the neceſſary ſupplies to ſupport it.

CHARLES II. AN' 1664.

The States had, ſince the treaty of 1662, great cauſe of complaint againſt the Algerines, notwithſtanding the peace concluded with them in 1661. England was no leſs concerned than the States in the depredations commited by the Algerines upon all ſorts of ſhips, and therefore their High Mightineſſes deſired the King of England to join a ſquadron of his ſhips with a fleet they were equiping, to oblige the Algerines to a more exact obſervation of the peace. His Majeſty anſwered, he had rather act ſeparately.

After this anſwer, the States ſent Ruyten into the Mediterranean, with a ſquadron of twelve ſhips, and the King ſent thither twenty ſail under the command of Lawſon. Theſe two fleets departed in May this year, and about the ſame time the duke of York, as governor of the Royal African company, ſent vice-admiral Holms to Cape Verde, with a ſquadron of fourteen men of war, to take all poſſible advantage againſt the Dutch Eaſt-India company. Lawſon meeting Ruyter in the Mediterranean, was ſaluted by the Dutch admiral, but returned not the compliment, tho' contrary to what had been ſtipulated in the treaty of 1662. It is not neceſſary to take notice here of the little ſucceſs Lawſon and Ruyter had againſt the Algerines. What Holms did at Cape Verde is much more important.

Baſnage. Kennet. Burchett. R. Coke.

In the months of Auguſt and September, Holms made himſelf maſter of fort St. Andrew, and moſt other places belonging to the Dutch in the neighborhood of Cape Verde, and, after taking the fort built on the Cape itſelf, he gave it the name of York. He erected a fort in the mouth of the river Gambia, and then ſailing for Guinea, ſeized all the forts the Dutch had on the coaſt, except fort Achin and fort St. George de Mina. After this, he returned to England. Now, if it be conſidered, that Holms ſailed from England in May, or June at lateſt; that ſome time was required to equip this fleet; and that the parliament's addreſs was preſented to the King but the twenty-ſeventh of April, it will be eaſily perceived, that the war was reſolved in England before any complaints of depredations commited by the Dutch were repreſented to the parliament, and that theſe complaints were only pretenſes for the war. It muſt be obſerved, there is not one Engliſh hiſtorian but what ſpeaks of the hoſtilities commited by Holms at Cape Verde and Guinea, long before any declaration of war (2).

Baſnage. D'Eſtrades.

R. Coke, Vol. II. P. 31.

But what evidently ſhews the King, ſince his reſtoration, had ever intended this war, is, his conduct while the treaty between France and the States was negociating at Paris: for to retard it he did his utmoſt. The principal condition of this treaty conſiſted, D'Eſtrades.

(1) De Wit told count D'Eſtrades, That the difference between the two nations aroſe on account of Downing's intereſt only, who had bought the pretended rights of the merchants, concerned in thoſe two ſhips, for a trifle; that to this end he inflamed the King of England's council, raiſing imaginary grievances and injuries received at ſea by the Engliſh, which they never ſuffered. D'Eſtrades's Letters of June 5, 1664.

(2) King Charles II, the next year after his reſtoration, viz. 1661, ſent ſir Robert Holms with a ſquadron of men of war, and ſome ſoldiers to America, with which he reduced New-York, and all that which the Dutch had taken from the Engliſh in Long-Iſland. And from thence, ſir Robert Holms ſailed to Africa, and took Cape Verde, and ſome other places, where the Dutch had factories. Coke's detection, &c. fisted, in a reciprocal guaranty of what the two parties poſſeſſed, or ſhould afterwards lawfully acquire. In this general clauſe, the States comprehended the article of the fiſhery, as an eſſential point, and the King of France made no objection to it. But Charles oppoſed it, and indeavored to hinder the French King from agreeing to that article. Lewis, in complaiſance to Charles ſought expedients to oblige him, by confining himſelf to a general guaranty, which ſhould include all without exception. But the States refuſed concluding the treaty, unleſs the article of the fiſhery was expreſly inſerted in the guaranty. Charles finding, the King of France would at laſt conſent, ordered count d'Eſtrades, the French embaſſador at London, to be told, that he had reſolved to oblige the ſhips of all nations without exception, to ſtrike to the Engliſh flag. But perceiving, the King of France, inſtead of being intimidated by this menace, anſwered it in a high ſtrain, Charles let him know, he would deſiſt from this pretenſion as to the French, provided Lewis would deſiſt from the guarantee of the fiſhery in favor of the Dutch. But Lewis, being ſenſible, the Dutch would never recede from that particular clauſe, agreed to it at laſt, and the treaty was concluded.

It appears hence, that Charles was then ſeeking a quarrel with the Dutch, on the fiſhery article. But finding France had expreſly ingaged to be guarantee of it, he himſelf concluded, that very year, a treaty of alliance with Holland, in expectation of ſome more favorable occaſion to begin a war.

This deſign was no longer poſtponed, than to the begining of this year 1664, when a fleet was preparing in England to act at Cape Verde and in Guinea, under the command of Holms. Soon after, ſome Engliſh merchants complained to the parliament of the horrible depredations of the Dutch. But it was never known wherein conſiſted the injuries received by the Engliſh. This extraordinary proceeding is a clear evidence, the court was in good underſtanding with thoſe who complained to the parliament. For, naturally, and according to the uſual practiſe in ſuch caſes, they ſhould firſt have brought their complaints to the King, who ſhould have applied to the States for redreſs, and, in caſe of refuſal, demanded the aſſiſtance of his parliament. But here the order was inverted. The parliament was firſt addreſſed to, who prayed the King to demand immediate reparation, and offered their aſſiſtance to carry on a war againſt Holland, before it was known, whether thoſe compliants had any foundation, or whether the States were inclinable to repair the damages pretended. All this demonſtrates, the war was reſolved before the parliament was informed of its cauſe and ground. For it was May before the King, by his embaſſador Downing (1), demanded of their High Mightineſſes reparation for theſe pretended injuries.

What I have here related, is farther confirmed by the ſpeaker's ſpeech to the King, at the prorogation of the parliament, wherein he ſaid, the houſe, on examination of the reaſons of the decay of trade, found, that the Dutch, within a few years, had injured his ſubjects, to the value of ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds, tho' Downing had not yet preſented his memorial to the States, nor conſequently received any anſwer.

Acts. Echard. Statute-b.

The ſeventeenth of May, the King coming to the parliament, the ſpeaker preſented the bills which were ready, and among the reſt, one for impowering the King to levy the chimney-money by his own officers, as he had deſired. The great vexations, complaints and murmurs, occaſioned afterwards by this bill, obliged King William III to drop this tax, tho' as it was levied in the reigns of Charles II and James II, it amounted to above two hundred and fifty ſix thouſand pounds a year. After the ſpeaker had mentioned this bill he told the King:

CHARLES II. AN' 1664.

The ſpeaker's ſpeech to the King. Echard, Vol. III. p. 118.

"——While we were intent upon theſe weighty affairs, we were often interrupted by petitions, and letters, and motions, repreſenting the unſetled condition of ſome counties, by reaſon of Fanatics, Sectaries, and Non-conformiſts: They differ in their ſhapes and ſpecies, and accordingly are more or leſs dangerous, but in this they all agree, they are no friends to the eſtabliſhed government either in church or ſtate, and if the old rule be true, 'Qui Eccleſiæ contradicit non eſt pacificus,' we have great reaſon to prevent their growth, and to puniſh their practiſe. To this purpoſe, we have prepared a bill againſt their frequenting of conventicles, the ſeed-plots and nurſeries of their opinions, under pretenſe of religious worſhip. The firſt offenſe is made puniſhable with five pounds, or three months impriſonment, and ten pounds for a peer: the ſecond offenſe with ten pounds, or ſix months impriſonment, and twenty pounds for a peer: But the third offenſe, after a trial by a jury, and the trial of a peer by his peers, the party convicted ſhall be tranſported to ſome foreign plantation, unleſs he lays down an hundred pounds. 'Immedicabile vulnus enſe reſcindendum ne pars ſincera trahatur."——

A reflection upon this act.

All the other ſects were not ſo numerous as the Preſbyterians. Since the King's reſtoration, they had never been accuſed of an inſurrection againſt the government, or of entering into the plots of the Anabaptiſts and Republicans; and yet, by this act they were liable to the ſame penalties as the other ſects; and, on pretenſe that their religious meetings were nurſeries of their opinions againſt the government in church and ſtate, they deſerved to be tranſported to America, if they had the boldneſs to aſſemble three times. By this extreme rigor, it ſeems it was not ſo much deſigned to puniſh their pretended tranſgreſſions, as to drive them to deſpair, that they might indeed render themſelves guilty.

Prorogation of the parliament. Echard.

Theſe acts having received the Royal aſſent, the King prorogued the parliament to Auguſt, ſignifying withal, that it ſhould not meet till November, unleſs a certain affair obliged him to aſſemble it ſooner.

The King demands reparation of damages. Baſnage. Echard, Vol. III. p. 121. Phillips.

The Dutch war was the affair, which the King had reſolved. For this purpoſe, Downing preſented to the States a memorial, drawn in very high terms, wherein he demanded, on the part of the King, reparation for the injuries done to the Engliſh, which, by his calculation, amounted to ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. After the moſt diligent ſearch, I have not been able to diſcover the particular articles of theſe damages, except the two ſhips before mentioned, and another concerning the iſle of Poleron, of which I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Wherefore in imitation of the Engliſh hiſtorians, I am forced to leave the reader in the dark, with regard to the particulars of the injuries on which this war was founded.

An embaſſador ſent from the States.

His Majeſty was bent on a war at any rate, while the States uſed all poſſible indeavors to avoid it.

(1) Biſhop Burnet gives Downing this character: "He was a crafty fawning man, who was ready to turn to every ſide that "was uppermoſt, and to betray thoſe, who by their former friendſhip and ſervices, thought they might depend on him. He "had been Cromwell's embaſſador in Holland, where he had offered perſonal affronts, both to the King and the duke. But "he had, by Monk's recommendation, found means to get into favor." p. 198.——Count D'Eſtrades ſays, he was a pitiful, ſeditious fellow. Letter of January 24, 1664.

Nevertheleſs,

Charles II. An' 1664.

Nevertheleſs, not judging it proper to treat with Downing, who behaved to them with great arrogance, they ſaid, in anſwer to his memorial, that they would ſend an embaſſador to King Charles. Accordingly they diſpatched Van Goch, who had his firſt audience of the King the twenty-fifth of June. As he was ſpeaking, at this audience, of the trade of Africa and the Weſt-Indies, his Majeſty interrupted him, and ſaid, It was not to be ſuffered, that the Dutch Weſt-India company ſhould pretend, by means of three or four ſhips, and a few forts on the coaſt of Guinea, to exclude other nations from that commerce. The embaſſador anſwered, the obſtacles concerning that affair were terminated by the laſt treaty, and it ought to be examined, whether the Dutch had acted contrary to it. Afterwards, the States being informed of the hoſtilities commited by Holms at Cape Verde, and in Guinea, their embaſſador complained to the King, who anſwered, he had not the leaſt knowledge thereof. Some days after, Van Goch preſented a large memorial on that ſubject, with a freſh complaint, that the King had forbid the importation of Dutch commodities into England. His Majeſty gave the ſame anſwer, as before, to the firſt article of this memorial, that he had no knowledge of what was acting by Holms; and to the ſecond, that the prohibition of commodities, was on the account of the plague then reigning in Holland. It afterwards appeared, that the King pretended, the affair of Cape Verde and Guinea did not concern him, but was a private difference between the Engliſh and Dutch companies, and therefore it had not been neceſſary to inform him of it. But it will ſcarcely be conceived, that the duke of York, as governor of the Royal African company, ſhould ſend a ſquadron of twenty-one men of war to Guinea without the King's approbation.

Preparations for war.

While Downing at the Hague and Van Goch at London, fruitleſly preſented memorials on memorials, the King was diligently equiping his fleet. As he wanted money, he borrowed one hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London, who willingly advanced him that ſum, in belief, that he intended only the good of the Engliſh trade, by the deſtruction of that of Holland. The States, on the other hand, prepared for their defenſe, but not with the ſame vigor as their enemies were preparing to attack them. Their deſign was to gain time, in hopes, their fleets of merchant-men would return before the declaration of war; and the King's intention was to intercept thoſe fleets before the publiſhing of any declaration.

The city of London lends the King money. Echard, Vol. III. p. 121. Kennet.

The Engliſh intercept the Dutch merchant-men returning from Bourdeaux before the war was declared.

The King diſcovered his deſign in a manner not to be miſtaken. For ſending his ſhips to ſea, under command of the duke of York, as high-admiral (1), this fleet met in November, with the Dutch Bourdeaux fleet, homeward bound, laden with wine and brandy, and took one hundred and thirty ſhips, which were brought into England, and condemned for lawful prizes, tho' no war had yet been declared. It is needleſs to reflect on the King's conduct, or on the judgment of the Engliſh admiralty. Every unprejudiced perſon will readily believe, that the law of nations was never more unjuſtly or more manifeſtly violated. In vain do ſome hiſtorians indeavor to palliate this action with two reaſons, which diſcover by their weakneſs, how much they themſelves were perſuaded of the reality of this injuſtice. The firſt is, that about the ſame time, Ruyter diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their factories at Cape Verde, and on the coaſt of Guinea. But, firſt, they take no notice, that theſe factories were mere uſurpations of the Engliſh, who had the ſame year diſpoſſeſſed the Dutch of them. Secondly, Ruyter did not recover the forts at Cape Verde, and on the coaſt of Guinea, till the following year 1665. For it muſt be conſidered, that Holms commited his hoſtilities at Cape Verde, in the months of Auguſt and September, and afterwards ſailed to the coaſt of Guinea, where he made himſelf maſter of ſeveral forts. This news muſt therefore be brought to Holland; the States muſt ſend to Ruyter in the Mediterranean to repaſs the Streights and ſail to Cape Verde; and laſtly Ruyter muſt execute his orders, and the news of his expedition be carried to England. Now if all this cannot be effected within the ſpace of ſix weeks, how is it poſſible to juſtify the taking of the Bourdeaux fleet in November, on account of Ruyter's expedition to Cape Verde and Guinea, three months after? The ſecond reaſon is, that this war was not the project of the King, but the voice of the people and parliament; as if, even on this ſuppoſition, the people and parliament were leſs obliged than the King to obſerve the law of nations. But this was not the only error of its kind commited by Charles II, thro' a thirſt after money.

Charles II. An' 1664.

A reflection upon this procedure. Baſnage. Echard, Vol. III. p. 122. Kennet.

Mean while, the King of France apprehending he ſhould at laſt be involved in this war by aſſiſting the States, purſuant to the treaty of 1662, believed it incumbent on him to uſe ſome indeavors to prevent it, and to that purpoſe offered his mediation to the two parties. The States willingly accepted it, but it was rejected by Charles, who ſaid, he would not enter into any negociation till he had received intire ſatisfaction on his demands. He had now ſent ſir Richard Fanſhaw to Spain, and the lord Holles to France, to indeavor to ingage theſe two crowns in a war with the Dutch. But he ſucceeded neither at Paris nor Madrid. Nevertheleſs he perſiſted in his reſolution of making war, tho' he had no other reaſon to allege for it than the pretended depredations commited by the Dutch upon the Engliſh, the particulars of which have never appearedt to this day.

Conjecture upon the grounds of this war. Burnet.

If it be conſidered, with what animoſity this war was undertaken and purſued, not only by the King, the duke of York, and the miniſtry, but even by the parliament, one can hardly forbear thinking, that they who excited this animoſity, had ſome more ſecret view than that of ſupporting trade. But hitherto, conjectures have only been offered on this ſubject. To the duke of York's ambition ſome ſay, this war ought to be aſcribed, who was impatient to diſtinguiſh himſelf, by commanding, as lord high-admiral, the King his brother's fleet. Others believe, the King finding his coffers empty, notwithſtanding all the money given him by parliament, and that raiſed by the ſale of Dunkirk, ingaged by his intrigues the parliament to propoſe this war to him, to have a pretenſe of demanding extraordinary ſupplies, which ſhould not be all expended in the war. There are others who believe, the King, the parliament, the city of London, found this war abſolutely neceſſary to humble the maritime power of the Dutch, who aimed to ingroſs the whole commerce of Europe, as they had already done that of the Indies: that tho' the cauſes of the war were never fully made known, every one underſtood, it was a war occaſioned by the jealouſy of trade. Laſtly, there are thoſe who ſuſpect, that the project to introduce Popery into England being now formed, the execution of it was only ſuſpended till the Dutch were rendered unable to ſuccor the Engliſh Proteſtants, ſince it was only from them that they could receive any aid. I ſhall not pretend to determine what were the ſecret motives of this war, which was certainly undertaken on very ſlight grounds, as will hereafter more fully appear (1).

The King's ſpeech to the parliament for money. Echard.

The parliament meeting the twenty-fourth of November, after two prorogations, the King made a ſpeech to both houſes on the preſent affair, viz. the war with the States-general. He ſaid, that upon the ſtock of his own credit he had ſet out a fleet, not inferior to any England had ever ſeen, and which had coſt him eight hundred thouſand pounds. All this tended to demand of the commons a proportionable ſupply. He then added,

"———I know not whether it will be worth "my pains to indeavor to remove a vile jealouſy "which ſome ill men ſcatter abroad, and which I "am ſure will never ſink into the breaſt of any "man who is worthy to ſit upon your benches; "'That when you have given me a noble and pro"portionable ſupply for the ſupport of the war, I "may be induced by ſome evil counſellors (for "they will be thought to think very reſpectfully "of my own perſon) to make a ſudden peace, and "get all that money for my own private occaſions.' "I am ſure you all think it an unworthy jealouſy, "and not to deſerve an anſwer. I would not be "thought to have ſo brutiſh an inclination to love "war for war's ſake. God knows, I deſire no "bleſſing in the world ſo much, as that I may live "to ſee a firm peace between all Chriſtian Princes "and States. But let me tell you, and you "may be confident of it, that when I am com"pelled to enter into a war, for the protection, "honor, and benefit of my ſubjects, I will, God "willing, not make a peace, but upon the obtain"ing and ſecuring thoſe ends for which the war "is entered into: and when that can be done, no "good man will be ſorry for the determination of "it.———"

Hereafter it will be ſeen, how his Majeſty diſcharged his promiſe in this ſpeech. After he had done, he farther declared to them, That he intended the lord-chancellor ſhould have made "A Narra"tive concerning the treaty and manner of pro"ceeding with the Dutch;" but the chancellor being laid up with the gout (2), he had ordered the narrative to be put in writing, which was delivered to both houſes.

The parliament thanks the city of London. Echard.

It will be eaſily imagined, this narrative only contained what ſhould inflame the parliament. But the hiſtorians have not related the contents, perhaps for want of knowing them. Be this as it will, Charles found the parliament ſo well diſpoſed in his favor, that the two houſes, by ſix lords and twelve commoners, ſent their thanks to the city of London for their loan to the King. A few days after, the commons voted his Majeſty a ſupply of two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, towards the maintenance of a war ſo neceſſary to the ſtate; and in leſs then three weeks, ways and means were found for raiſing that ſum in three years; after which both houſes adjourned to the twelfth of January.

A declaration concerning letters of mart againſt the Dutch. Echard.

Immediately after, the King publiſhed a declaration, by which General Repriſals were granted againſt the ſhips, goods, and ſubjects of the States-general, and the court of admiralty ordered to condemn them as prizes according to the courſe of admiralty, and law of nations. This declaration was founded upon grievous damages and inſults done to the Engliſh, but without ſpecifying one article.

CHARLES II. AN' 1664.

The Engliſh take a great many Dutch veſſels. Kennet. Baſnage.

When the Bourdeaux fleet had been ſeized and condemned, the Engliſh took all the Dutch ſhips they met, tho' the war was not yet proclaimed. But it was much worſe ſince the declaration for General Repriſals had been publiſhed.

As ſoon as the States were informed of the hoſtilities commited by Holms at Cape Verde and in Guinea, they ſent an expreſs to Ruyter, ordering him to repaſs the Streights, and ſail towards theſe coaſts, to recover what the Dutch Weſt-India company had loſt. Ruyter executed this order with great vigor, and retook moſt of the forts ſeized by the Engliſh. He took likewiſe ſeveral of their ſhips. This news reached London the begining of February, and furniſhed the King with a new pretenſe for the declaration of war, which in a few days was publiſhed.

Ruyter recovers the places taken from the Dutch at Cape Verde and Guinea.

The money bill is paſſed. Echard. Kennet.

The parliament meeting the twelfth of January, the houſe of commons proceeded immediately to the money-bill, as the moſt preſſing affair. This bill being ready, the King came to the houſe to give his aſſent, after which, war was formally declared againſt the States-general. This declaration was founded upon the numberleſs injuries and unſpeakable damages, the Engliſh had ſuffered from the Dutch, without being able to obtain the leaſt ſatisfaction. His Majeſty added, that the ſhips belonging to the Dutch were not detained by him, till he found that Ruyter was ordered not only to abandon the conſortſhip againſt the Algerines, to which he had been invited by the States, but alſo to uſe all acts of depredation againſt his ſubjects in Africa. He therefore declared to all the world, that the Dutch were the aggreſſors, and ought in juſtice to be ſo regarded by all men.

A remark upon this declaration.

What appears very aſtoniſhing in this declaration is, that the King did not even take care to preſerve appearances, as if his ſubjects and all Europe had been void of common ſenſe, or it was not known that the fleet from Bourdeaux had been intercepted in November, before Ruyter had reached Guinea. He pretended, that all the world muſt be ignorant, becauſe he himſelf feigned not to know, that Holms had begun hoſtilities at Cape Verde and in Guinea in Auguſt and September. In fine, he would have all the world believe on his bare word, that the Engliſh had ſuffered grievous damages, without his vouchſafing to ſpecify one ſingle injury. This declaration was approved of by twenty-two privy-counſellors only, the earls of Southampton and Clarendon having been either unable, or unwilling to be preſent at this reſolution. It was dated the twenty-ſecond of February, but was not publiſhed till the ſecond of March.

The parliament prorogued.

Charles having notice that ſome bills were ready for the Royal aſſent, came to the houſe the ſecond of March, and after paſſing the bills, which were of no great importance, he prorogued the parliament

(1) Burnet ſays, he was very poſitively aſſured by ſtateſmen on both ſides, that the French ſet this war on in a very artificial manner; for while they incouraged us to inſiſt on ſome extravagant demands, they at the ſame time preſſed the Dutch not to yield to them; and as they put them in hopes, that if a rupture ſhould follow, they would aſſiſt them according to their alliance, ſo they aſſured us, that they would do us no hurt.———There was no viſible cauſe of war——France and Popery were the true ſprings of theſe counſels. It was the intereſt of the King of France, that the States ſhould be in no condition to make a vigorous reſiſtance, when he ſhould be ready, either to invade them, or fall into Flanders.———The French did thus ſet on the war between the Engliſh and Dutch, hoping that our fleets ſhould mutually weaken one another ſo much, that the naval force of France, which was increaſing very conſiderably, ſhould be near an equality to them, when they ſhould be ſhattered by a war. The States were likewiſe the greateſt ſtrength of the Proteſtant intereſt, and were therefore to be humbled. p. 198, 199.

The clergy give up their right of taxing themselves. Burnet. Echard.

In this session the clergy voluntarily gave up their right of taxing themselves in convocation, and from this time have been taxed in common with the people in parliament. This has made convocations less necessary to the King, and consequently less considerable in themselves (1).

AN' 1665. Echard. Kennet.

The war being declared, the duke of York, about the end of March, repaired to the fleet which he was to command, consisting of one hundred and seven men of war, and fourteen fire-ships. But as the fleet was not yet ready, he could not sail till May.

The King of France's conduct with regard to the war between England and Holland. D'Estrades.

Some time since, the States, perceiving a war unavoidable, pressed the King of France to declare against England, pursuant to the treaty of 1662, but had not yet prevailed. Charles on his side sollicited him to abandon the States, and allured him with very tempting advantages. So, Lewis was not a little imbarassed. He was desirous to keep fair with the King of England, whom, he foresaw, he might want; and, on the other hand, if he abandoned the States, there was danger of their being overcome, and of Pensionary De Wit losing all his credit. This could not happen, without a change of the government; the re-establishment of the young Prince of Orange, and the King of England's being in effect master in Holland. It was thro' the sole influence of the Pensionary that their High Mightinesses were attached to the interests of France, and consequently his fall could not but be extremely prejudicial to that nation. The course therefore which Lewis took on this occasion, was to gain time, one while by caviling at the terms of the treaty of 1662, another while, by giving hopes to the States of his declaring against England, and lastly, by a splendid embassy to London, with the duke of Vernuil at the head of it, to mediate a peace between England and Holland. In order to know his inclination, let us hear what he says himself in a letter to count d'Estrades his embassador at the Hague, dated the nineteenth of December 1664.

His leter to to the count d'Estrades.

——— "However, I own, I am a little "imbarassed, considering, if I literally execute "the treaty of 1662, I shall very much prejudice "my principal interest, and this, in favor of a na- "tion, which not only will never be serviceable to "me, but which I shall find opposite in the only "case where I should want them, and then, the "assistance I shall have given them, will turn "against me. Beside this, I lose England, which "is upon the point of concluding a strict alliance "with Spain, in case I reject her offers, and these "offers, for I may trust you with the secret, are "a carte blanche in every thing I can desire for "the Netherlands, without one inch of land "expected for England. Beside the King of "England himself suggests to me, how to avoid "with honor assisting the Dutch. He pretends, "they are the aggressors: that he has a right to "the forts, they have seized in Guinea: that "they first armed: that they have made a "national quarrel for a private dispute between "two companies, which they should have been "suffered to decide: that they commited the first "act of violence in ill-treating one of his ships "laden with masts from Sweden: that, however, "I am only ingaged for what passes in Europe: "that it is visible all the differences, except that of "Guinea, are easy to be adjusted. That it is not "reasonable, their capricious obstinacy to main- "tain a country for which I am not ingaged, "should kindle a war in these parts, because as I am "not obliged for the principal, I cannot be so for "the accessions and dependencies. I omit how I "was served by the States at Munster, &c. What "I now write must be a secret."

CHARLES II. AN' 1665.

I cannot forbear making some remarks on this letter.

Reflections upon this letter.

First it shews, the French King did not excite the war between England and Holland, as most of the English historians pretend.

Secondly, if Charles had really intended the welfare of his kingdom in undertaking this war, he would not have offered the King of France a carte blanche for the Netherlands, in order to accomplish the destruction of Holland. This was a thing directly contrary to the interests of England, and very different from the satisfaction demanded for the injuries his subjects might have received from the Dutch.

Thirdly, in what Charles alleged to Lewis, there appears no proof, that the Dutch were the aggressors, nor any thing of the pretended damages of eight hundred thousand pounds: but that the chief point in dispute was the propriety of some forts on the coast of Guinea, which, according to him, was an affair between the two companies, and that the rest was easy to be adjusted.

Fourthly, Charles supposes the States to have made it a national quarrel, by sending Ruyter to Guinea; but that he had not concerned himself with this affair, because Lawson had been sent with twenty-one sail, in the name of the duke of York, and the Royal African company.

Lastly, the States had no reason to expect much assistance from France, unless the chance of war should render it necessary for them, or the King of France find some considerable advantage in espousing their cause.

It was therefore to gain time that the embassy was sent to London, because Lewis pretended, that as long as there was any hope of an accommodation, he was not obliged to declare against England. Now while his embassadors were at London, he could say, that the hope of a reconciliation was not intirely desperate. He so artfully managed, that he kept them there till the end of the year 1665, declared not against England till January 1666, and his declaration was of little service to the States.

The duke of York sails with the English fleet. Kennet. Echard.

In May the duke of York sailed with the English fleet, and, before the Dutch could be ready, alarmed the coasts of Holland. He continued a fortnight near the Texel, to prevent the fleet of Holland from joining that of Zealand, in which he could not fail of success. In the interim, he took several Dutch homeward bound ships, who had not been informed of the war. However, as the war was not made only to hinder this junction, the duke at last sailed away with design to meet Ruyter, who

(1) It being found by experience, that their whole subsidies were inconsiderable, and yet unequally heavy on the clergy, it was resolved on hereafter to tax the church benefices as temporal estates were taxed; which proved indeed a lighter burden, but was not so honorable as when it was given by themselves. Yet interest prevailing above the point of honor, they acquiesced in it. So the convocation being no more necessary to the crown, occasioned less regard being had to them afterwards. They were often discontinued and prorogued; and when they met, it was only for form. Burnet, p. 197. ——— The custom of the clergy's taxing themselves was broken during the late troubles. For then the clergy, either out of voluntary compliance, affectation of popularity, or because they wanted proxies to represent their body, had their benefices taxed with the laity. This the court found, after the restoration, to be an easier thing, than to have two bodies of men to please. And therefore intended to deprive the clergy of that right, if they had not voluntarily relinquished it.

Put under the command of Obdam.

During his ſtay there, the Holland and Zealand ſquadrons joined and formed a fleet of one hundred and twenty one men of war, beſide fire-ſhips, under the command of Obdam de Waſſenaer. He had under him Cortenaer vice admiral of the Maeſe, Evertzen vice admiral of Zealand, and Cornelius Tromp ſon of the famous Martin Tromp. The rear-admirals and captains were very far from anſwering to their ſuperiors in capacity, more care having been taken to fill theſe poſts with the relations and friends of thoſe, whom the Penſionary wanted to preſerve his credit, than with experienced officers. So, except fifteen or ſixteen captains, the reſt were unexperienced. This is a misfortune to which Republics are more liable than Monarchies. Tho' De Wit managed the affairs as he pleaſed, he had for enemies all the party of the houſe of Orange, who were ſpies upon his conduct, and miſrepreſented all his proceedings, in order to ruin him. The Penſionary was inſenſible of it, and therefore believed, the only way to ſecure himſelf, and preſerve his authority, was to hazard a ſea ingagement. Succeſs would diſarm the malice of his adverſaries, and the loſs of a battle would of courſe oblige the French to execute the treaty of 1662, and ſilence the complaints and murmurs of the Orange party, who induſtriouſly publiſhed, that Lewis only amuſed the States. Agreeably to this reſolution, which the Penſionary cauſed the States to approve, an order was ſent to Obdam, to go in queſt of the enemy. He obeyed, and came in ſight of them the firſt of June, not far from Harwich. But the wind being ſoutherly, and the next morning ſouth-weſt, he retired to the mouth of the Maeſe. He acquainted the States by an expreſs, with the reaſon of his retreat, and that he did not think proper to attack the Engliſh while they had the advantage of the wind. But he received ſtill more poſitive orders to fight let the wind be as it would, on peril of anſwering it with his head. After ſo expreſs an order, there being no way to recede, he weighed anchor at break of day, and within an hour diſcovered the Engiſh fleet divided into three ſquadrons. The firſt under the red flag, was commanded by the duke of York, aſſiſted by Penn and Lawſon. The ſecond being the white ſquadron, was conducted by Prince Rupert, aſſiſted by Minnes and Sampſon. The third which was the blue ſquadron, was commanded by the earl of Sandwich, who had with him Cuttings and ſir George Aſcough.

Sea fight gained by the Engliſh. Death of Obdam. Baſnage. Echard. Kennet. J. Phillips.

To deſcribe this ingagement, fought the third of June, I own myſelf unqualified. I ſhall therefore only ſay, the Dutch fleet was overthrown, chiefly by the ill conduct of ſeveral captains who were wanting in their duty; by the death of Obdam, who with his ſhip, and all his men were blown up; by the loſs of Cortenaer who was killed upon the deck after hoiſting the admiral-flag, and by many other cauſes which are ſcarce intelligible but to thoſe who are verſed in ſea-affairs. The Dutch loſt nineteen ſhips burned and ſunk, with about ſix thouſand men (2). On the Engliſh ſide, the loſs was only four ſhips, and about fifteen hundred men, among whom were Charles Berkley earl of Falmouth; admiral Sampſon; James Ley earl of Marlborough, and vice-admiral Lawſon, who died ſhortly after of his wounds (3). The remains of the Dutch fleet retired to the Maeſe or the Texel, and were purſued all the next day being Sunday, tho', according to ſome, the duke of York did not diſcover the ſame ardor in this purſuit, he had done in the battle. See what doctor Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury ſays of it in his poſthumous hiſtory of his own times.

Charles II. A' n 1665.

That famous hiſtorian ſays, "After the fight, a council of war was called to concert the method of action when they ſhould come up with them. In that council, Penn, who commanded under the duke, happened to ſay, that they muſt prepare for hotter work in the next ingagement. He knew well the courage of the Dutch was never ſo high as when they were deſperate. The earl of Montague, who was then a volunteer, and one of the duke's court, ſaid to me, it was very viſible that made an impreſſion: and all the duke's domeſtics ſaid he had got honor enough: why ſhould he venture a ſecond time? The ducheſs had alſo given a ſtrict charge to all the duke's ſervants to do all they could to hinder him to ingage too far. When matters were ſetled they went to ſleep; and the duke ordered a call to be given him when they ſhould get up to the Dutch fleet. It is not known what paſſed between the duke and Brounker, who was of his bed-chamber, and was then in waiting; but he came to Penn as from the duke, and ſaid, the duke ordered the ſail to be ſlackened. Penn was ſtruck with the order, but did not go to argue the matter with the duke himſelf, as he ought to have done, but obeyed it. When the duke had ſlept, he upon his waking went out upon the quarter-deck, and ſeemed amazed to ſee ſails ſlackened, and that thereby all hope of overtaking the Dutch was loſt. He queſtioned Penn upon it. Penn put it upon Brounker, who ſaid nothing. The duke denied he had given any ſuch order. But he neither puniſhed Brounker for carrying it, nor Penn for obeying it. He indeed put Brounker out of his ſervice, and it was ſaid, that he durſt do no more, becauſe he was ſo much in the King's favor and in the miſtreſs's. Penn was more in his favor after that than ever before, which he continued to his ſon after him, tho' a Quaker. And it was thought, that all that favor was to oblige him to keep the ſecret. Lord Montague did believe, that the duke was ſtruck, ſeeing the earl of Falmouth the King's favorite, and two other perſons of quality killed very near him, and that he had no mind to ingage again, and that Penn was privately with him. If Brounker was ſo much in fault as he ſeemed to be, it was thought the duke, in the paſſion that this muſt have raiſed in him, would have proceeded to greater extremities, and not have acted with ſo much phlegm."

The Queen-mother returns to France. Echard.

Shortly after, the Queen-mother reſolving to paſs the reſidue of her days in France, the King and the duke of York attended her to the Nore, and there took their laſt leave of her. The Engliſh fleet put under the command of the earl of Sandwich. July. Echard. Burchett. * Edward Montague. and that of the Dutch under Ruyter.

How glorious ſoever this firſt ſea-fight of the duke of York might be, the King and council did not think it proper he ſhould venture his perſon in a ſecond ingagement. Therefore the command of the fleet was given to * the earl of Sandwich (2), who uſed his utmoſt indeavors to prepare it for the ſea as ſoon as poſſible, in order to prevent that of the States, which was repairing with the utmoſt expedition. Beſide, the States, having appointed Ruyter to ſucceed Obdam, ordered him to return immediately with his ſquadron, conſiſting of ſeventeen men of war. The diligence uſed by the States to repair their fleet, was not ſo much to be revenged of the Engliſh, as to ſecure their merchantmen homeward bound from Smyrna and the Eaſt-Indies. The Engliſh, on their ſide were leſs eager to fight than to ſeize the riches which thoſe fleets were bringing to Holland.

Several Dutch ſhips retire to Berghen in Norway. Burnet. p. 222. Arlington's Letters. Echard, Vol. III. p. 137. Burchett.

In the mean time it happened, that the Dutch-Smyrna-fleet, and ſeveral Eaſt-India ſhips not daring to enter the channel, retired to the port of Berghen in Norway, waiting for Ruyter to convoy them to Holland. In this interval, the King of Denmark, diſcourſing one day with ſir Gilbert Talbot, the Engliſh envoy, made great complaints of the Dutch, who, he ſaid, had drawn the Swediſh war on him, that he might be forced to have recourſe to them for ſupplies of money and ſhips, and deliver to them the cuſtoms of Norway and the Sound for their ſecurity. Upon this the envoy told him, he had now a good opportunity of being revenged, by the ſeizure of their ſhips at Berghen, worth many millions. But the King anſwering, he wanted ſtrength to execute ſuch a deſign, the envoy told him, he doubted not but the King his maſter would lend him his ſhips, provided he was aſſured of equally partaking of the ſpoil; to which the King of Denmark conſented. The King of England was pleaſed with Talbot's project, and ſent orders to the earl of Sandwich to ſail immediately and ſeize the Dutch ſhips at Berghen. The admiral readily obeyed, tho' he had received no intimation of the agreement between the two Kings.

The Kings of England and Denmark attempt to ſeize them.

To effect this deſign, it was abſolutely neceſſary to inform the vice-roy of Norway, and the governor of Berghen of it, that they might favor it, in feigning to protect the Dutch ſhips, the King of Denmark being unwilling to appear openly. Nor was it leſs neceſſary to inform the earl of Sandwich of it, to prepare him againſt the noiſe and complaint of the governor of Berghen, on account of the attempt and violence of the Engliſh. But ſeveral accidents ruined this affair. The governor of Berghen, who was to receive orders from the vice-roy of Norway, was not ſoon enough informed. On the other hand, Talbot's expreſs, ſent from Copenhagen to the Engliſh fleet, was taken by the Dutch. In fine, the earl of Sandwich hearing Ruyter was ſhortly expected, and being deſirous to perform the deed before his arrival, detached the ſquadron commanded by ſir Thomas Tyddeman, who attacked the Dutch with great reſolution. But they had now time to put themſelves in a poſture of defenſe. On the other hand, the governor of Berghen, who had not yet received any particular directions how to behave, ſeeing this open hoſtility, and obſerving that the Engliſh ſhot damaged the town, fired upon them from the citadel. In a word, this ſquadron was almoſt intirely ruined, and obliged to return to the fleet. The next day, the fourth of Auguſt, orders came to the governor of Berghen, but it was then too late. It appeared, the King was not well ſatisfied with the earl of Sandwich's conduct, ſince, inſtead of continuing him in the command of the fleet, he ſent him embaſſador to the court of Spain.

But are diſappointed.

Aug. 3. The project miſcarries.

In the interim, Ruyter arriving in Holland with many Engliſh prizes, took the oath to the States as vice-admiral-general, after which he took the command of the fleet, conſiſting of ninety-three ſail well equiped. But tho' he bore the title of admiral, three commiſſioners attended him, namely, De Wit the Penſionary, Huygens, and Borrel, who had properly the command. The grand deſign of theſe commiſſioners was to meet the India fleet, which was to ſail round Ireland to avoid entering the channel. But the wind was ſo contrary, that the fleet would not have got ſoon enough out of the Texel, if the Penſionary, who underſtood ſea affairs very well, had not by ſounding it himſelf all over very diligently, found more ways to get out by different winds, than was thought formerly practicable (3). So the fleet at laſt, ſailed out, and appeared before Berghen, where the commiſſioners gave their orders for convoying the merchant-men which were in that port. But a violent ſtorm riſing ſo diſperſed them, that twenty fell into the hands of the Engliſh (4). This ſtorm obliged Ruyter and the commiſſioners to return to Holland, with their fleet very much damaged.

projected an insurrection, and were even incouraged by emissaries from the States-general, who would have been glad to imploy the King in domestic troubles. But this was a bare project, which served only to furnish the enemies of the Non-conformists with an opportunity to magnify the danger with which the kingdom was threatened from the enemies of the church in general, and to include, in that number, the Presbyterians, tho' they were not concerned in the Republican projects.

Designs of the Republicans. Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 166, &c. Burnet, p. 226. Made a handle to injure the Presbyterians.

It was not only against England that the States-general had to defend themselves. Charles had raised them another enemy, by whom they were no less imbarassed. This was the famous Bernard Van Ghalen, bishop of Munster, who, upon very slight pretenses, entered the province of Overyssel at the head of an army in English pay. He made himself master of a great many places, and then attempted to surprize Groningen, but was repulsed. At length, before the end of the campain, the King of France, and the duke of Lunenburgh, having sent a powerful assistance to the States, the bishop was forced to relinquish his great designs, and think of a peace, especially as the money promised by the King of England was not paid regularly.

The parliament meets at Oxford.

The parliament, which had been prorogued to the ninth of October, met accordingly, but at Oxford, on account of the plague which still raged in London, whereas it did not much infest other parts of the kingdom. The King told them, in a speech to both houses, the supply of two millions five hundred thousand pounds granted him for carrying on the war, was already expended. He insisted particularly on the great sums paid to the bishop of Munster, for making a diversion in the bowels of his enemies country, tho' it appears in sir William Temple's letters, that these sums were never well paid.

The King's speech. Kennet. Echard.

Another by the chancellor.

After the King had done speaking, the chancellor, by his order, inlarged upon the same subject, signifying to the commons, that they could not dispense with puting the King in a condition to prosecute a war so glorious and necessary. Then, he spoke of the design formed by the Republicans, for the subversion of the government. But, in agravating with great warmth and eloquence the efforts and designs of these men, he took particular care not to distinguish them from the other sects of Non-conformists. It was a constant artifice, as I have observed, to apply to the Presbyterians, under the general name of Non-conformists, all the actions and extravagancies of the Independents, Anabaptists, and Republicans in general.

Money granted the King. Echard.

In some few days, the commons voted the King a new supply of twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds to continue the war; also one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to the duke of York, for great service he had done to the nation.

The five mile act. Statute b. Burnet, p. 224. R. Coke.

After this, was brought into the house a bill, which passed without any difficulty, namely, "That "no Non-conformist teacher under what denomina- "tion soever shall dwell, or come, unless upon the "road, within five miles of any corporation, or "any other place where they had been ministers, "or had preached after the act of oblivion, unless "they first took the following oath: I do swear "that it is not lawful upon any pretense whatso- "ever to take arms against the King; and that I "do abhor the traiterous position of taking arms "by his authority against his person, or against "those that are commissioned by him, in pursu- "ance of such commissions; and that I will not "at any time indeavor any alteration of govern- "ment either in church or state (1)."

Charles II. An' 1665.

The reason alleged in the act to justify this severity was, that the ministers had setled themselves in the corporations, sometimes three or four in a place, and took opportunities to instil into the minds of the subjects, their poisonous principles of schism and rebellion, to the great danger of the church and kingdom.

Reasons urged against it. Burnet. Echard.

This bill met with great opposition in the house of lords, even from the earl of Southampton lord treasurer, tho' an intimate friend of the earl of Clarendon, and a principal author of the persecution against the Non-conformists (2). Indeed the oath required to be taken by the Non-conforming ministers supposed a thing which was not generally allowed, viz. that every good subject and good christian, was obliged in conscience to believe what was contained in this oath, otherwise it was absurd to impose it on the ministers. For there is a great difference between injoining a certain practise, and obliging part of the subjects to swear that they believe it founded in religion and conscience, while the rest are left free, either to believe or not believe it. Accordingly, the commons, foreseeing the force of so pressing an objection, prepared a bill to oblige all the subjects to take the same oath. This bill was thrown out, tho' only by two or three voices. At last, notwithstanding these difficulties, the act, called the Five-mile act, passed the house of lords, and the King gave it the Royal assent the thirty-first of October, as well as to the money-bill and some others, after which he prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of February 1665-6.

It passes.

The parliament prorogued. Echard.

Reasons alleged to justify the five mile act. Id. p. 150.

Several writers have indeavored to justify the rigor of the five mile act, and what they have said amounts to this.——That this rigor was occasioned more by the seditious behavior of the Non-conformists, than by the exercise of their religion. In which assertion the ambiguity of the word Non-conformist is still retained, as if all the sects included under that denomination formed but one and the same body, united by the same common doctrines and interests, which is notoriously false. The Presbyterians alone were considerably more numerous than all the other Non-conformists together, and had doctrines and interests really separate from those of the other sects. They could not be, nor were they, accused of being ingaged in the conspiracies, real or pretended, of the Independents and Anabaptists since the King's restoration, who had even positively promised, they should not be molested for their religion, after the great service they had done him. And yet, because their enemies had artfully included them in the general denomination of Non-conformists, they were to partake of the punishment due to the other sects, who were called by the same name, tho' they had with them no sort of union. Wherefore the reader may judge, whether this severity did not partly arise from their religion. In short, by the sole ambiguity of the word Non-conformist the objections and just complaints of the Presbyterians, are pretended to be combated.

Extreme rigor shewn to the Presbyterians in Scotland. J. Phillips. Echard.

The council of Scotland, this same year, shewed no less animosity against the Presbyterians; on pretense of some insolence commited by Alexander Smith, a private minister, a proclamation was published, the twenty-fourth of December, ordering that all the silenced Presbyterian ministers should, within forty days, remove themselves and their families from the places where they had been ministers,

I own, I ſee no other difference between ſentencing men to death, and puting them out of a capacity to live, unleſs that the latter puniſhment offers thoſe who inflict it a more exquiſite vengeance. But this rigor will appear the more extreme, if it be conſidered that the Preſbyterians made properly the body of the Scotiſh nation (1).

France declares war againſt England. D'Eſtrades. Temple. Echard, Vol. III. p. 156. Jan. 19.

In the begining of the year 1666, his Majeſty's affairs were in an ill ſituation. The French King, preſſed by the repeated inſtances of the States-general, recalled his embaſſadors, and publiſhed, the nineteenth of January, a declaration of war againſt England. This was not owing to his belief that the affairs of the States were deſperate (for the ſequel ſhews they could defend themſelves without his aſſiſtance) but becauſe the Penſionary, who was intirely attached to the intereſt of France, could no longer ſupport himſelf without this declaration, which, as will hereafter appear, was not very prejudicial to England.

The King of Denmark joins with the States. Ibid. Baſnage.

On the other hand, the States found means to ſecure the King of Denmark, by the promiſe of paying him yearly, as long as the war with England ſhould continue, fifteen hundred thouſand florins, three hundred thouſand of which were to be paid by the King of France. For this he ingaged to maintain a fleet of thirty men of war for the ſervice of the allies.

The biſhop of Munſter makes a peace with the States.

The States alſo raiſed ſo many enemies to the biſhop of Munſter, that he was obliged to make peace and diſband his forces. This peace was concluded at Cleve, and ſigned the eighteenth of April.

AN' 1666.

In 1666, the naval war was renewed, with all theſe diſadvantages to England. If the King of France had acted with the ſincerity the States thought they had probable reaſon to expect, the Engliſh fleet would not have ventured to appear with unequal force againſt the united fleets of France and Holland. But Lewis XIV, as I have ſaid, only declared war againſt England to ſave De Wit, who was juſt ſinking, as appears in ſeveral letters of count d'Eſtrades. The Penſionary being ſecure by this declaration, it was not difficult for the King of France to find pretenſes for retarding the aſſiſtance he had promiſed the States. Tho' his declaration was publiſhed the nineteenth of January, the fleet, which he promiſed ſhould join that of the States, was in the Mediterranean, under the command of the duke of Beaufort, who, by accidents, real or pretended, arrived not at Belle-Iſle till the end of September.

The King of France not forward to ſuccor the States. Baſnage. D'Eſtrades.

The King of Denmark, on the other hand, without a junction of his fleet with that of the States, contented himſelf with guarding his own coaſts. So, this year, as the laſt, the war by ſea was carried on only between England and the States.

Prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle command the Engliſh fleet. Echard. Skinner. Burchett. Kennet.

The command of the Engliſh fleet was given to Prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle (2). On the twenty-third of April they repaired to it, but were not ready to ſail till the end of May. It conſiſted of ſeventy-eight ſhips of the line, beſide frigates and fireſhips. In all likelihood, his Majeſty was till then ignorant of the French King's ſecret intentions; but he knew the duke of Beaufort had orders to repair to Belle-Iſle with his fleet, ſaid to conſiſt of thirty-ſix ſail, to join the Dutch in the channel. Wherefore, he ſent expreſs orders to Prince Rupert to ſail with twenty great ſhips, and join ten more at Plymouth, in order to go in queſt of the duke of Beaufort, which he immediately obeyed. It cannot well be denied, that this order was ſent with too much precipitation, and without due conſideration. For beſide that the Engliſh fleet could without danger have waited for the French, which could not with ſafety have ventured to paſs ſo narrow a ſea as the channel, while the Engliſh ſhould be in their ſtation, the French fleet was yet in the Mediterranean, when the order was ſent to Prince Rupert, and that of Holland upon the point of ſailing out of their ports. His Majeſty had afterwards reaſon to ſee how unſeaſonably this order was given.

A ſea ingagement. La Neuville, Hiſt. de Hollande. Baſnage. Echard.

The States fleet, commanded by Ruyter, put to ſea with ſeventy-one ſhips of the line, twelve frigates, thirteen fire-ſhips, and eight yatchs, and anchored between Newport and Dunkirk. Ruyter had under his particular conduct the ſquadron of the Maeſe: that of North Holland and Frieſland was commanded by Evertzen, and that of Zealand by Tromp. The Engliſh having a fair wind, ſailed to attack the enemy, who, on their ſide, cut their cables to be the ſooner ready to receive them. Tromp's ſhip was ſo diſabled at the firſt, that he was obliged to leave it for another. The ſame thing happened to Ruyter, who was coming to his aſſiſtance, and the powder of a Dutch ſhip taking fire, ſhe blew up into the air. Ruyter ſunk an Engliſh ſhip of fifty guns, then another of ſeventy, and afterwards three others of the firſt rate. In ſhort, this firſt day the advantage was wholly on the ſide of the Dutch, except that they loſt vice-admiral Evertzen, who was killed by a cannon-ball.

This conflict, interrupted by the night, was renewed early next morning, but, after laſting ſome hours, was diſcontinued till noon by reaſon of a calm. After that, the wind riſing, both fleets renewed the ingagement with equal bravery. Tromp being once more obliged to change his ſhip, found himſelf ſo ingaged in the Engliſh fleet, that he would have been infallibly taken or ſunk, if Ruyter, by prodigious efforts, had not brought him off. This ſecond day, the Engliſh had ſtill the diſadvantage, having loſt eight of their largeſt ſhips either ſunk or burned, and ſix taken, with ſir George Aſcough admiral of the white. The duke of Albemarle would have taken the advantage of the night to retire, but was purſued too cloſely to execute his deſign. So that he was obliged to fight all the next day, as he retired toward his own ſhore. About evening he diſcovered Prince Rupert's ſquadron coming to his aſſiſtance. Whereupon the two Engliſh admirals attacked their enemies again the next morning. But this fourth day proved as unſucceſsful to them as the three former. Four of their beſt ſhips were loſt, and they obliged to retreat with precipitation. A miſt happily conveyed them from Ruyter's purſuit. In theſe four days the Engliſh loſt twenty-three great ſhips, beſide ſeveral others of leſs note, ſix thouſand men, and two thouſand ſix hundred priſoners. Among the ſlain were ſir William Berkley, vice-admiral of the white ſquadron, and ſir Chriſtopher Minnes. The Dutch loſt ſix ſhips, two thouſand eight hundred ſoldiers, and fourſcore ſailors, beſide the admirals Evertzen, Vander Hulſt, and Stockhover, with ſome other officers. Tho' the victory was ſo evidently on the ſide of the Dutch, bonefires and rejoicings were made at London, as if the Engliſh had been conquerors (1).

Another ingagement. Baſnage. Echard.

The two fleets ſoon put to ſea again, and as they were in queſt of each other, they met the twenty-fourth of July, and maintained a furious battle, where the victory was obſtinately diſputed. The Engliſh fleet conſiſted of above a hundred ſail; and the Dutch of eighty-eight ſhips of the line, beſide nineteen fireſhips. While Ruyter and young Evertzen ingaged the red and white ſquadrons, Tromp after a long diſpute routed the blue, commanded by ſir Jeremy Smith. But Tromp by an unpardonable error, inſtead of remaining with the fleet, amuſed himſelf with purſuing the flying ſhips of the enemy. On the other hand, young Evertzen, who commanded one of the Dutch ſquadrons, was killed with a canon-ball, and his ſquadron intirely defeated. But the Engliſh admiral who fought againſt him, was not guilty of the ſame error as Tromp. Inſtead of purſuing the flying enemy, he joined the red ſquadron, commanded by Prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle, and theſe two ſquadrons attacked Ruyter, who nevertheleſs, by means of the night, diſingaged himſelf. But the next day, he was obliged to ſuſtain the fight alone againſt theſe two ſquadrons, there being no news of Tromp. He never in his whole life ſhewed ſo much bravery and capacity as in the ſecond ingagement. He ſuſtained with his ſingle ſquadron, the brunt of two Engliſh ſquadrons, and at laſt retreated with ſuch wonderful conduct, that he gained more honor by it than he would have done by a victory. The Engliſh leaving the chace in ſight of Fluſhing, went after Tromp, who, tho' he was met off Harwich, recovered the Texel without any loſs. Ruyter at his return, loudly complained of Tromp's conduct, and, to ſatisfy him, the States put Tromp under an arreſt, diſmiſſed him from his poſt, and put Van Ghent in his place (2).

The Engliſh make a deſcent upon Holland with great damage to the Dutch. Baſnage. Skinner. Echard. Kennet, p. 282.

The Dutch fleet being diſperſed in the laſt ingagement, part retiring to Fluſhing, and part to the Texel, the duke of Albemarle finding himſelf maſter of the ſea, detached twenty men of war to brave the coaſts of Holland. Holms coming to the iſle of Vlye, burned a hundred merchant ſhips, and two men of war deſigned for convoys. Then he advanced to the iſle of Schelling, and making a deſcent, burned many houſes in the little town of Brandaris. His deſign was to improve a treaſon carrying on in this iſle by one Hemſkirk, for which Buat a French gentleman, who ſecretly correſponded with the Engliſh, was beheaded at the Hague. But Holms not finding things ready as he expected, returned to the fleet.

The Engliſh fleet before the iſle of Wight.

After this expedition, the Engliſh fleet ſailed into the channel, and anchored at St. Hellens; the iſle of Wight being the moſt proper ſtation for hindering the junction of the French and Dutch fleets. Ruyter on his ſide poſted himſelf in St. John's bay, near Boulogne, where he was ſeized by a diſtemper, which was for ſome time believed mortal. This obliged the States to recall their fleet, of which they gave the French King notice.

Charles II. An' 1666.

The Dutch fleet recalled on account of Ruyter's illneſs.

Mean while, the duke of Beaufort, ignorant of the retreat of the Dutch fleet, left Bell-iſle, where he arrived about the twentieth of September, and entering the channel, ſafely ſailed by the iſle of Wight, without being attacked, and got into Dieppe. He ſtaid there a whole day without hearing any news of Ruyter. At laſt, being informed, that the Dutch fleet was retired, he once more ſailed by the iſle of Wight, without meeting any oppoſition, and got into the ports of Bretagne. It is very ſurpriſing, that the Engliſh who lay at the iſle of Wight to prevent the junction of the two enemies fleets, ſhould ſuffer that of France to paſs and repaſs without moleſtation (3). This may give occaſion to ſuſpect, there was ſome intelligence between France and England. But as I can not trace it, I ſhall not inſiſt upon it. However it plainly appears, the King of France, after having amuſed the Dutch a whole year on diverſe pretenſes, did not really declare againſt England till the nineteenth of January 1665-6, and ſtill amuſed them all this year, with the hopes of the arrival of the duke of Beaufort, who entered the channel but in September, when the ſea-campain was over. If to this be added, Lewis's unwillingneſs to ſuccor the States, as appears in his letter to d'Eſtrades, there will be no cauſe to wonder at the little advantage received by the Dutch from the junction of France.

Management of Lewis XIV. Baſnage. D'Eſtrades.

The States intended this year to aſſiſt the malecontents in England and Scotland, in order to give the Engliſh arms a diverſion at home. This deſign was even communicated to the French King. But he found ſo many objections to it, that it was ſuffered to fall unexecuted. Probably, the States had ſome correſpondents among the Republicans, who being partly diſcovered, a great noiſe was made, and, according to cuſtom, all the Non-conformiſts were charged with the plot.

Project to excite troubles in England. Ludlow. Echard. Is dropped.

The terrible fire which this year laid waſte ſo great a part of the city of London, gave freſh occaſion to the enemies of the Republicans, to charge them with being the authors thereof. This was only becauſe the fire happened to break out the third of September (4), a day eſteemed fortunate by the Republicans, on account of the victories of Dunbar and Worceſter, obtained by Oliver Cromwell, when general of the armies of the commonwealth of England. To repreſent without any aggravation, the ravages made by this fire in London, I need only inſert the inſcription on one of the ſides of the column, erected on the place where the fire broke out. This column at London, is called the Monument, and is viſited by all ſtrangers, but they only who underſtand the Engliſh language, can read its inſcription (5).

(1) De Wit was on board the Dutch fleet, who was ſaid to have invented chain-ſhot on this occaſion, which did incredible damage to the rigging of the Engliſh, and was a great means of the Dutch geting the advantage. And it is thought, if Prince Rupert had not come up when he did, the Engliſh fleet was ſo unrigged, that they would have been all taken ſunk, or burnt. And yet a day of thankſgiving was appointed. Burnet, p. 229. Echard ſays, the Engliſh had but nine men of war taken or burnt; and the Dutch loſt above fifteen ſhips, twenty-one captains, and above five thouſand common ſea-men. Conjectures upon the authors of the fire. Echard. R. Coke.

Men failed not to give a ſcope to their imagination, and to form conjectures upon the cauſes and authors of this devaſtation. The pious and religious aſcribed it to the juſt vengeance of heaven, on a city, where vice and immorality reigned ſo openly and ſhamefully, and which had not been enough humbled by the raging peſtilence of the foregoing year. Some again, as I have ſaid, aſcribed this misfortune to the malice of the Republicans; others to the Papiſts. And there were ſome ſo bold, as even to ſuſpect the King and the duke of York. But tho' ſeveral ſuſpected perſons were impriſoned, it was not poſſible to diſcover, or prove, that the baker's houſe, where this dreadful calamity firſt broke out, was fired on purpoſe. However a French Hugenot (1), native of Roan, and a lunatic, confeſſing himſelf guilty of this fact, was condemned and executed. But it appeared afterwards, on the oath of the maſter of the ſhip who brought him from France, that tho' he was landed at the time, he did not arrive in London till two days after the fire began. It is pretended likewiſe, that a Dutch boy, ten years of age, confeſſed that his father, and himſelf, had thrown fire-balls into the baker's houſe thro' a window that ſtood open. But beſide the objection which may be made to this teſtimony from the boy's age, there muſt have been ſome circumſtance in his narrative, not agreeable to the fact, ſince it was not thought proper to make a farther inquiry. Perhaps this was only a groundleſs report.

But what gives moſt cauſe to believe this fire did not happen caſually, is the teſtimony of dr. Lloyd, afterwards biſhop of Worceſter. That prelate told dr. Burnet, "——That one Grant a Papiſt had "ſome time before applied himſelf to Lloyd, who "had great credit with the counteſs of Clarendon "(who had a large eſtate in the new river that is "brought from Ware to London) and ſaid, he "could raiſe that eſtate conſiderably, if ſhe would "make him a truſtee for her. His ſchemes were "probable, and he was made one of the board that "governed that matter; and by that he had a "right to come as oft as he pleaſed to view their "works at Iſlington. He went thither the Satur- "day before the fire broke out, and called for the "key of the place where the heads of the pipes "were, and turned all the cocks that were then "open, and ſtoped the water, and went away, "and carried the keys with him. So when the fire "broke out next morning, they opened the pipes "in the ſtreets to find water, but there was none. "And ſome hours were loſt in ſending to Iſling- "ton, where the door was to be broke open and "the cocks turned, and it was long before the water "got to London. Grant indeed denied that he "he had turned the cocks. But the officer of the "works affirmed, that he had, according to order, "ſet them all running, and that no perſon had got "the keys from him beſide Grant; who confeſſed, "he had carried away the keys, but pretended he "did it without deſign."

Extract from Burnet's hiſtory relating to this fire. p. 231.

CHARLES II. AN' 1666.

This is dr. Burnet's account, and agrees in the main with Echard in his hiſtory of England. However, an anonymous author, who has wrote againſt doctor Burnet's hiſtory, accuſes him directly of falſehood, and aſſerts that Grant was not one of the board till after the fire. But it is difficult to find what credit is to be given to the teſtimony of this anonymous writer, whereas one can hardly help believing this illuſtrious prelate, when he ſays, he had it from dr. Lloyd, that Grant was made one of this board before the fire, and that it was by his means. However, this great fire was generally imputed to the Papiſts, and the more, becauſe ſeveral other things afterwards corroborated to confirm this ſuſpicion.

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard.

The parliament meeting the twenty-firſt of September, the King in a ſpeech to both houſes, told them, the money granted him was not ſufficient to carry on the war, conſidering his two powerful enemies. He boaſted of the great ſucceſs with which God had been pleaſed to bleſs his arms, ſuppoſing his fleet to have been ever victorious. Immediately after, the commons liberally voted the King a ſupply of eighteen hundred thouſand pounds. Thus in the ſpace of two years, this war coſt the people of England five millions, five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; that is above ſixty millions of Dutch florins, and above ſeventy two millions of French livres, allowing thirteen Livres-Tournois to one pound ſterling.

The parliament addreſſes the King againſt Papiſts. Echard. Vol. III. p. 169.

In the interim, the two houſes begining to diſcover that his Majeſty was not the zealous Proteſtant he affected to appear; that the Papiſts had great influence in his council, and that their religion made a viſible progreſs, preſented to him an addreſs for executing the laws againſt Popiſh prieſt and Jeſuits, who were laboring to pervert his ſubjects. The King, according to the method of his father, grandfather and his own, immediately publiſhed a proclamation for baniſhing Prieſts and Jeſuits, on pain of being puniſhed according to law, if found in the kingdom after the tenth of December. So baniſhment was the worſt that could happen to them, even ſuppoſing the King's order ſhould have been executed. But the more rigorous the proclamations were, the execution of them was more favorable. This evidently appears in their being ſo often repeated. However to give a more convincing proof of the court's diſpoſition in this reſpect, I ſhall here produce a paſſage in a letter to the earl of Sandwich, embaſſador at Madrid, from ſecretary Bennet, lately created earl of Arlington, a reputed Papiſt, tho' he profeſſed the Proteſtant religion. In this letter he told the embaſſador, "Your "excellency knows ſufficiently the ſprings upon "which the animoſity to the Roman-Catholics "riſes, and how hard it is for his Majeſty to for- "bear declaring againſt them, when the complaint "ariſes from both houſes of parliament, and accord- "ingly you can yourſelf frame your anſwer to the "Queen of Spain."

the King's forces, they were diſperſed with the loſs of three hundred men, and one hundred priſoners, who were moſt of them executed. It was not forgot to ſay that they held intelligence with the Engliſh Preſbyterians, and if they had gained the victory, the like inſurrection would have appeared in England. But it may eaſily be judged, that the Engliſh Preſbyterians would not have been ſpared, if they could have been proved guilty, conſidering how the government ſtood affected towards them. Inconſiderable as this inſurrection was, the Engliſh hiſtorians have been pleaſed to repreſent it as very important, in ſaying, the nation was ſuddenly alarmed with an inſurrection of the Preſbyterians in Scotland, with whom it was not doubted thoſe of England held a ſtrict correſpondence. Theſe authors not being willing to miſs the firſt opportunity to include the Engliſh Preſbyterians in theſe conſpiracies are to be forgiven, tho' it be only on the authority of a "It "is believed."

The King was impatient for the diſpatch of the money-bill, of which the commons took no farther notice. He therefore thought it neceſſary to quicken them by a meſſage. He likewiſe told them, he could not permit any adjournment at Chriſtmas, except for the principal holidays. But this meſſage, it ſeems, produced no great effect. The commons were then examining complaints againſt the lord Mordaunt governor of Windſor caſtle, who was accuſed of ſome arbitrary and tyrannical actions. But neither this affair nor the money-bill could be finiſhed before the end of December.

Meſſage ſent from the King to the commons to haſten the money-bill. Dec. 15. Echard.

The ſecond of January the parliament met after a ſhort adjournment, and immediately the commons accuſed the lord Mordaunt, at the bar of the lords houſe, and then preferred articles of high crimes and miſdemeanors againſt him. But they were diſpleaſed, that the accuſed was ſuffered to be within the bar of the houſe, while his accuſation was reading. This occaſioned a conteſt between the two houſes. There was alſo another difference between them, concerning the commiſſioners appointed by the commons to levy a poll-tax, and to take the public accounts on oath. This was the ſubject of ſeveral fruitleſs conferences (1).

Lord Mordaunt accuſed. Echard, Vol. III. p. 173.

On the eighth of January, the King came to the parliament, and gave the Royal aſſent to the poll-bill, complaining of the nomination of commiſſioners, as a mark of their diſtruſt of him (2).

Poll-tax.

The miſ-underſtanding between the two houſes ſtill continuing, his Majeſty came to the parliament the eighth of February, and after paſſing ſeveral acts, he aſſured them, the money granted ſhould be laid out for the ends it was given. Then he prorogued the parliament to the tenth of October. The acts paſſed were; an act to continue for eleven months, the monthly aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds, which, with the poll-tax, was conceived ſufficient to make good the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds, granted to the King. The other acts concerned chiefly the new buildings in London, which were finiſhed ſooner than could be expected, and after a manner more beautiful and regular than before the fire (3).

An act for rebuilding London.

It is now time to ſpeak of a treaty between England and Holland, which was, tho' very ſecretly, negociating at the time the parliament granted eighteen hundred thouſand pounds for carrying on the war. In November 1665, before the King of France had declared againſt England, the States, for a foundation of peace, had offered the King one of theſe two conditions; either that each of the parties ſhould reſtore what had been taken, or both keep what they were poſſeſſed of. This was a ſure way to obviate all difficulties which might occur in the negociation. Beſide, the laſt of theſe conditions was very advantageous to England, by reaſon of the great number of ſhips taken from the Dutch before the war was even proclaimed. This offer was renewed at Paris about the middle of the year 1666, in a conference there between mr. de Lyonne, lord Holles the Engliſh embaſſador, and mr. Van Beuninghen envoy from the States. Probably, Charles expected greater advantages from the continuance of the war, ſince he returned no anſwer to this offer. He only complained of its obſcurity, without ſignifying wherein it conſiſted. Nevertheleſs, he received this advantage from it, that he knew how the States were diſpoſed, and what he could depend on: ſo that it was in his power to make peace whenever he ſhould think convenient. The ſeventeenth of September, the ſame year, the States repeated the ſame offer in a letter to his Majeſty. But as this was when the parliament was about to aſſemble, and when the King expected a large ſupply for carrying on the war, he did not think fit to imbrace it. He contented himſelf with ſignifying to their High Mightineſſes, in a letter of the fourth of October, his diſſatisfaction of their proceedings, and at the calumnies they had raiſed againſt him, in accuſing him of being the aggreſſor, and rejecting all propoſals for peace. Then he largely juſtified himſelf upon what had been alleged by the States againſt him. But the moſt important part of this letter was the King's poſitive aſſurance that he had accepted the mediation of Sweden. A place therefore to treat was to be agreed on. The choice of this place afforded Charles a pretenſe to defer the negociation ſome months. He was at firſt for having a peace managed at London, to which the States would readily have conſented, if the Kings of France and Denmark had believed it conſiſtent with their honor. Upon the repreſentation made by the States, concerning the refuſal of the two Kings their allies, his Majeſty anſwered, that he had no affair to negociate with France, and complain'd of the King of Denmark for making war againſt him without any reaſon. He was ſo offended with that King, that he made no ſcruple to tell the States, it was at the inſtigation of Denmark that he ſent his fleet to Berghen, and agreed with him to divide the ſpoil. At length, the States left the nomination of the place to him, provided it was approved by their allies. Charles accepted the offer, but inſiſted that the States ſhould firſt write to him to teſtify that they would willingly have ſent their plenipotentiaries to London, if the two Kings their allies would have given their conſent. This letter was wrote, as he deſired, the thirteenth of January 1666-7, and the King in his anſwer of the twentieth, named the Hague for the place of conference. He knew the Penſionary would not accept it, on account of the cabals which the Engliſh embaſſadors might make againſt him in favor of the young Prince of Orange. Accordingly De Wit privately cauſed the French King to reject the propoſal.

CHARLES II. AN' 1666.

All the King's proceedings clearly ſhew, he was deſirous of peace, and that it was in his power to have concluded it before the end of the year 1666. But by too much haſte he would have been deprived of the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds granted for the maintenance of the war. This was the true cauſe of the difficulties raiſed concerning the place of congreſs, in order to gain time till the money-bill ſhould paſs. After he had given his aſſent to the laſt bill for the continuation of the monthly aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds, all difficulties began to vaniſh. Seven or eight days after, the earl of St. Albans was ſent to Paris to notify to the French King, that Charles conſented things ſhould remain in the ſtate to which the chance of war had reduced them. He added however one condition, viz. that France ſhould reſtore to him the iſle of St. Chriſtophers, and three other ſmall iſlands in America, ſeized by that crown the laſt year. But this was a thing proper to be diſcuſſed at a congreſs, whereas the choice of the alternative made the eſſence of the treaty with States. So, it may be ſaid, from this time the peace was in a manner concluded; there being nothing wanted but the formality of a treaty.

R. Coke.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 180.

Mean time, the King of France, to ſerve De Wit, in preventing the King of England from inſiſting upon his nomination of the Hague for the place of conference, thought of an expedient in which he ſucceeded. This was to name Dover for the place of congreſs. And when it was objected to, he added Breda, Bois-le-duc, and Maſtreicht, leaving to the King of England the choice of one of theſe four towns. At laſt Charles having no longer intereſt to delay the peace, wrote to the States the eighteenth of March, that he was willing to ſend his plenipotentiaries to Breda.

AN' 1667. Peace treated of at Breda. D'Eſtrades. Echard. Baſnage.

The difficulty concerning the place of congreſs being removed, the next thing was to appoint embaſſadors, and diſpatch the paſſ-ports; and it was agreed the conferences ſhould begin the tenth of May. But the Engliſh plenipotentiaries arrived not at Breda till the twentieth. Theſe were the lord Holles and mr. Henry Coventry (1). From France came count d'Eſtrades, and mr. Courtin; from Denmark, meſſ. Klingenberg and Caniſius, and from the States-General, meſſ. Beverninch, Hubert, and Yongſtal. The mediators from the King of Sweden were, meſſ. Fleming and Coet. But the laſt dying at Breda, during the conferences, count de Dhona, the Swediſh embaſſador to the States, took his place.

The conferences prolonged by a miſunderſtanding. Baſnage.

At the firſt opening of the congreſs, a very obvious miſtake was diſcovered, but which, in all appearance, had been connived at by the two parties for fear of obſtructing the treaty. In their letter to the King of England the ſeventeenth of September, the States had made two propoſals for peace, the ſecond of which was that each ſhould keep what he had taken, before or during the war. This was what the States had ever adhered to, without any variation. But the King in a letter to the States, the twenty-fourth of April 1667, ſaid,—— "We take this opportunity to declare to you, "that we accept the choice propoſed to us, that "is, that each party ſhall keep whatſoever he has "taken during this war, which being granted, "we ſhall order our embaſſadors to proceed in "the preſent treaty, upon the foundation of that "made between us in the year 1662."

It is evident, that in the ſecond condition propoſed by the States, was included whatever had been acquired by either party, not only during, but before the war, and that in the King's lette rwas compriſed only what had been taken during the war. Now his Majeſty pretended, according to the terms of his acceptation, the States ſhould make him ſatisfaction for the two ſhips, the Good Hope and the Bon Adventure, taken, or ſunk before the treaty of 1662. He likewiſe inſiſted, that as the States were obliged by the ſame treaty to reſtore to him the iſle of Poleron in the Eaſt-Indies, and as that iſle was ſtill in their poſſeſſion, it ſhould be delivered to him. Theſe two articles were the principal ſubject of debate in the conference of Breda, and retarded the concluſion of the treaty, to the great damage of the Engliſh, as will hereafter appear. The States kept to the terms of their offer, and Charles to thoſe of his acceptation.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

A difficulty relating to the iſle of Poleron. Echard, Vol. III. p. 181. Baſnage.

I have already mentioned the two ſhips taken by the Dutch in the interval between the two treaties of 1659 and 1662. As for the iſle of Poleron, their High Mightineſſes pretended, they had reſtored it in form, and produced a receipt from the Engliſh officer, to whom it was delivered. But before this ſurrender, they had intirely depopulated it, cut down all the clove-trees, and in ſhort, had ſeized it again ſince the begining of this war. But the King pretended, there were eſſential defects in the form of the reſtitution, and that the States were obliged to reſtore it by the terms of the treaty 1662. Were this iſle in the hands of the Engliſh, it would be of great importance to them, by reaſon within about four or five years it might be new ſtocked with clove-trees, and ſo prove very prejudicial to the Dutch, who are maſters of the whole ſpice-trade.

Both parties intractable.

To decide theſe two articles, from which both parties made it a point of honor not to recede, couriers were ſent ſeveral times to London and the Hague, and thoſe from London brought only ſtricter orders to the embaſſadors to inſiſt upon the two ſhips, and the iſle of Poleron. But at length the King yielded the laſt, ſo that the whole negociation was reduced to the ſatisfaction demanded for the two ſhips. It is not very ſurprizing, that his Majeſty ſhould inſiſt on this article. He had began the war under the ſpecious pretenſe of procuring reparation for all the damages done to his ſubjects, which he computed at ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. To inable him to obtain this reparation by force of arms, the parliament had furniſhed him with five hundred and fifty-five thouſand pounds. Moreover he had taken ſixſcore ſhips, before the war was declared, and above fourſcore ſince. In all probability he had not applied the product of theſe captures to the benefit of his ſubjects, who, according to his calculation, had loſt ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds, and for which the war was undertaken. He could not therefore well diſpenſe with procuring the merchants, who had loſt theſe two ſhips, the ſatisfaction demanded by them, without giving occaſion to believe, this war had been undertaken for imaginary pretenſions. For the demands concerning theſe ſhips were properly the only things that were ſpecified. All the reſt conſiſted in generals, the diſcuſſion whereof was unneceſſary, by reaſon of the choice propoſed by their High Mightineſſes. It was not that they feared a diſcuſſion, ſince they had offered it in the firſt of their two conditions. But it was the King's intereſt to avoid it, and accept the ſecond. If he had imbraced it, in the ſame terms as offered by the States, all the grounds of this war, ſo expenſive to England, would have remained in obſcurity. He could not therefore in honor but inſiſt on the only article, which could be conſidered as the juſt cauſe of the war, tho' it did not amount to ten thouſand pounds ſterling. Mean time, as by the offer of the States, he ſaw, he could make peace when he pleaſed, he thought it a needleſs expenſe to put to ſea a powerful fleet, as he had done the two preceding years, and that it was better to ſave the moſt part of the money granted for the continuance of the war. To this end, relying on the certainty of a peace, he laid up his great ſhips, and kept only a ſquadron of twenty ſail, while the Hollanders continued their preparations as uſual, in their uncertainty of the King's intention concerning peace.

Sends no fleet out.

In the interim, the States ſeeing what difficulties the King formed upon an article of ſo little conſequence, believed, or pretended to believe, he had no inclination to peace. They therefore reſolved, either to force him to relinquiſh his pretenſions, or at leaſt to continue the war this ſummer with advantage, becauſe they knew, that his Majeſty would have no great fleet at ſea.

The Dutch come into the mouth of the Thames. Baſnage. Echard, Vol. III. p. 182. Kennet. R. Coke.

Agreeable to this reſolution, Ruyter ſailed out of the Texel with fifty ſhips, and came the eighth of June to the mouth of the Thames, from whence he detached vice-admiral Van Ghent, with ſeventeen of his lighteſt ſhips, and ſome fire-ſhips.

Burn ſeveral ſhips.

The tenth of June, Van Ghent ſailed up the Medway, made himſelf maſter of the fort of Sheerneſs, and, after burning a magazine full of ſtores, to the value of forty thouſand pounds, blew up the fortifications. This action alarmed the city of London; ſo to prevent greater miſchiefs, ſeveral ſhips were ſunk, and a large chain put croſs the narroweſt part of the river Medway. But by the means of an eaſterly wind, and a ſtrong tide, the Dutch ſhips broke thro' the chain, and ſailed between the ſunk veſſels. They immediately burned three large ſhips, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all taken from them in the preſent war, and carried away with them the hull of the Royal Charles, beſide burning and damaging ſeveral others. After this, they advanced as far as Upnore caſtle, and burned the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James. The Engliſh fearing the Dutch fleet would ſail up to London bridge, ſunk * ſhips at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall, and platforms furniſhed with artillery to defend them, were raiſed in ſeveral places. The conſternation was very great, and the complaints were no leſs ſo. It was openly ſaid, the King out of avarice had kept the money ſo generouſly given him to continue the war, and left his ſhips and ſubjects expoſed to the inſults of the enemy, tho' he had exclaimed againſt the injuſtice done him, in believing him capable of ſuch an action. The King is very much mortified.

King was under an inexpreſſible concern, as well for fear of greater damage from the Dutch fleet, as for the mortification this affair gave him, and the ſhame of having nothing to ſay to the murmurs of his people. Beſide he could but reflect on himſelf for being the cauſe of this inſult, by inſiſting too long upon an affair of ten thouſand pounds, and thereby retarding the concluſion of the peace (1).

Other exploits of Ruyter. Baſnage. Echard, Vol. III. p. 187.

After this exploit, Ruyter ſailed to Portſmouth, deſigning to burn the ſhips in that harbor; but finding them ſecured, he ſailed to the weſt, and took ſome ſhips in Torbay. He then ſailed eaſtward, beat the Engliſh before Harwich, and chaced a ſquadron * commanded by ſir Edward Spragg, who was obliged to retire into the Thames. In ſhort he kept the coaſts of England in a continual alarm all July, till he received the news of the concluſion of a peace.

The peace concluded at Breda. Id. p. 187.

The face of affairs were ſo changed by this event, that the Engliſh embaſſadors at Breda grew more pliant, and were eaſily perſuaded to yield the article of the two ſhips. It was however with the reſervation of the King's approbation, before the ſigning of the treaty. To this end, Coventry, after all the articles were ſetled, paſſed into England the ſecond of July, and returned the eighth with his Majeſty's approbation, and the twenty-firſt the treaty of peace was ſigned. It was divided however into three ſeparate treaties, by reaſon of ſome inconveniencies which would otherwiſe have followed. But by a writing ſigned by all the plenipotentiaries, it was declared, that the three treaties ſhould be eſteemed but one and the ſame.

By a ſeparate article it was agreed, That if any of the murderers of Charles I, ſhould be found in the dominions of the States-General, they ſhould be delivered to the King, &c.

Reflections upon this peace.

If it be now conſidered, what benefit England received from a war undertaken upon ſuch ſlight grounds, with ſuch animoſity, it will not be eaſy to diſcover a ſingle advantage that was not really contained in the treaty of the fourth of September 1662. But on the other hand, it will be found, that this war coſt five millions five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, beſide the loſs of the ſhips of war, whether in ſea ingagements, or in the affair of Chatham (1). And yet Charles had aſſured the parliament, in one of his ſpeeches, that he would never lay down his arms, till he had procured his ſubjects a reaſonable ſatisfaction for their loſſes, which on his computation, amounted to ſeven or eight hundred thouſand pounds. And if theſe loſſes are ſuppoſed real, this peace was ſo much the more diſhonorable to the King and the Engliſh nation. But, on the contrary, it is eaſy to perceive, that the King and duke of York reaped by it conſiderable advantages: the King, by the large ſupplies of money which were granted him, but not expended in the war, at leaſt, the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds given in January and February this year, and by the ſale of above two hundred ſhips taken from the Dutch: the duke of York, by his claims upon theſe captures as lord high-admiral, and by the preſent of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds made him by the parliament. Such was the concluſion of this great armament, which was to humble the pride of the Dutch, and render them for ever incapable to ſupport their trade and diſpute the empire of the ſeas with England. The peace was proclaimed at London, and at the Hague, the twenty-fourth of Auguſt.

The King of France invades the Netherlands. Kennet, p. 292. Baſnage. R. Coke.

The French King, as hath been ſhewn, gave no very real aſſiſtance to his allies, ſince his fleet never joined that of the States, not even this laſt year, when the Engliſh were in no condition to oppoſe the junction. He had then other deſigns, which were diſcovered in June, by an invaſion of the Netherlands, on account of his Queen's pretenſions to Brabant, after the death of Philip IV, her father. In the whole courſe of the war between the King of England and the States-General, he clearly ſhewed his intention to make Charles his friend, in which he afterwards ſucceeded but too well. He would never have declared againſt him, notwithſtanding his ſtrict ingagement with the States in the treaty of 1662, had he not believed ſuch a declaration abſolutely neceſſary to ſupport De Wit, who otherwiſe was in great danger of ruin. He earneſtly wiſhed to ſee the end of this war, in which he had very unwillingly ingaged. This appeared chiefly in the conferences at Breda, where his two plenipotentiaries performed properly the office of mediators, tho' thoſe of Sweden had the name. Accordingly he was greatly ſuſpected in Holland of a ſecret correſpondence with England.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

Complaints againſt the court. Burnet. Echard. R. Coke.

Complaints and murmurs againſt King Charles and his miniſters ſucceeded the animoſity with which the Dutch war was begun. When the advantages obtained by the peace were compared with the expenſe of the war, they were found ſo diſproportionable, that men could not help ſuſpecting, it had been raiſed by motives repugnant to the Engliſh intereſt. The people had been told, it was undertaken to procure the merchants ſatisfaction for the damages received from the Dutch: to revenge the indignities the nation had ſuffered: and to incapacitate the United Provinces ever to rival England again, but nothing of all this had been effected. The merchants had received no ſatisfaction even for the two ſhips, the Good-Hope and the Bon-Adventure, tho' that article was the moſt ſpecified. Inſtead of revenging the affronts offered the nation, England had received a real and moſt mortifying indignity in the affair of Chatham. Laſtly, after the peace of Breda, the United-Provinces were in a more flouriſhing condition than before the war, and they looked on this peace as a triumph. On the other hand, few could digeſt Charles preſſing the parliament for money to carry on the war, and that, after receiving eighteen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, he ſhould be ſo intent upon peace, as not to put himſelf in a condition to obtain reaſonable terms. This was a ſubject very apt to raiſe a ſuſpicion of the ſincerity of his intentions for the good of his people. In fine, it was more and more diſcovered that the Papiſts had great influence at court, and that the proclamations publiſhed againſt them, at the deſire of the parliament, were far from being rigoroſly executed. The earl of Arlington, almoſt open protector of the Papiſts, was made ſecretary of ſtate, and in great favor, while the credit of the earl of Clarendon, their enemy, daily declined. This began to produce diſtruſts not advantageous to the King. Beſide, his diſſolute life did not help to preſerve the high opinion conceived of him in the beginning of his reign. His court was a ſcene of debauchery, where his miſtreſſes ruled abſolutely, and nothing was done but thro' their means. They conſumed his vaſt revenues, with almoſt all the money granted by parliament, ſo that in the midſt of riches, he was always in want, and forced to ſeek new pretenſes to draw money from his parliament, to ſupply his private extravagancies.

Suſpicions againſt the King.

The diſorders of his court. Burnet.

The chancellor's diſgrace. Echard, Vol. III. p. 190, 191. Kennet. Burnet.

The King being acquainted with theſe ſuſpicions and complaints, reſolved to appeaſe them by ſacrificing the earl of Clarendon, who had hitherto acted as prime-miniſter. He knew, the people were always exceſſively pleaſed with ſacrifices of miniſters, who have injoyed the greateſt credit, and on whom generally are thrown all the miſcarriages. But this was only a pretenſe uſed by his Majeſty to be delivered of a miniſter, whom he no longer loved, and whoſe preſenſe and counſels were become inſupportable to him. The chancellor's regular life; his averſion to debauchery and libertiniſm; his grave and ſevere manners; his neglect of the King's favorites and miſtreſſes; and laſtly, his principles

principles and maxims concerning religion and the ſtate, ill agreed with the diſorderly life of the court, and ſtill leſs with the projects formed in favor of the Papiſts, under color of eaſing the Preſbyterians. For this reaſon, and for his rough and always too haughty behavior, he had rendered himſelf odious to the courtiers, who never ceaſed doing him ill offices, eſpecially when they ſaw him in the decline of favor. He had often taken the liberty of reproving the King for his diſorderly life, and at firſt theſe reproofs were well received. But when the King had once abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures, he could no longer bear the preſenſe of a man, whoſe advice he had formerly received with a ſort of ſubmiſſion. The duke of Buckingham, and ſome others, perceiving this diſpoſition in his Majeſty, neglected nothing to cheriſh it. As often as they ſaw the chancellor coming, they would ſay to the King, Here comes your ſchool-maſter! At other times they mimicked him before his Majeſty, in order to make him ridiculous. The duke of Buckingham uſed to walk in a ſtately manner, with a pair of bellows before him for the purſe, while colonel Titus carried a fire-ſhovel on his ſhoulder for the mace. The King ſuffered theſe buffooneries, and thereby diſcovered his diſguſt to his miniſter. But as theſe are only trifles, and as the King's diſlike turned at laſt into real hatred, it is proper to relate the more ſerious cauſes which have been offered in vindication of his reſentment.

Cauſes of his fall. Echard, Vol. III. p. 191. Burnet, p. 248, &c.

1. It is pretended, the King deſigning to be divorced from his Queen on ſeveral weak pretenſes, could never obtain the chancellor's approbation.

2. His Majeſty intended, after his divorce, to marry mrs. Stuart his relation, for whom he had great veneration. The earl of Clarendon, to prevent this, perſuaded the young duke of Richmond to eſpouſe her, by repreſenting, how ſerviceable it would be to gain him the King's favor. The duke, following this advice, made his addreſſes to the lady, who, knowing nothing of his Majeſty's deſign, believed ſhe ought not to refuſe ſo good an offer, and the marriage was immediately concluded. The King thus diſappointed, baniſhed the duke, with his new ducheſs, from the court, and never forgave the chancellor.

Welwood, p. 109.

3. Another, and, as was generally thought, the moſt apparent cauſe of the King's reſentment againſt the earl, was his oppoſing Popham's project of ſetling an annual revenue of two millions of pounds ſterling upon the King, which was ſeconded by the earl of Southampton.

4. The moſt probable cauſe of the chancellor's ruin was, that the Papiſts, whoſe counſels and projects were liſtened to, and approved by the Sovereign, omited nothing to deſtroy him, knowing, that under his miniſtry they could never hope the accompliſhment of their deſigns.

Burnet, p. 249. Kennet's Regiſter, p. 804.

5. A ſtately houſe built by him near St. James's Park (1), and in the very year of the plague did him great injury in the minds of the people. It is pretended, it coſt him fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, tho' he at firſt deſigned to lay out but fifteen or ſixteen thouſand. People gave it the name of Dunkirk-houſe, becauſe it was ſuppoſed that his advice for the ſale of that place had furniſhed him with the means of raiſing this edifice. He commited another error, in purchaſing for this houſe the ſtones deſigned for repairing St. Paul's.

However this be, the King, under color of giving ſome ſatisfaction to his people in ſacrificing this miniſter, deprived him of his office of high-chancellor, and made ſir Orlando Bridgeman lord-keeper of the great-ſeal.

Charles II. An' 1667.

The earl of Southampton's death. Id. p. 192. Burnet.

The earl of Southampton lord treaſurer, dying three months before the chancellor's diſgrace, his Majeſty was at once deprived of two great and faithful miniſters, whoſe loſs was never repaired, at leaſt, with regard to their morals, their religion, and affection for their country. A little before Southampton's death, ſome perſon in council ſpeaking with ſome warmth againſt the chancellor, he ſaid—"The earl of Clarendon is a true Pro-"teſtant, and an honeſt Engliſhman, and while "he is in place we are ſecure of our laws, liber-"ties, and religion: but whenever he ſhall be re-"moved, England will feel the ill effects of it." In this he proved a true prophet.

After the earl of Southampton's death, the King put the treaſury into commiſſion. Among the commiſſioners was ſir Thomas Clifford, a known Papiſt (2), on whom afterwards fell his Majeſty's choice for lord treaſurer.

The lord-keeper's ſpeech to both houſes. Echard. Kennet.

The parliament meeting the tenth of October, the King ſpoke but little, and left it to the lord-keeper, to acquaint both houſes with his intentions. His ſpeech ran chiefly upon a ſort of excuſe for the King's having, contrary to cuſtom, after a prorogation to October, ordered the parliament by proclamation to meet the twenty-fifth of July, and then, by another proclamation deferred the new ſeſſion to the time firſt appointed. He communicated to them the concluſion of the peace, and deſired them to ſetle the balance of trade with Scotland. He ſaid, the King having named commiſſioners to ſtate the public accounts, and examine to what uſes the money granted by parliament had been applied, and this commiſſion not having ſucceeded as he expected, he left them to follow their own method, and examine them as ſtrictly as they pleaſed. He added, that ſome malicious perſons had diſperſed falſe reports againſt the government, with deſign to create a diſaffection in his ſubjects: but that his Majeſty promiſed himſelf from their affection, they would, on the contrary, indeavor to preſerve a good underſtanding between him and his people. That if any juſt grievances have happened, his Majeſty was ready to redreſs them, and did not doubt they would imprint upon the hearts of his ſubjects that known truth——"That "there is no diſtinct intereſt between the King and "his people, but the good of one is the good of "both."

The addreſs of both houſes to the King. Octob. 15. Kennet. Echard.

Some days after the two houſes preſented an addreſs to the King to thank him for ſeveral things: 1. That he had diſbanded the late raiſed forces. 2. That he had diſmiſſed the Papiſts from out of his guards, and other military imployments. 3. That he had revoked the Canary patent. 4. And more eſpecially, That he had diſplaced the late lord chancellor, and removed him from the exerciſe of public truſt and imployment in affairs of ſtate. His Majeſty anſwered to this laſt article, "That he "would never imploy the earl of Clarendon again "in any public affairs whatſoever."

This ſufficiently diſcovered the King had no intention to protect the earl of Clarendon, therefore the houſe was incouraged thereby to ſeek reaſons or pretenſes to impeach him of treaſon. But it is too little to ſay, his Majeſty would not protect him.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

It is certain, he himſelf was his adverſary, and actuated the commons againſt him. This he clearly ſhewed, by reprimanding ſir Stephen Fox, who was of his houſhold, and member of the houſe of commons, for having voted in favor of the ſaid earl. To which ſir Stephen replied, "That he knew the "earl to be an honeſt man, and was ſure could "never be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge." At laſt, the commons proceeding with great warmth, ordered an accuſation to be drawn and preſented to the houſe, the ſubſtance whereof is as follows:

Echard, Vol. III. p. 198.

Articles againſt the earl of Clarendon. Nov. 6. State-Trials. Vol. II. p. 556, 557. Echard. Kennet.

"I. That the earl of Clarendon hath deſigned a "ſtanding army to be raiſed, and to govern the "kingdom thereby; and adviſed the King to diſ-"ſolve this preſent parliament, and to lay aſide all "thoughts of parliaments for the future; to go-"vern by a military power, and to maintain the "ſame by free quarter and contribution.

"II. That he hath, in the hearing of the King's "ſubjects, falſely and ſeditiouſly ſaid, 'That the "King was in his heart a Papiſt, or Popiſhly af-"fected,' or words to that effect.

"III. That he hath received great ſums of "money for the procuring of the canary-"patent, and other illegal patents; and granted "illegal injunctions to ſtop proceedings at law "againſt them, and other illegal patents formerly "granted.

"IV. That he hath adviſed and procured diverſe "of his Majeſty's ſubjects to be impriſoned againſt "law, in remote iſlands, gariſons, and other places, "thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the "law, and to produce precedents for the impri-"ſoning any other of his Majeſty's ſubjects in like "manner.

"V. That he procured his Majeſty's cuſtoms to "be farmed at under rates, knowing the ſame; "and great pretended debts to be paid by his Ma-"jeſty, to the payment of which his Majeſty was "not ſtrictly bound, and afterwards received great "ſums of money for procuring the ſame.

"VI. That he received great ſums of money "from the company of Vintners, or ſome of them "or their agents, for enhancing the prices of wines, "and for freeing them from the payment of legal "penalties, which they had incurred.

"VII. That he had in a ſhort time gained to "himſelf a greater eſtate than can be imagined to "be gained lawfully in ſo ſhort a ſpace: and, con-"trary to his oath, he hath procured ſeveral grants "under the ſeal, from his Majeſty to himſelf and "relations, of ſeveral of his Majeſty's lands, here-"ditaments and leaſes, to the diſprofit of his Ma-"jeſty.

"VIII. That he hath introduced an arbitrary "government in his Majeſty's foreign plantations, "and hath cauſed ſuch as complained thereof before "his Majeſty and council, to be long impriſoned "for ſo doing.

"IX. That he did reject and fruſtrate a propo-"ſal and undertaking approved by his Majeſty, for "the preſervation of Nevis and St. Chriſtophers, "and reducing the French plantations to his Ma-"jeſty's obedience, after the commiſſions were "drawn for that purpoſe; which was the occaſion "of our great loſſes and damages in thoſe parts.

"X. That he held correſpondence with Crom-"well and his accomplices, when he was in parts "beyond the ſeas, attending his Majeſty, and "thereby adhered to the King's enemies.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

"XI. That he adviſed and effected the ſale of "Dunkirk to the French King, being part of his "Majeſty's dominions; together with the ammu-"nition, artillery, and all ſorts of ſtores there, and "for no greater value than the ſaid ammunition, "artillery, and the ſtores were worth.

"XII. That the ſaid earl did unduly cauſe his "Majeſty's letters-patent, under the great-ſeal of "England, to one dr. Crowther, to be altered, "and the inrollment thereof to be unduly razed.

"XIII. That he hath in an arbitrary way exa-"mined and brought into queſtion diverſe of his "Majeſty's ſubjects concerning their lands, tene-"ments, goods, chattels and properties, deter-"mined thereof at the council-table, and ſtoped "proceedings at law by order of the council-table, "and threatened ſome that pleaded the ſtatute of "the ſeventeenth of Car. I.

"XIV. That he hath cauſed Quo Warrantos "to be iſſued out againſt moſt of the corporations of "England, immediately after their charters were "confirmed by act of parliament, to the intent he "might require great ſums of money of them for "renewing their charters; which, when they com-"plied withal, he cauſed the ſaid Quo War-"rantos to be diſcharged, and proſecutions therein "to ceaſe.

"XV. That he procured the bills of ſetle-"ment for Ireland, and received great ſums of "money for the ſame, in a moſt corrupt and un-"lawful manner.

"XVI. That he hath deluded and betrayed his "Majeſty, and the nation, in all foreign treaties "and negociations relating to the late war, and be-"trayed and diſcovered his Majeſty's ſecret coun-"ſels to his enemies.

"XVII. That he was the principal author of "that fatal counſel of dividing the fleet about June "1666 (1)."

Echard, Vol. III. p. 198.

The commons on the twelfth of November, on the foundation of theſe articles, impeached the earl of high-treaſon at the bar of the lords houſe, and deſired that he might be ſent to the Tower. But the lords did not think proper to commit him upon an accuſation of treaſon in general, without any particular charge.

This raiſed a warm diſpute between the two houſes, which ſeveral conferences could not allay. At laſt, the commons came to this reſolution. "That the lords not having complied with the "deſire of the commons, in commiting the earl "of Clarendon, and ſequeſtring him from parlia-"ment upon the impeachment from that houſe, "was an obſtruction of the public juſtice of "the kingdom, and a precedent of evil and "dangerous conſequence." At the ſame time, they appointed a commitee to draw up a declara-tion to vindicate their proceedings.

Id. p. 200.

But the earl of Clarendon ſeeing himſelf expoſed to the commons rage, and knowing the King and the whole court were againſt him, thought it adviſeable to withdraw into France, and leave the following apology behind him, addreſſed to the lords (2).

(1) The impeachment was carried up by Edward Seymour, eſq; who was alſo the firſt man that charged him in the houſe of commons, with many great and heinous crimes. The reſt of the chief ſpeakers againſt him, were, ſir Thomas Littleton, ſerjeant Maynard, ſir John Holland, ſir Thomas Oſborn, ſir Robert Howard, mr. Garraway, lord St. John, ſir Charles Wheeler, mr. Hampden, Marvel, Prynn, ſecretary Morice, Waller, and ſir John Vaughan. &c. Thoſe that ſpoke in his favor, were, ſir Heneage Finch, ſir Francis Goodrick, mr. Coventry, ſir Edward Thurland, ſir John Brampſton, ſir John Talbot, ſir John Stow, ſir Thomas Clifford, ſir Stephen Fox, and the earl's ſon, Laurence Hyde. Echard, Vol. III. p. 195.——The baron d'Iſola, the Spaniſh embaſſador at the court of England, was the author of the earl's diſgrace. See Baſnage Ann. Vol. I. p. 810.

(2) As Rapin, by abridging this apology, has rendered it very obſcure, the tranſlator has thought fit to inſert it, as it is to be found in the proceedings againſt him. See State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 574.

State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 574. Kennet, p. 290.

" I am very unfortunate to find myſelf to ſuffer " ſo much, under two very diſadvantageous re- " flections, which are in no degree applicable to " me.

" The firſt, from the greatneſs of my eſtate and " fortune, collected and made in ſo few years, " which if it be proportionable to what is re- " ported, may very reaſonably cauſe my integrity " to be ſuſpected.

" The ſecond, that I have been the ſole mana- " ger, and chief miniſter in all the tranſactions of " ſtate, ſince the King's return into England, to " Auguſt laſt, and therefore, that all miſcarriages " and misfortunes ought to be imputed to me and " my counſels.

" Concerning my eſtate, your lordſhips will not " believe, that after malice and envy hath been ſo " inquiſitive and ſo ſharp-ſighted, I will offer any " thing to your lordſhips, but what is exactly " true; and I do aſſure your lordſhips in the firſt " place, that (excepting from the King's bounty) " I have never received nor taken one penny but " what was generally underſtood to be the juſt law- " ful perquiſites of my office, by the conſtant prac- " tiſe of the beſt-times, which I did in my own " judgment conceive to be that of my lord Coven- " try, and of my lord Elleſmere; the practiſe of " which I conſtantly obſerved, altho' the office in " both their times was lawfully worth double to " what it was to me, and I believe now is.

" That all the courteſies and favors which I " have been able to obtain from the King for other " perſons in church or ſtate, or in Weſtminſter- " hall, have never been worth to me five pounds; " ſo that your lordſhips may be confident, I am as " innocent from corruption as from any diſloyal " thought, which after near thirty years ſervice of " the crown, in ſome difficulties and diſtreſſes, I did " never expect would be objected to me in my age.

" And I do aſſure your lordſhips, and ſhall " make it very manifeſt, that the ſeveral ſums of " money, and ſome parcels of land, which his Ma- " jeſty hath bountifully beſtowed upon me ſince " his return into England, are worth more than all " I have amounts unto; ſo far I am from advancing " my eſtate by indirect means. And tho' this " bounty of his hath very far exceeded my merit, " or my expectation, yet ſome others have been as " fortunate at leaſt in the ſame bounty, who had as " ſmall pretenſes to it, and have no great reaſon to " envy my condition.

" Concerning the other imputation of the credit " and power of being chiefeſt miniſter, and ſo cauſing " all to be done that I had a mind to; I have no " more to ſay, than that I had the good fortune to " ſerve a maſter of a very great judgment and un- " derſtanding, and be always joined with perſons of " great ability and experience, without whoſe ad- " vice and concurrence, never any thing hath been " done.

" Before his Majeſty's coming into England he " was conſtantly attended by the then marquis of " Ormond, the late lord Culpeper, and mr. ſecre- " tary Nicholas, who were equally truſted with my- " ſelf, and without whoſe joint advice and con- " currence, when they were all preſent (as ſome " of them always were) I never gave any counſel. " As ſoon as it pleaſed God to bring his Majeſty " into England, he eſtabliſhed his privy council, " and ſhortly out of them he choſe a number of " honorable perſons of great reputation (who for " the moſt part are ſtill alive) as a commitee for " foreign affairs, and conſideration of ſuch things " as in the nature of them required much ſecreſy; " and with theſe perſons he vouchſafed to join me: " and I am confident this commitee never tranſ- " acted any thing of moment (his Majeſty being " always preſent) without preſenting the ſame firſt " to the council-board; and I muſt appeal to them " concerning my carriage, and whether we were " not all of one mind, in matters of importance.

Charles II. An' 1667.

" For more than two years I never knew any " differences in the council, or that there were any " complaints in the kingdom, which I wholly " impute to his Majeſty's great wiſdom, and the " intire concurrence of his counſellors, without the " vanity of aſſuming any thing to myſelf; and " therefore I hope I ſhall not be ſingly charged " with any thing that hath ſince fallen out amiſs. " But from the time mr. ſecretary Nicholas was " removed from his place, there were great alte- " rations; and whoſoever knew any thing of the " court and council, know well how much my " credit hath ſince that time been diminiſhed, " tho' his Majeſty graciouſly vouchſafed ſtill to " hear my advice in moſt of his affairs: nor hath " there been, from that time to this, above one " or two perſons brought to the council, or pre- " ferred to any conſiderable office in the court, " who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or " ſuſpected to have any kindneſs for me; and moſt " of them moſt notoriouſly known to have been " very long my enemies, and of different judg- " ment and principles from me in church and " ſtate, and have taken all opportunities to leſſen " my credit with the King, and with all other " perſons, by miſ-repreſenting and miſ-reporting " all that I ſaid or did, and perſuading men I " have done them ſome prejudice with his Ma- " jeſty, or croſt them in ſome of their pretenſions. " Tho' his Majeſty's goodneſs and juſtice was ſuch " that it made little impreſſion upon him.

" In my humble opinion, the great misfortunes " of the kingdom have proceeded from the war, " to which it is notoriouſly known that I was " always moſt averſe, and may without vanity ſay, " I did not only foreſee, but declare the miſchiefs " we ſhould run into, by entering into a war, be- " fore any alliances made with the neighboring " Princes. And that it may not be imputed to his " Majeſty's want of care, or the negligence of his " counſellors, that no ſuch alliances were entered " into, I muſt take the boldneſs to ſay, his Ma- " jeſty left nothing unattempted in order thereunto; " and knowing very well, that France reſolved to " begin a war upon Spain, as ſoon as his Catholic " Majeſty ſhould depart this world, which being " much ſooner expected by them, they had in the " two winters before been at great charges in pro- " viding plentiful magazines of all proviſions upon " the frontiers, that they might be ready for the " war, his Majeſty uſed all poſſible means to pre- " pare and diſpoſe the Spaniard with that appre- " henſion, offering his friendſhip to that degree, " as might be for the benefit and ſecurity of both " crowns.

" But Spain flattering itſelf, that France would " not break with them, at leaſt, that they would " not give them any cauſe by adminiſtring matter " of jealouſy to them, never made any real ap- " proach towards a friendſhip with his Majeſty, " but, both by their embaſſadors here, and to his " Majeſty's embaſſador at Madrid, always per- " ſiſted as preliminaries, upon the giving up of " Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica.

" Tho' France had an embaſſador here, to " whom a project of a treaty was offered, and the " lord Holles, his Majeſty's embaſſador at Paris, " uſed all indeavors to purſue and proſecute the " ſaid treaty, yet it was quickly diſcerned, that " the principal deſign of France, was to draw " his Majeſty into ſuch a nearer alliance as might " advance their deſign; without which, they had " no mind to enter into the treaty propoſed.

" And

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

" And this was the ſtate of affairs when the war " was entered into with the Dutch, from which " time, neither crown much conſidered the making " any alliance with England.

" As I did from my ſoul abhor the entering " into this war, ſo I preſumed never to give any " advice or counſel for the way of managing it, " but by oppoſing many propoſitions, which " ſeemed to the late lord treaſurer and myſelf to " be unreaſonable, as the payment of the ſea-men " by tickets, and many other particulars which " added to the expenſe.

" My enemies took all occaſions to inveigh " againſt me, and making their friendſhip with " others out of the council, of more licentious " principles, and who knew well enough how much " I diſliked and complained of the liberty they " took to themſelves of reviling all councils and " counſellors, and turning all things ſerious and " ſacred into ridicule. They took all ways ima- " ginable to render me ungreatful to all ſorts of " men (whom I ſhall be compelled to name in " my defenſe) perſuading thoſe that miſcarried in " any of their deſigns, that it was the chancellor's " doing; whereof I never knew any thing. How- " ever, they could not withdraw the King's favor " from me, who was ſtill pleaſed to uſe my ſervice " with others, nor was there ever any thing done " but with the joint advice of at leaſt the major " part of thoſe who were conſulted with. And as " his Majeſty commanded my ſervice in the late " treaties, ſo I never gave the leaſt advice in " private, nor wrote one letter to any one perſon in " either of theſe negociations, but upon the advice " of the council, and alſo after it was read in " council, or at leaſt by the King himſelf, and " ſome others; and if I prepared any inſtructions " or memorials, it was by the King's command, " and the requeſt of the ſecretaries who deſired my " aſſiſtance; nor was it any wiſh of my own, that " any embaſſador ſhould give me any account of " the tranſactions, but to the ſecretaries, whom I " was always ready to adviſe; nor am I conſcious " to myſelf of ever having given advice that hath " proved miſchievous or inconvenient to his Ma- " jeſty; and I have been ſo far from being the " ſole manager of affairs, that I have not, in the " whole laſt year, been above twice with his Ma- " jeſty in any room alone, and very ſeldom in the " two or three years preceeding.

" And ſince the parliament at Oxford, it hath " been very viſible, that my credit hath been very " little, and that very few things have been " hearkened to, which have been propoſed by me, " but contradicted, 'eo nomine,' becauſe pro- " poſed by me.

" I moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips to re- " member the office and truſt I had for ſeven " years, in which, in diſcharge of my duty, I " was obliged to ſtop and obſtruct many mens pre- " tenſes, and refuſed to ſet the ſeal to many pardons " and other grants, which would have been profit- " able to thoſe who procured them, and many " whereof, upon my repreſentation to his Ma- " jeſty, were for ever ſtopt, which naturally has " raiſed many enemies to me: and my frequent " concurring, upon the deſires of the late lord " treaſurer (with whom I had the honor to have " a long and vaſt friendſhip to his death) in re- " preſenting ſeveral exceſſes and exorbitances, the " yearly iſſue ſo far exceeding the revenues, pro- " voked many perſons concerned, of great power " and credit, to do me all the ill offices they could. " And yet I may faithfully ſay, that I never med- " dled with any part of the revenue or the admi- " niſtration of it, but when I was deſired by the " late lord treaſurer to give him my aſſiſtance and " advice, having had the honor formerly to ſerve " the crown as chancellor of the exchequer, which " was for the moſt part in his Majeſty's preſenſe. " Nor have I ever been in the leaſt degree con- " cerned, in point of profit, in leting any part of " his Majeſty's revenue; nor had ever treated or " debated it, but in his Majeſty's preſenſe, in " which my opinion concurred always with the " major part of the counſellors who were preſent.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

" All which, upon examination, will be made " manifeſt to your lordſhips, how much ſoever " my integrity is blaſted by the malice of thoſe, " who, I am confident, do not believe themſelves. " Nor have I in my life, upon all the treaties, or " otherwiſe, received the value of one ſhilling from " all the Kings or Princes in the world (except the " books of the Louvre-print ſent me by the chan- " cellor of France, by that King's direction) but " from my own maſter, to whoſe intire ſervice, " and the good and welfare of my country, no " man's heart was ever more devoted.

" This being my preſent condition, I do moſt " humbly beſeech your lordſhips to entertain a fa- " vorable opinion of me, and to believe me to be " innocent from thoſe foul aſperſions, until the con- " trary ſhall be proved; which I am ſure can " never be by any man worthy to be believed: " and ſince the diſtempers of the times, and the " difference between the two houſes in the preſent " debate, with the power and malice of my ene- " mies, who gave out that I ſhould prevail with " his Majeſty to prorogue or diſſolve this parlia- " ment in diſpleaſure, and threaten to expoſe me to " the rage and fury of the people, may make me to " be looked upon as the cauſe which obſtructs the " King's ſervice, and unity and peace of the king- " dom.

" I moſt humbly beſeech your lordſhips, that I " may not forfeit your lordſhips favor and protec- " tion, by withdrawing myſelf from ſo powerful a " perſecution, in hope that I may be able, by ſuch " withdrawing, hereafter to appear and make my " defenſe, when his Majeſty's juſtice (to which I " ſhall always ſubmit) may not be obſtructed or " controled, by the power and malice of thoſe who " have ſworn my deſtruction."

It is communicated to the commons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 204. Kennet.

The lords having received this apology the third of December, deſired a conference with the commons, to communicate it to them. The duke of Buckingham, who was to deliver it, ſaid, " The " lords have commanded me to deliver you this " ſcandalous and ſeditious paper, ſent from the earl " of Clarendon: they bid me to preſent it to you, " and deſire you in convenient time to ſend it to " them again, for it has a ſtile which they are in " love with, and therefore deſire to keep it."

Is publicly burnt.

The reading of this apology threw the commons into a flame. Some of the earl's enemies (1) took occaſion to make the moſt virulent ſpeeches againſt him; and at laſt, the houſe voted his apology ſcandalous and malicious, and a reproach to the juſtice of the nation, and ordered it to be burned by the common hangman.

Ibid.

The thirteenth of December, the lords ſent to the commons a bill for the baniſhment of the earl of Clarendon, which met with great oppoſition in that houſe. Some of the members even propoſed a bill of attainder againſt him. The houſe at laſt voted, " That the King ſhould be prayed to iſſue out his " proclamation for ſummoning the ſaid earl to ap- " pear by a day, and to apprehend him in order " to his trial, and that the lords be ſent to for " their concurrence in this vote." But the lords refuſed their concurrence, becauſe this vote was contrary to their bill.

A bill is paſſed for the earl's baniſhment. Burnet, p. 256. Kennet. Echard.

At length, on the eighteenth of December, the bill ſent by the lords paſſed the houſe of commons, and his Majeſty willingly gave his aſſent. The truth is, it was the King who had imployed the duke of York, to prevail with the earl of Clarendon to withdraw; whether the earl's friends by their ſollicitations had ſoftned the King, or he was not deſirous of having the articles of impeachment diſcuſſed, which might have diſcovered thoſe things he had rather conceal.

Reflections upon his diſgrace.

Thus was the earl of Clarendon ſacrificed to the malice of his enemies. But they were ſuch enemies, that it may be ſaid, their perſecution did him more honor, than the crimes, which for the moſt part were groundleſs, could do him injury. Theſe enemies were, firſt, the King himſelf, who on this occaſion forgot all the ſervices this faithful miniſter had done his father and himſelf, at a time when his affection and fidelity could not be ſuſpected, ſince there was no appearance of his being ever rewarded. What is more ſtrange, the King came to hate him, merely becauſe he ſerved him too well, and, in a juſt concern for his glory, did what lay in his power to prevent his falling into contempt, and ingaging in projects which could not but render him unfortunate. His other adverſaries were the King's miſtreſſes and favorites, perſons of profligate lives, of no religion, or of one contrary to that of the eſtabliſhment, who hated him only becauſe they thought him too honeſt, or believed him incapable of being brought over to aſſiſt their deſigns. For it is generally allowed, that not one ſingle article of his accuſation, except that of the ſale of Dunkirk, could be proved.

If the Preſbyterians had procured the lord Clarendon's fall, there had been nothing ſtrange in it, as he was their profeſſed enemy. For it may be affirmed, that from him came all their misfortunes, ſince the begining of this reign. But the Preſbyterians had then no credit, no acceſs, either to court or parliament. What is moſt ſurprizing in this miniſter's diſgrace, is the animoſity wherewith he was purſued by the ſame houſe of commons, which he himſelf had, if I may ſo ſay, compoſed of men of the moſt extravagant principles, with reſpect to religion and government. Herein he found himſelf miſtaken in his politics: for, theſe ſame principles, with regard to the Royal power, ſo firmly attached the houſe to the King, that they made no ſcruple to abandon the earl of Clarendon, tho' head of the party, when once his Majeſty expreſſed his diſpleaſure againſt him. This is not the only inſtance of the ableſt politicians laboring their own ruin, by ſeemingly the beſt contrived projects.

Remarks upon his hiſtory of the rebellion.

Among the great ſervices Charles I and Charles II had received from the earl of Clarendon, his excellent Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, ought to be remembered; which was not publiſhed till after his death. In this hiſtory are undeniable proofs of the author's ſincerity and affection for Charles I. Nay, very likely, it was wrote with no other deſign than to juſtify the conduct of that unfortunate Prince, and place it in the moſt favorable light. If any thing can injure this hiſtory, it is, that the views of the author are too undiſguiſed. This gives impartial readers occaſion to conjecture, it was not wrote ſo much for the inſtruction of the public in the truth of facts, as to prepoſſeſs them, by various artifices, and numberleſs inſinuations, in favor of a ſyſtem, which all readers, verſed in the hiſtory and government of England, will not doubtleſs admit. Another charge againſt this author is, the contempt and animoſity which he every where ſhews againſt the Preſbyterians, and the Scots, even in places where it ſeems foreign to his purpoſe. But this came from his heart. His immoderate paſſion againſt Preſbyterianiſm, was this great man's foible. He gloried in his hatred of thoſe principles, and perhaps contributed more than any other, to that exceſs of warmth which ſtill ſubſiſts among the followers of his maxims and principles.

Charles II. An' 1667.

His great fortune.

From a private gentleman and a lawyer, the earl of Clarendon roſe to the higheſt degree of fortune, that a man of his rank could aſpire to. For, by his merit, and his inviolable attachment to Charles I and Charles II, he was raiſed to the dignity of earl, of lord high-chancellor, and of prime miniſter of ſtate. But what gives a farther luſtre to his glory is, that from the marriage of his daughter with the duke of York, ſprung two Princeſſes ſucceſſively Queens of England. He ſpent the reſt of his days in baniſhment, amidſt Proteſtant Preſbyterians and Papiſts, whoſe declared enemy he had been, during the time of his favor, but who failed not to pay him all the reſpects due to his merit, and the dignities with which he had been honored in his own country. He died at Roan the latter end of December 1674, aged ſixty-ſeven.

The parliament adjourns.

The day after the act for the earl of Clarendon's baniſhment paſſed in the houſe of commons, the King gave his aſſent to it by commiſſion. He then ſent a meſſage to the commons, by ſecretary Morrice, to wiſh them to adjourn to the ſixth of February. In the reign of James I, there was a difference between the King and the commons, concerning the right of adjournment. The commons pretended, that tho' the King had power to diſſolve or prorogue a parliament, he could not adjourn it, and that adjournment intirely belonged to each houſe. But the lords refuſing their concurrence, the commons were obliged to drop their pretenſion. From that time James I, and Charles I, always ſuppoſed this right as undeniable, and yet the point had never been in form decided. It therefore ſeems, that Charles II, by deſiring the parliament to adjourn, was willing to ſhew ſome regard to the pretenſion of the commons, or at leaſt to avoid all occaſion of diſpute. But this condeſcenſion was not of long duration; for it will hereafter appear, that he frequently adjourned the parliament by his own authority, without any diſlike expreſſed by the commons. Now the difference between an adjournment and a prorogation conſiſts in this, that a prorogation puts an end to the ſeſſion, and annuls all affairs which have been propoſed or debated in parliament without being finiſhed; ſo that they cannot ſerve for ground to the reſolutions of a new ſeſſion, unleſs they are propoſed afreſh. But an adjournment only ſuſpends them till the parliament re-aſſembles. For this reaſon, when the commons have voted the King a ſupply, the parliament is ſeldom or never prorogued, but only adjourned when ſome ſhort receſs is neceſſary, that at their meeting again, they may proceed upon the vote till it be paſſed into an act.

A remark upon it. Kennet. Echard.

A proclamation againſt Papiſts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 206.

Before the parliament met in October, the King publiſhed a proclamation, for the rigorous execution of the laws againſt thoſe who repaired to hear maſs at the chapels of embaſſadors. He ſtill perſiſted in his diſſimulation with regard to religion, and in his deſign to perſuade his ſubjects, that he was a good Proteſtant. It was properly for this that theſe proclamations were intended; but the Non-performance of them had a quite contrary effect. For it could not be thought neceſſary to repeat them ſo frequently, if the King had been pleaſed with ſeeing them executed rigorouſly.

This

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

This ſame month of October, the King rode in great ſtate into the city, and laid the firſt ſtone of the foundation of the Royal-Exchange. This building was finiſhed in a very ſhort time.

The Royal Exchange built. Octob. 23. Ibid. Strype.

This year, death, as I have ſaid, took out of the world Thomas Wriotheſley earl of Southampton lord-treaſurer. The other leſs remarkable deaths were thoſe of dr. Matthew Wren biſhop of Ely (great enemy of the Preſbyterians, who out of revenge for his ſeverity to them before the civil wars, kept him priſoner in the Tower from the year 1642 till the reſtoration, when he was reſtored to his biſhoprick of Ely, where he died aged eighty-one years) and of the famous poet Abraham Cowley, little known to ſtrangers, but very much and deſervedly eſteemed by the Engliſh.

Death of biſhop Wren. Echard.

And Mr. Cowley.

After the earl of Clarendon's removal the King and his miniſters, of whom the earl of Arlington and ſir Orlando Bridgeman were the principal, believed it abſolutely neceſſary to give the people ſome ſatisfaction, by demonſtrating the court's attention to the welfare of the nation. The French King, by his invaſion of Flanders, had ſo clearly ſhown, he did not intend to ſtand to his Queen's renunciation of all the members of the Spaniſh Monarchy, that he could not poſſibly be miſtaken. Beſide, his power was daily increaſing, whereas that of Spain was viſibly declining. It was therefore the intereſt of Europe in general, and of England in particular, to take early and effectual meaſures, to ſet bounds to this formidable power, which might produce great changes, if care was not taken to ſtop its progreſs. Nothing was more popular than ſuch a deſign, and nothing more capable to re-ingratiate the King with his ſubjects. Therefore, the firſt of January 1667-8, a reſolution was taken, to enter into a ſtrict union with the States-general of the United Provinces, to prevent the King of France's intire reduction of Flanders, and the reſt of the Spaniſh Netherlands. The court likewiſe reſolved, to indeavor ingaging the King of Sweden into the ſame meaſures, and ſo form a triple aliance capable to intimidate Lewis XIV, and to oblige him to act with greater precaution.

The King reſolves to give ſome ſatisfaction to the people.

To put this project in execution, ſir William Temple was ordered to the Hague, with the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary. I ſhall not deſcend to the particulars of this negociation, which are related in ſir William Temple's writings, publiſhed in a French verſion. I ſhall only obſerve, that by the addreſs of this envoy, the treaty of alliance between the King and the States was concluded in five days, and what is more, ſigned by the States-General, without communicating it to the particular provinces, which had never before been practiſed. Moreover, the count de Dhona, embaſſador of Sweden, ingaged for his maſter, that he ſhould enter into this treaty, if a place was left for him as a principal. Afterwards, this court ſigned a like treaty in the name of the King of Sweden, with the King of England and the States-General, it being agreed, that this treaty ſhould be conſidered as part of the former when ratified. Theſe treaties were firſt ſent into England, and ratified by Charles, and, ſhortly after, the King of Sweden's ratification was likewiſe received. Thus was concluded, in a very ſhort time, a triple league, the moſt important that had been long ſince made in Europe, and which was to check the power, as well as vaſt deſigns of France.

A triple alliance concluded between England, Holland, and Sweden. Temple's Let. fol. p. 45, &c.

For the underſtanding this treaty, of which I ſhall preſently give the ſubſtance, it muſt be obſerved, that Lewis XIV, after his laſt campain, during which he had ſeized many ſtrong places in the Spaniſh Netherlands (1), had, at the preſſing inſtances of their High Mightineſſes, conſented to a treaty with Spain, till the end of March 1668. Moreover, he had left to the Queen-Regent of Spain, the choice of either yielding to him the places conquered by him in the laſt campain, or elſe the duchy of Luxemburgh, or, inſtead of it, Franche-Compté, Cambray and Cambreſis, Douay, Aire, St. Omer, Bergue, Furnes, and Linck, for which he promiſed to ſurrender all the reſt of his conqueſts. Theſe offers, as it appears, were founded upon the ſuppoſition, that the French Queen's renunciation, in the treaty of her marriage, was of no force. Tho' the thing had been decided only by the King of France himſelf, the States-General, ſeeing no poſſibility of compelling him to deſiſt from his pretenſions, had approved of this alternative, and poſitively ingaged to join their forces with thoſe of France, to oblige Spain to imbrace one or other of theſe offers. They could not therefore recede, after ſuch an ingagement: for which reaſon, they reſolved to make three different treaties with England, which however were to take place, as containing but one and the ſame treaty.

CHARLES II. AN' 1667.

Three treaties upon different caſes.

Explication of this treaty. Echard, p. 188.

The firſt contained a defenſive alliance between England and the States-General, againſt all who ſhould attack either of the parties, with a ſpecification of the ſuccors to be mutually given in caſe of ſuch an attack. This alliance to be perpetual.

First treaty. Temple's Letters, p. 69, &c. Collect. of Treat. Vol. I. p. 136.

By the ſecond, the King of England and the States were obliged to uſe their joint indeavors to diſpoſe the King of France to make peace in the Netherlands, upon one of the propoſed conditions; and likewiſe the King of Spain to make choice of one of the two before the end of May. But in caſe any difficulty aroſe from the Spaniard, they ingaged to uſe their indeavors to induce the King of France to ſtop all farther progreſs of his arms in Flanders, and leave it wholly to the allies, to procure the ends propoſed in this league.

Second treaty.

The third contained, 1. That if in procuring peace between France and Spain, any difficulties ſhould ariſe concerning the renunciation, care ſhould be taken ſo to ſetle the articles of peace, as to create no prejudice to the rights of either. But if one ſide only ſhould reject this expedient, then the allies ſhould proceed againſt the refuſer, in the manner agreed in the ſecond treaty. 2. That the allies ſhould uſe their indeavors to eſtabliſh peace between Spain and Portugal. And tho' they did not pretend to hinder the King of France from aſſiſting Portugal, they would however prevent, as far as lay in their power, his aſſiſting that nation by making war in the Netherlands. 3. But, in caſe the King of France rejecting the conditions contained in the ſecond treaty, ſhould make farther progreſs in Flanders, then the allies ſhould join with Spain, and make war upon the King of France, till they ſhould oblige him to comply with the terms of the Pyrenean treaty. 4. That all theſe articles ſhould be ratified within four weeks (2).

Third treaty.

This alliance which, as I ſaid, was ſigned by the King of Sweden as a principal, and was called the triple league, received the applauſes of all Europe, except France. Indeed, the tendency of it was not only to ſave the Netherlands, purſuant to the true intereſts of England and the States-General, but alſo to prevent a fatal war, which muſt have thrown all Europe into a flame. It is perhaps the only ſtep taken by Charles, thro' the whole courſe of his reign, really tending to the advantage of England. It will hereafter appear, that, probably, he had no other intention than to dazzle the public, and amuſe the world, by a proceeding ſo much to his honor. But in ill ſupporting what he had ſo happily began, he manifeſtly ſhewed, that he erred not thro' ignorance, or want of knowing the intereſt of his kingdom, and thoſe of all Europe.

A peace between Spain and Portugal. Collect. of Treat. Vol. I. p. 146.

Shortly after, ſir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the States-General, and about the ſame time the treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily finiſhed, under the guarantee of the King of England.

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard.

During theſe tranſactions, the parliament met the tenth of February. The King in his ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that he had made a league defenſive with the States of the United Provinces, and another for an efficacious mediation of peace between France and Spain, into which the King of Sweden had, by his embaſſador, offered to enter as a principal, He added, that the poſture of his neighbors, and the conſequence of the new alliance, obliging him to ſet out a fleet to ſea, he ſhould want a ſpeedy ſupply; that beſide, it was neceſſary to build ſome large ſhips, and fortify the ports. He concluded with deſiring them to think ſeriouſly of ſome courſe, to beget a better harmony and compoſure in the minds of his ſubjects in matters of religion.

Miſmanagements examined into by the commons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 221.

The news of the triple alliance was joyfully received by the commons; but before they proceeded to the conſideration of the King's ſpeech, they reſolved to inquire into the miſmanagements during the late war. To this end, they appointed a commitee, who diſcovered many miſdemeanors in the conduct of ſeveral perſons, "as in the affair of "Berghen in Norway; in the plundering the Eaſt-"India ſhips while the Dutch paſſed by; in the not "ſeting out a ſufficient fleet laſt year; in the ſe-"paration of thoſe that were out, ſo that they be-"came uſeleſs; in the want of proviſion and am-"munition in the fleet, and in the forts; in pay-"ment of the ſeamen by tickets; in the want of "intelligence and dividing the fleets in the ſecond "year of the war; in the buſineſs of Chatham, &c." The commons accuſed Brounker, that, after the firſt battle, he had carried falſe orders from the duke of York, while that Prince was repoſing himſelf, which had prevented the intire deſtruction of the enemy's fleet, and expelling him the houſe, ordered him to be impeached. As to the affair of Chatham, they accuſed commiſſioner Pett for having neglected his duty. Sir William Penn was accuſed of having imbezzled great quantities of rich goods taken in a Dutch prize (1).

An' 1668.

To put an end to theſe examinations, the King was doubly concerned, ſince moſt of the miſcarriages reflected on him, tho' only ſome particular officers were directly accuſed; and beſide, the houſe waſted the time, which, according to him, would have been better imployed in conſidering the ſupplies he had demanded. He therefore preſſed the commons, by three ſeveral meſſages, to haſten the money-bill, telling them in his laſt, that he intended to prorogue the parliament the fourth of May. But, being informed, the houſe was not pleaſed with his meſſage, becauſe a prorogation would have defeated all their proceedings againſt delinquents, he let them know, the twenty-fourth of April, that he intended only an adjournment for three months; and withal deſired, that the money-bill might be ready againſt the fourth of May.

Charles II. An' 1668.

Beſide the ſupply, the houſe of commons was imployed in another affair, with which they were greatly affected. They began to diſcover the King's ſecret intentions, and believed, that under color of eaſing the Preſbyterians, his deſign was to obtain a general indulgence for all the Non-conformiſts, including Papiſts under that general appellation. An inſinuation in his ſpeech confirmed this ſuſpicion. Wherefore, to ſtop the progreſs of a deſign ſo contrary to their principles, with regard both to Popery and Preſbyterianiſm, they preſented an addreſs to the King, praying him "That he "would iſſue out his proclamation for inforcing "the laws againſt conventicles; and that care "might be taken for the preſervation of the peace "againſt all unlawful aſſemblies of Papiſts and "Non-conformiſts." —— The King, according to his uſual cuſtom, failed not to publiſh a proclamation, declaring, "That upon information, that "diverſe perſons abuſing the clemency uſed to the "Diſſenters ('even whilſt it was under conſidera-"tion to find out a way for the better union of his "Proteſtant ſubjects') had of late openly held un-"lawful aſſemblies and conventicles, he would by "no means permit ſuch notorious contempts of "himſelf and his laws, to go unpuniſhed, &c." He ſuppoſed, the parliament was upon this union, becauſe he had recommended it to them. But the commons were far from thinking of the affair, unleſs by this union the King meaned an intire conformity with the church of England, which was not his intention.

Is addreſſed by both houſes to put the laws in execution againſt Papiſts and Non-conformiſts. Echard.

He puts out a proclamation.

A great diſpute aroſe at this time between the two houſes, occaſioned by mr. Skinner a merchant of London, who believing to have juſt cauſe of complaint againſt the Eaſt-India company, brought the matter by petition originally into the houſe of lords. The peers, after an examination, relieved him in five thouſand pounds coſts. On the other hand, the company having petitioned the commons, Skinner was taken into cuſtody, for applying originally to the lords, in a common plea, which was not agreeable to law. The petition preſented to the commons by the Eaſt-India company was voted ſcandalous by the lords, and ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, were not capable of deciding this difference. At laſt, the commons voted "That whoever ſhould be aiding or aſ-"ſiſting in puting in execution the order or ſen-"tence of the houſe of lords, in the caſe of Tho-"mas Skinner againſt the Eaſt-India company, "ſhould be deemed a betrayer of the rights and "liberties of the commons of England, and an in-"fringer of the privilges of the houſe."

A difference between the two houſes. Echard.

The eighth of May, the day this vote paſſed in the houſe of commons, his Majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and paſſing the bill for raiſing three hundred and ten thouſand pounds by an impoſition on wines and other liquors, and ſome other acts, he adjourned the parliament to the eleventh of Auguſt. He adjourned it again a ſecond * time, and at laſt prorogued it to the nineteenth of October 1669 (2).

The King paſſes ſome bills, and then adjourns, and afterwards prorogues the parliament.

* To the firſt of March.

I have already mentioned the affairs between France and Spain, and the alternative offered by the French King. The marquis of Caſtel-Rodrigo, or rather the court of Spain, not being in haſte to make a choice, Lewis XIV, in February, invaded Franche Comté (3), and in leſs than a fortnight subdued the whole province. This conqueſt however did not make him riſe in his demands, but was ſtill willing to ſtand to the offer of the two conditions he had propoſed. But the Spaniſh court delayed, as much as poſſible, declaring upon the offered alternative, deſigning to ingage England and the States in a war againſt France. Mean while, as the treaty of the triple league was directly contrary to the deſign of Spain (the three allies having only ingaged to take arms in caſe the King of France refuſed to ſtand to his propoſal) it was not poſſible for the court of Spain to accompliſh its ends. At length, after many ſhufflings, the marquis of Caſtel-Rodrigo declared, he accepted the firſt condition, by which France was to keep what had been conquered the laſt campain. This choice greatly ſurſpriſed the States, who had relied on the Spaniards accepting rather the ſecond condition, which appeared leſs advantageous to them. But the policy of the Spaniſh court was to throw England and the States into an indiſpenſible neceſſity of making war againſt France, if that Monarch ſhould offer to purſue his conqueſt in the Netherlands.

Peace concluded at Aix la Chapelle. Temple. Collect. of Treaties, Vol. I. p. 156. Arlington's Lett.

This choice being made, the peace was no longer difficult. The town of Aix la Chapelle was agreed on for the place of treaty, and the plenipotentiaries of France and Spain, of England, Sweden and the States, repairing thither, it was concluded and ſigned the ſecond of May, after a fortnight's negociation. The treaty contained in ſubſtance, That the King of France ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Charleroy, Binch, Aeth, Douay, Fort-de-la-Scarpe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Liſle, Armentieres, Courtray, Berghes, Furnes, with all their dependencies. The King of France, on his ſide, reſtored Franche-Comté to the crown of Spain. The allied States were guarantees of this peace, and all other Princes and States were allowed to be ſo, if they pleaſed (1).

The Dutch challenge the honor of it, Baſnage.

Tho' the treaty of Aix la Chapelle had conſiderably increaſed the power of France, the States-general of the United Provinces believed it a great advantage, to have ſtoped the progreſs of the French arms. They aſcribed to themſelves the whole glory, tho' indeed the triple league would never have been thought of by them, had it not been firſt propoſed by the King of England. To immortalize their glory, they ſtruck a medal, on one ſide of which was ſeen Holland leaning againſt a trophy, and on the reverſe, an inſcription to this effect: "That they had ſecured the laws; reformed "religion; aſſiſted, defended and reconciled Kings; "reſtored freedom to the ocean; procured by "their arms a glorious peace, and eſtabliſhed the "tranquillity of all Europe." On the other hand, Joſhuah van Beuninghen, who had been imployed in negociating this peace, ſtruck a medal, and compared himſelf to Joſhuah ſtoping the courſe of the ſun. As the French King had taken the ſun for his device, the meaning of this medal could not be miſtaken. But the States immediately ſuppreſſed it. As for the firſt, and ſome others, which diſcovered too great preſumption, they were not broke till two years after. But Lewis XIV afterwards made them repent this inſult.

Reaſonswhich ſhow Charles only amuſed the public. Temple's Lett.

When I ſaid, that Charles, in all appearance, propoſed the triple league only to amuſe the public, and appeaſe in ſome meaſure the diſcontents of the people which began to appear, I founded this conjecture, firſt, on ſir William Temple's ſuſpicion, that the King would not long continue in this reſolution. This ſuſpicion appears in ſeveral of his letters. But as they were written to the earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, he contented himſelf with inſinuating his belief, without daring to ſpeak too openly. Secondly, in a letter of the King of France to d'Eſtrades, it has been ſeen, how little Charles concerned himſelf for the preſervation of the Netherlands, ſince, believing, that Lewis directed his views that way, he offered to let him make that conqueſt unmoleſted, without reſerving an inch of land to himſelf, provided Lewis would abandon the States-general. Thirdly, the ſale of Dunkirk to France ſhewed, that Lewis's conqueſts in Flanders would give but little jealouſy to Charles. Fourthly, at the very time that all Europe was diſſolved in joy for the concluſion of the triple league, ſir Thomas Clifford, the King's favorite, ſaid openly, ——— "Well, for all this noiſe, we muſt "yet have another war with the Dutch before it "be long." Fifthly, France herſelf did not diſcover much uneaſineſs at this triple alliance. She not only inſiſted upon all her pretenſions, but even mr. de Lionne, ſecretary of ſtate, writing to d'Eſtrades on occaſion of this triple alliance, has theſe words, ——— "If the Dutch enter into alli-"ances contrary to the intereſts of his Majeſty, we "ſhall not be ſo much troubled at it as they ima-"gine: I know what I ſay, and upon what "foundation I ſpeak it." If to this be added, King Charles's ſtrange conduct afterwards, in making a league with France againſt Holland, it cannot but be ſuſpected, that there was at that time a ſecret correſpondence between France and England. Sixthly, events are commonly the beſt interpreters of mens actions. And it will ſoon appear, that Charles made but little account of his ingagements, entered into by the triple alliance; but it is not time yet to ſpeak of theſe things.

CHARLES II. AN' 1668.

Temple. Echard, Vol. III. p. 230.

The face of the Engliſh court was intirely changed after the earl of Clarendon's removal. The King, more at eaſe by the abſenſe of a troubleſome miniſter, whoſe very preſenſe was a reproof to his conduct, gave himſelf up to his pleaſures, without any reſerve or diſcretion. The duke of Buckingham, who had no religion, and gloried in his debaucheries, and Wilmot earl of Rocheſter, the greateſt wit and the moſt ſatirical and licentious poet of his age, were his principal favorites. With theſe two men, and his miſtreſſes, the King ſpent almoſt his whole time, and it was with difficulty that his miniſters could find an opportunity to ſpeak to him of his affairs. Pleaſures and debauches were the ſole entertainments of the court, and vice appeared there bare-faced. In a word, England had never ſeen a more diſorderly court, and, unhappily, their example had but too much influence on the reſt of the people. His Majeſty was prodigal to exceſs. Beſide his ſtanding revenues, which, as we have ſeen, amounted to twelve hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, he had conſumed the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds given him the laſt year by the parliament, in uſes for which that money was not intended. This year, he had aſked a ſupply of the parliament, pretending a neceſſity to build ſome new ſhips of war, and to put a great fleet to ſea, in maintenance of his ingagements by the triple-alliance. The parliament had granted him three hundred and ten thouſand pounds, but the act not paſſing till two days after the ſigning of the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, not a ſingle ſhip was builded, and the

(1) From this time, England had the beſt opportunity of holding the balance of Europe, which if it had immoveably obſerved, and with reaſonable vigor, it might have ſaved ſpending thoſe millions of treaſure, and oceans of blood, that have ſince happened. Echard——Whatever the Spaniſh loſt by the French ravages, the Engliſh gained a very great private benefit by it: for one Brewer, ſaid to be of Engliſh parents, with about fifty Walloons, who wrought and died fine woollen cloth, thereupon came into England; and by them the Engliſh were in a few years inſtructed to make and die fine woollen cloths, cheaper by forty per cent. than they could before. neceſſity neceſſity of puting a fleet to ſea, vaniſhed at once. Notwithſtanding this, he was always in want, and his revenues perpetually anticipated.

Great progreſs of the Papiſts.

But there was a ſtill greater misfortune to England, viz. that only Papiſts, or men of no religion, had any credit at court. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Rocheſter, and the King's miſtreſſes, gave themſelves not the leaſt trouble to ſtop the progreſs of Popery. The earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, was, like the King, a diſguiſed, and Clifford a declared Papiſt. The duke of York was not only a Catholic, but alſo very zealous for his religion. Being conſidered as preſumptive heir to the crown, great court was made to him, and with the more application, as his revenues being large, and his management frugal, he had wherewithal to gain courtiers. It may be judged, that his zeal had not ſuffered him to advance Proteſtants to places of truſt, when he could introduce perſons of his own perſuaſion. He had ſo powerful a party at court, and ſo many creatures about the King's perſon, that he was in a manner abſolute there, and directed the reſolutions of the council. Laſtly, if the King had any religion, he was moſt inclined to Popery. He found beſide, a conſiderable advantage in careſſing the Papiſts, whom he eſteemed his firm friends, whereas he could not but dread the Proteſtants zeal, in caſe they ſhould diſcover he had abjured their religion.

Deſign to make the King abſolute.

It is not difficult to conceive, after this view of the ſtate of the Engliſh court, that thoſe who had moſt credit and acceſs to the King, could hardly intend the benefit of the nation. Every one of his moſt intimate counſellors would have been glad to ſee the King abſolute, that he might, at command, have the whole riches of England to laviſh upon them. Charles himſelf was ſo uneaſy to be continually forced to deviſe freſh pretenſes demanding money of his parliament, that he could have wiſhed to be delivered from that trouble, and to have free liberty to take what he wanted without aſking. But on the contrary, he found himſelf obliged to proceed circumſpectly, the example of his father not permiting him to ingage in the ſame courſe, before he had taken greater precautions. This was the reaſon, that for ſome years the court-projects were executed gradually, and with great diſſimulation, notwithſtanding the warm temper of the duke of York, and the eagerneſs of the Roman Catholics; for it may be affirmed, that the King alone oppoſed their career, whether out of fear or prudence.

The King viſits diverſe places. Sends a fleet into the Mediterranean. Embaſſies. Kennet. p. 294, 295. Echard. J. Phillips.

The King this ſummer diverted himſelf with making ſeveral progreſſes into the country, to view the ports and the navy. He ſent a ſquadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by ſir Thomas Allen, who obliged the Algerines to a peace very advantageous to England.

During the remainder of this year, nothing more of any importance paſſed, except ſome embaſſies, which the ſequel requires ſhould be mentioned. Sir William Godolphin was ſent to the court of Spain; mr. Ralph Montague was firſt envoy, and ſoon after embaſſador to France; the earl of Carliſle went embaſſador to Stockholm (1), and ſir William Temple embaſſador extraordinary to the States-General. On the other hand, monſieur Colbert was ſent from France to reſide as embaſſador at the Engliſh court.

Advancements at court. Sept. 19, 29.

There were alſo ſome changes at court: among others, ſir Thomas Clifford was made treaſurer of the houſhold; the duke of Monmouth, the King's natural ſon, was made captain of the life-guard of horſe; ſir John Trevor, lately returned from France, where he had been envoy, was ſworn one of his Majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, on the reſignation of ſir William Morrice, to whom was given ten thouſand pounds ſterling. Charles II. An' 1668.

This year died Algernoon Piercy, earl of Northumberland, who was ſucceeded by his ſon (2); the famous poets Davenant and Denham; and the great ſoldier ſir William Waller, ſo often mentioned in the hiſtory of the civil wars. He had been impriſoned by the Independent parliament, and confined till the King's reſtoration, when he was ſet at liberty, being conſidered on account of his ſufferings as a ſort of Royaliſt. Deaths. Echard.

An' 1669. The King changes his meaſures with regard to the triple-alliance Temple's Lett. p. 179.

Tho' the year 1669 produced no remarkable events, it was however fatal to Europe, ſince it was, probably, this year that meaſures began to be taken for the ſtrict union of France with England. At leaſt, it appears in ſir William Temple's letters, that mr. Puffendorf, who had this year been imployed as envoy from Sweden to the court of France, calling at the Hague in his return, ſaid to ſir William Temple (3), that a miniſter at the French court had aſſured him, that the triple-alliance would not ſubſiſt, and that the Engliſh court had already changed their meaſures. The ſame mr. Puffendorf ſaw a letter in marſhal Turenne's hands at Paris, from monſieur Colbert the French embaſſador in London, wherein that embaſſador, ſpeaking of the Engliſh court, has theſe words: ——— "I have "at aſt made them ſenſible of the whole extent of "his Majeſty's liberality." So it is ſcarce to be doubted, that Colbert's embaſſy to London was deſigned to gain or corrupt the Engliſh court, and that he had ſucceeded. It is the time only that is queſtioned, ſince the thing itſelf manifeſtly appeared in the ſequel. Is gained by France.

The Prince of Tuſcany arrives in England. March 22. Kennet. Echard.

The cloſe of March, Coſmo de Medicis, Prince of Tuſcany, arrived in England, where he was received with all the reſpect due to his birth and particular merit. As his deſign was only to ſee England, after he had viſited Spain and France, he was ſhewn, by order of the King, whatever was curious, and particularly the two univerſities.

Prince George of Denmark.

Shortly after his departure, Prince George of Denmark came alſo to pay the King a viſit, but made then no long ſtay in England.

July. Theatre at Oxford opened. Kennet.

The ninth of July the large and magnificent theatre at Oxford, builded at the expenſe of dr. Sheldon archbiſhop of Canterbury, was opened. He was chancellor of the univerſity, and ſhortly after reſigned that honor to the duke of Ormond. The duke was ſtill lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but was ſoon after removed, and ſucceeded by the lord Roberts, who did not inherit the duke's principles.

The King's ſcheme for religion.

In all likelihood, the King had now formed a ſort of ſcheme with regard to religion. This was to incorporate the Preſbyterians with the Church of England, and procure a toleration for all the other Non-conformiſts. In this he might have a double view. Firſt, to gain the Preſbyterians, who were very numerous in the kingdom, and perhaps make uſe of them, thus united with the church of England, to check the fury of the Epiſcopalians, who were not leſs enemies to the Papiſts than to the Preſbyterians. If his Majeſty had not been a Papiſt, which was then little known, it would be difficult to underſtand this policy, ſince, ſuppoſing him a zealous member of the church of England, what occaſion had he to guard againſt her? But being a Catholic, the advantages of theſe precautions are very viſible. His ſecond aim, univerſally allowed, and afterwards manifeſtly diſcovered, was, by procuring an indulgence for all Non-conformiſts without diſtinction, to obtain alſo the ſame favor for the Papiſts. In purſuance of this project, the King and his miniſters affected to expreſs great kindneſs for the Preſbyterians, and this kindneſs incouraged them to appear more openly, and hold their aſſemblies with leſs caution and ſecreſy. In ſhort, ſir Orlando Bridgeman lord-keeper, whether privy to the King's ſecret intentions, or led by motives of mildneſs and humanity, acquainted two of the moſt eminent Preſbyterian miniſters (1), that he deſired a conference with them. They waited on him accordly, and he freely told them, he deſigned to make them ſome propoſals for a comprehenſion for the Preſbyterians, and a toleration for the Independents and the reſt. Upon this occaſion, theſe two Preſbyterian miniſters had ſeveral conferences with two Epiſcopal doctors (2), one of whom was chaplain to the lord-keeper. When it is conſidered, that in the Savoy conference, at the begining of this reign, the two parties could not agree in any one point, and that in the preſent conference an agreement was immediately made, it can hardly be diſputed, but the two Epiſcopal divines came fully prepared to facilitate the accommodation. However this be, the point they moſt differed about, was re-ordination, and it was agreed, That all Preſbyterian miniſters, who had been already ordained, ſhould be admited into the miniſtry of the church of England with this form of words, "Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and adminiſter the holy ſacraments in any congregation in England, where thou ſhalt be lawfully appointed thereunto." This was not properly a new ordination, but only a power to exerciſe their miniſtry in the church of England. It was alſo agreed, that ceremonies ſhould be left indiffetent, ſo that they might be uſed or not, according as every one ſhould think meet; and that the liturgy ſhould be altered: moreover, that thoſe who could not be comprehended ſhould be indulged: and for ſecurity to the government, the names of the teachers, and all the members of the congregations ſhould be regiſtered. Agreeably to this ſcheme, the lord chief juſtice Hale undertook to draw up a bill for the inſuing parliament, and the lord-keeper promiſed to ſupport it with all his power. It is eaſy to perceive, this project, however neceſſary to the King's deſigns, was yet directly contrary to the principles of the parliament, who were averſe to all condeſcenſion. Accordingly it came to nothing.

The church miniſters make large conceſſions.

Mean while, whether the ſecret of what paſſed in the conferences was not well kept, or the Non-conformitſs, incouraged by the court, aſſumed too much liberty, the archbiſhop of Canterbury reſolved to uſe his utmoſt indeavors to break their meaſures. To this end, he wrote to all his ſuffragan biſhops a circular letter, requiring them to take a very particular account of all Non-conformiſts in their dioceſes. When he was provided with the neceſſary informations, he went to the King, and obtained from him a proclamation to inforce the laws againſt conventicles, and particularly the act for reſtraining Non-conformiſts from inhabiting in corporations. This proclamation was executed like thoſe againſt the Papiſts. For, about two months after, the King cauſed the Non-conforming miniſters to be told, that he inclined to favor them, and if they would addreſs him for his clemency and the liberty they injoyed under him, it would be accepted.

Whereupon ſuch an addreſs was prepared, and preſented to the King at the earl of Arlington's lodgings, who received it graciouſly, and returned a favorable anſwer (3).

CHARLES II. AN' 1669.

A petition of the Non-conformiſts favorably received by the King.

The parliament met the nineteenth of October, according to the prorogation. The King in a ſhort ſpeech demanded money for the diſcharge of his debts, and briefly propoſed the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. Then the lord-keeper inlarged on theſe points. But the commons, inſtead of taking his Majeſty's ſpeech into conſideration, proceeded on other affairs. The public accounts were examined (4), with the uſes to which the King had applied the money given him by the parliament, and ſir George Carteret, who had the keeping of ſome of the books being found very culpable, was expelled the houſe. Then they addreſſed the King to thank him for his proclamation againſt conventicles, praying him to continue the ſame care to ſuppreſs them for the future.

The commons examine the public accounts. Echard, p. 238, 240.

But, not contented with this, they appointed a commitee to inquire into the Non-conformiſts behavior. This commitee reported, "That there "were diverſe conventicles and other ſeditious "meetings near the parliament, where great num"bers of diſaffected perſons frequently met, which "was not only an affront to the government, but "alſo of imminent danger to both houſes, and the "peace of the kingdom." It ſeems, the houſe cared not to ſhow ſo much reſentment againſt the Preſbyterians, ſolely on the account of religion, and therefore took great care to intereſt the ſtate, in order to create a belief, that thoſe people were guilty of ſedition: for they were always included under the general denomination of Non-conformiſts, ſo that it was believed they ought to be reſponſible for the conduct of the other ſects, with whom however they had no communication. On the report of the commitee, the houſe declared, that they would firmly adhere to the King in the maintenance of the eſtabliſhed government of the church and ſtate, againſt all enemies whatſoever. When it is conſidered, that the ſtate had never injoyed a more perfect tranquillity than at preſent, it can hardly be queſtioned, that this declaration of the commons was owing to the forementioned ſcheme, which doubtleſs was come to their knowledge, and of which they were reſolved to prevent the execution, by indirectly declaring how much they were againſt it.

Vote of the commons.

At length the commons voted the King a ſupply of four hundred thouſand pounds. But, before they conſidered of the means to raiſe this ſum, they revived the debate concerning Skinner and the Eaſt-India company, and came to ſeveral reſolutions, which the lords looked upon as ſo many violations of their privileges in point of judicature. The difference between the two houſes daily increaſing, his Majeſty ſaw it would be very difficult to reconcile them, and that the commons would not proceed upon the money-bill till this affair was adjuſted; and as he had no room to expect an agreement, he prorogued the parliament the eleventh of December, to the fourteenth of February following.

The parliament prorogued.

The parliament of Scotland met the ſame day with that of England. But before I ſpeak of the tranſactions of this parliament, it will not be improper briefly to ſhew the character of the duke of Lauderdale, the King's high commiſſioner. This lord made ſo great a figure in this reign, both in England and Scotland, that his character cannot be thought foreign to our hiſtory.

Character of Lauderdale. Burnet.

John Maitland, earl (afterwards duke) of Lauderdale, was, during the troubles in Scotland, a rigid Preſbyterian, a zealous covenanter, and a diſtinguiſhed enemy of the Royal authority. But he turned to the King's intereſt in 1647, when duke Hamilton invaded England, for the ſervice of Charles I. From that time, he was looked upon in Scotland as an enemy of his country. But, after the arrival of Charles II in Scotland, and the compoſure of the differences between the Scots, he followed the King into England, was taken at the battle of Worceſter, and confined in ſeveral priſons till the reſtoration. During his impriſonment he had great impreſſions of religion in his mind. But, after the King had received him into his favor and council, he ſo intirely wore them out, that ſcarce any trace of them was left. Whether he knew the ſecret ſentiments of his Majeſty and duke of York, with regard to religion and the government, or only ſuſpected them, he imagined, the beſt way to preſerve his favor, was to enter into all the King's ſuppoſed views, and indeavor to render him abſolute in both kingdoms. On the King's reſtoration, it was debated in council, whether Epiſcopacy ſhould be reſtored in Scotland. The earl of Lauderdale ſtrenouſly oppoſed it, for an extraordinary reaſon, viz. "That if the King pleaſed the "Scots, he would be ſure of them in order to the "executing of any deſign he might afterwards be "ingaged in." This advice, tho' it was not followed, was acceptable to the King, and riveted the duke in his eſteem. The reſolution to reſtore Epiſcopacy having been executed, no man appeared more ardent againſt the Preſbyterians, nor had they a more violent perſecutor. I ſhall doubtleſs have occaſion to ſay more of him hereafter, but this ſuffices to give ſome idea of his character.

The Scots parliament inlarges the King's ſupremacy, and approves by an act the raiſing of the militia.

It was thro' his means and intrigues that the parliament, held this year in Scotland, paſſed an act which raiſed the King's ſupremacy to a greater height than ever. The ſame parliament approved the raiſing of the militia, and it was inacted, that it ſhould be kept up, and be ready to march into any of the King's dominions, for any cauſe in which his Majeſty's authority, power or greatneſs, ſhould be concerned; and that orders ſhould be tranſmited to them from the council, without any mention of orders from the King. It was not at firſt known, what could be the intent of an act which ſeemed to take the militia out of the King's hands, and put it into the power of the council. But it afterwards appeared, that this was Lauderdale's contrivance; for by this means, if the King ſhould have occaſion to call in the Scotiſh army, it would not be abſolutely neceſſary to ſend any orders himſelf, but that the council, upon a ſecret intimation, might do it without order; and then, if the deſign ſhould miſcarry, it would lie on the council, whom the King might diſown, and therefore none about him be liable for it. This ſhews, that projects were then forming to render his Majeſty deſpotic in England.

Deaths of the Queen-mother, the duke of Albemarle, and mr. Prinne. Echard. Skinner.

The tenth of Auguſt this year, the King's mother died in France, in the ſixtieth year of her age. The famous duke of Albemarle died likewiſe the third of January, and was ſucceeded in his eſtate and honor by Chriſtopher his only ſon. To theſe deaths may be added that of the famous Prynne, the indefatigable author of more than two hundred treatiſes, moſt of them of little eſteem (1).

The King's ſpeech to his parliament. Echard.

The parliament meeting the fourteenth of February, the King told the two houſes, "That "when they laſt met, he aſked them a ſupply, and "now aſked it again with great inſtance: the un- "eaſineſs and ſtraitneſs of his affairs could not "continue without very ill effects to the whole "kingdom. He let them know, that having fully "informed himſelf of the expenſes of the laſt war, "he could aſſure them, that no part of the moneys "they had given him, had been diverted to other "uſes. But on the contrary, a very great ſum had "been raiſed out of his ſtanding revenue and cre- "dit, and a very great debt contracted, and all "for the war. Laſtly, he recommended to them, "not to ſuffer any occaſion of difference between "themſelves to be revived."—— CHARLES II. AN' 1669.

Then the lord-keeper made a ſpeech, which I think neceſſary to inſert at length, to ſhew the King's confidence in this parliament, which had already granted him ſuch large ſums. Echard, Vol. III. p. 248.

My Lords, and you Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons.

"AT your laſt meeting, his Majeſty did ac- "quaint you with the great occaſions he had "for a ſupply, and that he had forborn to aſk it "ſooner, more in conſideration of giving ſome time "for the eaſe of the people, after the burden of the "war, than that the condition of his affairs could "ſo long have wanted: and his Majeſty hath commanded me now to ſpeak more fully and plainly "upon this ſubject. His Majeſty hath not only by "his miniſters, but in his own Royal perſon, examined the accompts, touching the expenſes of "the laſt war, and hath thought himſelf concerned "to let you know, that all the ſupplies which you "gave him for the war, have been by him applied to the war, and no part of them to any other "uſes: nay, ſo far from it, that if the preparations "towards the war ſhall be taken to be for the uſe of "the war, as they muſt be, a great part of his own "revenue, to many hundred thouſands of pounds, "hath been imployed alſo, and ſwallowed up in "the charge of the war, and what did neceſſarily "relate to it. To which may be added the great "debts contracted by his Majeſty in the war, and "the great charges in the repairs of the hulls of his "ſhips, and puting his navy into ſuch a condition "as it was before. Beſide, his Majeſty thinks it "ought to be conſidered, that when the charges of "the war were at the higheſt, the inevitable effects "of it, and thoſe other calamities, which it pleaſed "God at that time to bring upon us, did make ſo "great a diminution of his revenues, that, beſide "all other accidents and diſadvantages, the loſs that "he ſuſtained in three branches of his revenue, in "his cuſtoms, exciſe, and hearth-money, by reaſon "of the war, the plague, and the fire, did amount "to little leſs than to ſix hundred thouſand pounds. "Thus you ſee, that though your ſupplies have "been great, yet the charges occaſioned by the "war, and the calamities which accompanied it, "have been greater: and that the debt which is left "upon his Majeſty, and which he complains of, "hath been contracted by the war, and not by the "diverſion of the monies deſigned for it.

"His Majeſty hath commanded me to ſay one "thing more to you upon this ſubject, That he did "not enter into the war upon any private inclination "or appetite of his own. The firſt ſtep he made "towards it, did ariſe from your advice, and the "promiſes of your aſſiſtance: but if the charges and "accidents of the war have outgone all your ſup- "plies, and left him under the burden of this debt,

(1) Let it be remembered of him, that he was a conſiderable inſtrument in the reſtoration, was received into favor, had the records of the Tower commited to him, which he put into good order, and died a member of the preſent parliament, being one of the repreſentatives for the city of Bath.

"he

His " Majeſty doth therefore command me in his name, " to deſire you once more, and to conjure you, by " that conſtant duty and loyalty which you have " always expreſſed to him, and by all the con- " cernment you have for the ſupport of the honor " and ſafety of his government, to provide ſuch a " ſupply for him at this time, as may bear propor- " tion to the preſſing occaſions that he hath, and " to the ſtate of his affairs at home and abroad; " and ſo ſpeedily and ſo effectually, as may anſwer " the ends for which he hath deſired it. His Ma- " jeſty hath farther commanded me, to put you in " mind of what was at your laſt meeting propoſed to " you concerning an union between the two king- " doms, and to let you know, that the parliament " of Scotland, hath ſince declared to his Majeſty, " 'That ſuch commiſſioners as his Majeſty ſhall " name, ſhall be authoriſed on their part, to treat " with commiſſioners for this kingdom upon the " grounds and conditions of the union.' His Ma- " jeſty therefore thought fit now again to recom- " mend it to you, to take that matter effectually in- " to your conſideration."

A large ſupply granted to the King.

It would have been barbarous not to be moved with the King's wants, after having ſo gloriouſly maintained a war againſt Holland, for which the parliament had granted him but five millions five hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, ſince the peace. Wherefore the commons, as an effectual mark of their affection, and of their reliance on the truth of the keeper's ſpeech, voted the King a ſupply capable to deliver him from his heavy burden. To this end, they prepared two bills, one " to lay a duty upon all wines and vinegar im- " ported into the kingdom, from the twenty-fourth " of June 1670, to the twenty-fourth of June " 1678," the other, " for the advancing the ſale " of his Majeſty's fee-farm rents, and other rents." The firſt is computed at five hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling; the other, is believed to have raiſed more than double that ſum, ſo that he could depend upon ſeventeen hundred thouſand pounds. Thus for this glorious war with Holland, his Majeſty received ſeven millions ſeven hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling, which amount to eighty-two millions five hundred and ſixty thouſand Dutch florins. And yet, there are Engliſh writers who ſeem to triumph, that this war coſt the States forty millions.

The King reconciles the two houſes. Echard, Vol. III. p. 249.

The difference between the two houſes being revived this ſeſſion, the King, fearing the conſequences, ſummoned them to Whitehall, and propoſed an expedient to end it; viz. by razing all entries and records, votes and reſolutions concerning Skinner's affair, to which they conſented, and thereby the quarrel was appeaſed, and ſo the diſpute was terminated.

Addreſſes againſt Nonconformiſts and Papiſts.

This agreement produced an addreſs, preſented jointly to the King by both houſes the eleventh of March, to pray him to give order for the ſuppreſſion of conventicles in and near London and Weſtminſter, and to put the laws in execution againſt Popiſh recuſants. His Majeſty anſwered, that effectual courſe ſhould be taken in both caſes.

The eleventh of April, the King came to the houſe of peers, and paſſed twelve bills, among which were the two money bills, and a third for the ſuppreſſion of ſeditious conventicles. The ſubſtance of this act was, that, " If any perſon upwards of " ſixteen, ſhould be preſent at any aſſembly, con- " venticle, or meeting, under color or pretenſe of " any exerciſe of religion, in any other manner, " than according to the Liturgy and practiſe of the " church of England, where there were five perſons, " or more, beſide thoſe of the houſehold, in ſuch " caſes the offenders were to pay five ſhillings for " the firſt offenſe, and ten for the ſecond. And " the preachers and teachers in any ſuch meetings, " were to forfeit twenty pounds for the firſt, and " forty for the ſecond offenſe. And laſtly, thoſe " who ſuffered any ſuch conventicles in their houſes, " barns, yards, &c. were likewiſe to forfeit twenty " pounds (1)." Moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians, attached to the church of England, indeavor to excuſe the ſeverity of this act, by ſaying, it was made more on political, than religious accounts. But this is always by means of the general name of Non-conformiſts, under which the Preſbyterians were compriſed, tho', ſince the King's reſtoration, they had never been concerned in any inſurrection or ill-deſign againſt the government.

p. 251.

After paſſing theſe acts, the King adjourned the parliament to the twenty-fourth of October.

Parliament adjourned.

It appears hitherto, that the King had reaſon to be pleaſed with a parliament, which beſide a ſtanding revenue of twelve hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, had granted him ſolely for the war with Holland, above ſeven millions and a half, without reckoning many other extraordinary ſums given before the war. This parliament, ſuppoſing the King a zealous member of the Proteſtant church of England, deſired but two things, which, on that ſuppoſition he might readily grant. The one was, to come into their views and meaſures for the deſtruction of the Preſbyterians; the other to diſable the Papiſts from giving any jealouſy to the Proteſtants. On the other hand, the parliament might juſtly ſuppoſe, that after having carried the Royal prerogative ſo high, the King had reaſon to be pleaſed, and would indeavor to preſerve a happy union with a parliament ſo devoted to him. It is certain, if his Majeſty had intirely complied with the parliament in theſe two articles, and confined his prerogative within the extenſive bounds the parliament ſeemed to preſcribe to it, he might have ſpent his days with more happineſs, tranquility and plenty, than any of his predeceſſors. But the parliaments ſuppoſition being falſe, it is not ſurpriſing, that the King would not enter into their meaſures. Inſtead of being zealous for the Proteſtant religion, his intention was to overturn it. Inſtead of deſtroying the Preſbyterians, his deſign was to grant them an indulgence, in order to have a pretenſe to procure the ſame for the Papiſts. Inſtead of being content with the power aſcribed him by the parliament, he thought it unworthy a King to found the extent of his authority upon acts of parliament only. Beſide, it was a pain to him to be forced to demand money, and to uſe for that purpoſe pretenſes notoriouſly falſe, tho' the parliament ſeemed to be ſatisfied with them. It would have been more agreeable to him to ſay, " It is my will and pleaſure," than to be obliged to uſe humble intreaties to the commons. This his favorites were continually repreſenting to him, and to this the example of what he had himſelf ſeen practiſed in neighboring ſtates ſtrongly prompted him. He was therefore impatient to free himſelf from this yoke of the parliament, and the more, as by augmenting his power, he ſhould be better able to give the Papiſts umbrage, and introduce their religion, which was his own as well as his brother's. But if father Orleans the Jeſuit is to be credited, theſe were not the motives which induced Charles to take other reſolutions.

Extract from father Orleans's hiſtory.

"It was ſolely the indignation of his miniſters to "ſee a Republican ſpirit creeping into the parliament, and ingaging them in ſo many proceedings againſt the Royal authority. Among other "things, the triple alliance into which the Republican-cabal had forced the King, contrary "to his inclination, appeared to the miniſters an "audacious uſurpation upon the Royal prerogative, "the conſequences of which were to be prevented. "Full of theſe reſentments, they perſuaded the "King to render himſelf abſolute, in purſuance of "the rights of his crown, and the laws of the kingdom; to confine the parliament within the "bounds preſcribed by immemorial cuſtom, and "not to ſuffer a mixture of a Republic with a Monarchy, introduced by violence and incroachments, for fear this mixture ſhould in time produce a monſtrous Anarchy, and expoſe England "to a horrible couſuſion, like that from whence ſhe "was ſo lately delivered."

I ſhall make no remark on the little foundation this writer had to aſcribe a Republican ſpirit to this parliament, nor on the King's being forced into the triple alliance by the pretended Republican cabal; nor laſtly on the maxims he eſtabliſhes with reſpect to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government; becauſe every unbiaſſed reader, is, I ſuppoſe, able to ſee clearly the weakneſs of this reaſoning. But, ſince father Orleans ſays himſelf that he was informed by James II, of the particulars of his own and his brother's reign, I believe this hiſtorian's word may be taken, that at the time I am ſpeaking of, Charles had reſolved to render himſelf abſolute. This is a truth which muſt ever be remembered, if we deſire to underſtand all the events of this reign.

He aims to be abſolute.

The King eſtabliſhes a council, which is called the Cabal. Echard, Vol. III. P. 251.

This reſolution being taken, the King eaſily perceived, that the execution of it required an artful and cautious conduct, and ſuch ſecret and imperceptible methods, as would not too plainly diſcover his intentions. For he could not ſuppoſe, that becauſe he deſired to be abſolute, the people of England would immediately give up their liberties and privileges. It was therefore neceſſary, to lead them to it inſenſibly and by degrees, and to that end he wanted a ſecret council compoſed of few perſons, in whom he might intirely confide, and whoſe intereſt it was to accompliſh this deſign. The ordinary council, conſiſting of twenty-one perſons, was not proper to manage this affair; for, beſide that ſome counſellors had a right to their places, as for inſtance the archbiſhop of Canterbury, it was very difficult to ingage ſo many perſons of the firſt rank in ſuch a project. To effect therefore this undertaking with the more caution, the King eſtabliſhed a cabinet-council of five perſons only, viz.

Clifford,
Arlington,
Buckingham,
Aſhley,
Lauderdale.

As the initial letters of theſe five names compoſe the word CABAL, this ſecret council was from thence called the Cabal. But before I proceed to the reſolutions taken by this council, it will be neceſſary to give a brief character of its members.

Charles II. An' 1670.

Sir Thomas Clifford, according to father Orleans, only wanted a place, where ſound reaſon and virtue were more frequent than at this time in England, to appear ſuperior to the others. He was a declared and known Papiſt, ſo that he took no pains to diſguiſe his religion. It was he who, after the triple alliance was concluded, ſaid, "notwithſtanding "all this noiſe, we muſt yet have another war with "Holland." As the event juſtified his prediction, very probably, the ſcheme I have juſt mentioned, was then formed, and he in the ſecret.

Characters of the counſellors. Clifford. Temple. R. Coke.

Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington, ſecretary of ſtate, paſſed for a man of the leaſt genius of the five, but this was well ſupplied by his great experience, and knowledge in foreign affairs. It is pretended, that being one of the King's retinue in his journey to Fontarabia in the year 1659, he was the principal inſtrument to induce him to change his religion. However that be, he was truly a Catholic, tho', with the King, he outwardly profeſſed the Proteſtant religion (1). This is now univerſally agreed.

Earl of Arlington. Burnet, p. 99.

The duke of Buckingham *, the King's favorite, had a very lively wit. He might have made a great miniſter of ſtate, had not his ſtrong paſſion for pleaſures, and all ſorts of debauches, diverted him from buſineſs. But nothing could tempt him to quit a diſſolute life, to which he had been uſed from his youth. He gloried in having no religion, and was reckoned an Atheiſt. Such a favorite was no great honor to the King (2).

Duke of Buckingham. * George Villiers.

Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, two years after created earl of Shaftſbury, was one of the greateſt genius's England had produced for many years. This is the teſtimony equally given him by friends and enemies. Father Orleans gives the following character of him, "He was the moſt capable of the "five to manage any important undertaking, and "was the ſoul of this I am now ſpeaking of. He "had a vaſt genius, was penetrating, bold, and "equally ſteady, both on the right and the wrong "ſide; a conſtant friend, but an implacable ene"my, and the more dangerous, as being void of "all religion and conſcience, it was the eaſier for "him to plot, becauſe he was not deterred by the "number or enormity of any crimes, when he "judged them neceſſary to preſerve himſelf, or de"ſtroy thoſe who had incurred his hatred." I ſhall obſerve here, that this character of the earl of Shaftſbury is not founded on what he had done before his admiſſion into the cabinet-council, but on what he did afterwards. For, leaving the King's party for that of the people and parliament, the Royaliſts aſcribe to his intrigues alone, all the troubles which afterwards happened. Mr. Lock ſpeaks otherwiſe of him. It is true, he ſays nothing advantageous of him in reſpect of religion. But however this be, in allowing the character given by father Orleans, it is eaſy to ſee, what ſort of men the King thought he wanted for the execution of his deſigns (3).

(1) In the whole courſe of his miniſtry, he ſeemed to have made it a maxim, that the King ought to ſhew no favor to Popery, but that all his affairs would be ſpoiled if ever he turned that way; which made the Papiſts become his mortal enemies. Burnet, p. 99.

(2) Burnet ſays farther of him, That he had the art of turning perſons and things into ridicule beyond any man of his age: he poſſeſſed the King when abroad with very ill principles, both as to religion and morality, and with a very mean opinion of his father King Charles I, whoſe ſtiffneſs was with him a frequent ſubject of raillery. p. 52.

(3) Burnet ſays of him, That as to religion he was a Deiſt at beſt: he had a wonderful faculty in ſpeaking to a popular aſſembly, and a particular talent to make others truſt to his judgment. Duke of Lauderdale.

The duke of Lauderdale was the moſt proper of the five to ſerve the King in this matter. To deſcribe a lord, who had ſo great a ſhare in the affairs of England and Scotland in this reign, I ſhall inſert here, the character given of him by father Orleans, mr. Echard, and dr. Burnet biſhop of Saliſbury.

The firſt contents himſelf with ſaying, that the duke of Lauderdale, ſecretary of ſtate in Scotland, was a very ſubtle man, and a refined politician.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 244.

Mr. Echard ſays of the duke, "The inlarging of "the King's power and grandeur in Scotland, was "much owing to the management of the preſent "commiſſioner Lauderdale, who had formerly "been as much for depreſſing, as he was now for "exalting the prerogative. From the time of his "commiſſion, the Scots are ſaid to calculate the "date of all the inſuing inconveniences in this, "and the following reign. For having there undertaken to make the King's power abſolute, "and arbitrary, he ſtrained the Royal prerogative to all kinds of exceſſes; and aſſumed to himſelf a ſort of a lawleſs adminiſtration of affairs, "the exerciſe of which was ſuppoſed to be granted "to him, upon the large promiſes he had made: "and more apprehending other men's officious interfering than diſturbing his own abilities, he in "time, took care to make himſelf his Majeſty's "ſole informer, as well as his ſole ſecretary, and "by that means, not only upon pretenſe of the "King's prerogative, the affairs of Scotland were "diſpoſed of in the court of England, without "any notice taken of the King's council in Scotland; but ſtrict obſervation was alſo made of all "Scotſmen that came to the Engliſh court; and "to attempt an addreſs, and acceſs to his Majeſty, "otherwiſe than by Lauderdale's mediation, was "to hazard his perpetual reſentment. By theſe "ways he gradually made himſelf the almoſt only "ſignificant perſon of the whole Scotiſh nation; "and in Scotland itſelf, procured to himſelf that "ſovereign authority, as to name the privy-counſellors; to place and remove the lords of the ſeſſion and exchequer; to grant gifts and penſions; to levy and diſband forces; to appoint general officers, and to tranſact all matters of importance."

This demonſtrably ſhews, how much the King was delighted with the abſolute power exerciſed in his name in Scotland, and, conſequently, that he would have been glad to injoy the like in England.

If I ſhould tranſcribe all that is ſaid of duke Lauderdale, by dr. Burnet, I ſhould, I fear, be to tedious, and therefore I ſhall content myſelf with ſelecting a paſſage, where he is beſt deſcribed.

Burnet, Vol. I. p. 101.

——"The earl of Lauderdale made a very ill "appearance; he was very big; his tongue was "to big for his mouth, which made him bedew "all that he talked to; and his whole manner was "rough and boiſterous, and very unfit for a court. "He was very learned, not only in Latin, in "which he was a maſter, but in Greek and "Hebrew. He had read a great deal of divinity "and almoſt all the hiſtorians ancient and modern; "ſo that he had great materials. He had with "theſe an extraordinary memory, and a copious, "but unpoliſhed expreſſion. He was a man, as "the duke of Buckingham called him to me, of a "blundering underſtanding. He was haughty beyond expreſſion, abject to thoſe he ſaw he muſt "ſtoop to, but imperious to all others. He had a "violence of paſſion, that carried him often to fits "like madneſs, in which he had no temper. If "he took a thing wrong, it was a vain thing to "ſtudy to convince him; that would rather provoke him to ſwear he would never be of another "mind; he was to be let alone; and perhaps he "would have forgat what he had ſaid, and come "about of his own accord. He was the coldeſt "friend, and the violenteſt enemy I ever knew: I "felt it too much, not to know it. He at firſt "ſeemed to diſpiſe wealth; but he delivered himſelf up afterwards to luxury and ſenſuality: and, "by that means, he ran into a vaſt expenſe, "and ſtuck at nothing that was neceſſary to "ſupport it. In his long impriſonment he had "great impreſſions of religion in his mind: but "he wore theſe out ſo intirely, that ſcarce any trace "of them was left. His great experience in affairs, "his ready compliance with every thing that he "thought would pleaſe the King, and his bold offering at the moſt deſperate counſels, gained him "ſuch an intereſt in the King, that no attempt "againſt him, nor complaint of him, could ever "ſhake it, till a decay of ſtrength and underſtanding forced him to let go his hold. He was "in his principles much againſt Popery, and arbitrary government: and yet by a fatal train "of paſſions and intereſt, he made way for the former, and had almoſt eſtabliſhed the latter. And "whereas ſome, by a ſmooth deportment, made "the firſt beginings of tyranny leſs diſcernable and "unacceptable, he, by the fury of his behavior, "heightened the ſeverity of his miniſtry, which "was liker the cruelty of an inquiſition, than "the legality of juſtice. With all this he was "a Preſbyterian, and retained his averſion "to King Charles I, and his party, to his "death."

CHARLES II. AN' 1670.

If to theſe five members of the Cabal are joined, as in reaſon they ought, the King and the duke of York, it will be found that all the ſeven were for an abſolute and arbitrary government; and that, with regard to religion, four were Papiſt, viz. the King, the Duke, Arlington and Clifford, and three without any religion, or at leaſt they conſidered it only as an engine of ſtate, theſe were Buckingham, Aſhley, and Lauderdale.

Deſigns of the Cabal. Orleans. Burnet.

It would be difficult to know the tranſactions of the Cabal, if father Orleans, inſtructed by King James II, had not told us that a war with Holland was there reſolved, in order to furniſh the King with a pretenſe to keep on foot both land and ſea forces. For it is evident, that ſuch a deſign could not be accompliſhed, but by force or fear. The pretenſe for this war was to be taken from the diſpute about the flag, which might eaſily be renewed, and from the general complaints of the Engliſh merchants concerning their commerce, of which ſo great uſe had been made for undertaking the former. "But (adds father Orleans) the "true reaſon of making this war upon Holland, "was the ſecret correſpondence between the Republicans of England and the Dutch, who were "inceſſantly exciting them to rebellion, and to "ſhake off the yoke of Monarchy, being ever "ready to ſupport thoſe that ſhould attack it." This ſeems to contradict what the ſame author ing up. He had a general knowledge of the ſleighter parts of learning, but underſtood little to the bottom. He pretended Oliver Cromwell offered to make him King. He was indeed of great uſe to him, in withſtanding the Enthuſiaſts of that time. His ſtrength lay in the knowledge of England, and of all the conſiderable men in it. He knew the ſize of their underſtandings and their tempers, and how to apply himſelf dexterouſly to them. He often changed ſides, and gloried in doing it at the propereſt ſeaſon But his reputation was at laſt ſo low, that he died in good time for his family and party, p. 57.

Charles II. An' 1670.

advances a few lines before, viz. that the true ground of this war was to furniſh the King with a pretenſe for raiſing an army. There is however no contradiction: for it muſt be conſidered, that the deſign of the King and the Cabal concerned two points, which went hand in hand, and formed properly but one deſign; to wit, to introduce an arbitrary government, and to extirpate the Proteſtant religion. As it could not be ſuppoſed, the Engliſh would tamely give up their religion and liberty without any reſiſtance, it was natural to begin with depriving them of the only aſſiſtance they could hope for, by attacking the Dutch, and diſabling them to ſuccor England. Thoſe therefore who are called by father Orleans the Republicans of England, were the perſons, who, it was imagined, would oppoſe the King's deſigns, as well Epiſcopalians as Preſbyterians, and the Republicans properly ſo called. It is therefore evident, that the ſole cauſe of making war upon the States, was as much to put it out of their power to aſſiſt the Engliſh, as to have a pretenſe for raiſing forces, and that this was but one and the ſame reaſon.

The King makes a ſecret alliance with France. Primi.

Some time before, mr. Colbert de Croiſſy, the French embaſſador at London, having ſounded Charles and his miniſters, concerning a ſtrict alliance with his maſter, found them very favorably diſpoſed (1), eſpecially when he had told them, that the deſign of ſuch alliance was to humble the pride of the States-General. Nothing could indeed, more advance their intention, than the concurrence of France to deſtroy the hated and formidable power of the Dutch, who were alone capable of aſſiſting the Engliſh. Some pretend, that the King then ſigned a ſecret treaty with France; but if ſo, this treaty, in all likelihood, was only in general terms, which required more particular articles. Nevertheleſs, the King of France, to finiſh this affair ſo happily begun, came to Dunkirk on pretenſe of viewing the riſbank which was then raiſing; and bringing with him the ducheſs of Orleans his ſiſter-in-law, ſhe took occaſion from the neighborhood of England to deſire leave to viſit her brother, which was readily granted, ſince every thing was before concerted. She was met by the King at Dover, where ſhe arrived the thirteenth of May, and ſtaied above a fortnight ſurrounded with pleaſures and diverſions. But theſe entertainments hindered her not from executing the commiſſion ſhe was charged with, which was, as it is pretended, to make a propoſal to her brother in the name of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, of inſuring him an abſolute authority over his parliament, and reſtoring the Catholic religion in his three kingdoms, as ſoon as the States ſhould be ſufficiently humbled. Tho' the conferences between the King and his ſiſter were managed with great ſecreſy, the events with which they were followed, clearly diſcovered that this was the ſubject of them; and abbot Primi and father Orleans poſitively ſay it, except what concerns religion, which Popiſh authors and ſome others ſcruple to own, for fear of juſtifying the ſuſpicions afterwards entertained by the parliament, and the meaſures they would have taken to preſerve religion from utter deſtruction (2).

Manages an alliance between the Kings of England and France. Primi. Orleans.

An accident which ſhortly after happened, ſeemed likely to break the good underſtanding between the courts of France and England. The nineteenth of June, the ducheſs of Orleans in perfect health, according to cuſtom, called for a glaſs of ſuccory-water, about four in the afternoon. She had no ſooner drank it, but ſhe found herſelf ill, and her pain increaſing, ſhe died about two in the morning. It was univerſally believed ſhe was poiſoned, but the author of her death is not ſo unanimouſly agreed on, tho' the duke of Orleans her huſband was ſecretly accuſed by many (3). The firſt account of her death was brought to the King by ſir Thomas Armſtrong, who told him plainly, what the French thought of this ſudden death, adding, that tho' he was in the chamber of the deceaſed at ſix the ſame morning, the ſtench of the corps was ſo ſtrong, that he could ſcarcely bear the room. His Majeſty could not forbear falling into tears, and expreſſing himſelf very paſſionately againſt the duke of Orleans, ſaying, "He was a———! but prithee, "Tom, do not ſpeak of it." Preſently after, arrived the marquis of Bellefonds with the news, and to pay the compliment of condolence from the French King. He gave an account of the Ducheſs's death, in a manner moſt proper to remove all ſuſpicion.

The King was ſoon comforted for the loſs of his ſiſter; and not thinking that this death, uncommon as it was, ought to break, or even retard, the meaſures taken with the French court, he ſent the duke of Buckingham to Paris, to conclude and ſign the Dover treaty. The pretenſe uſed by the duke of Buckingham for his journey, was to ſee France, and learn the language.

Lewis XIV, in September, made an irruption into Lorrain by his general marſhal de Crequi. The duke, who did not expect to be attacked, was obliged to fly, and leave his duchy a prey to the marſhal, who took poſſeſſion in the name of his maſter. In vain did the duke hope for the interceſſion of Charles to the King of France, in return for the money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer to ſerve him with all his forces. His envoy was anſwered, "That the King was ſorry "for what had happened, and that the preſent "violence, like the miſchiefs of a ſudden inunda-"tion muſt be indured at this time."

Proclamation againſt the old parliament officers. Kennet. Echard, p. 256.

The parliament being to meet the twenty-fourth of October, the King, a few days before publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all officers and ſoldiers ſerving in any of the armies of the late uſurped powers, not having a conſtant habitation, to depart out of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and not to return again or come within twenty miles, till after the tenth day of December next, and in the mean time to carry no ſword, piſtol, or any other arms. This was to ſhew the houſes his care of their preſervation.

The keeper's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard.

The parliament aſſembling, the King, after a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, refered all to the lord-keeper. Probably, he durſt not with his own mouth declare things ſo oppoſite to his deſigns, and which tended only to inſnare the parliament. He choſe rather to have this done by the keeper, who not being privy to the ſecrets of the Cabal, might ſpeak with more aſſurance, as being perſuaded of what he ſaid. He repreſented therefore in his ſpeech——— "That France and the States-Ge-"neral are powerfully arming by ſea and land; "are building new ſhips, and filling their maga-

That, " ſince the begining of the laſt Dutch war, France " has ſo increaſed the number of her ſhips, that " her ſtrength by ſea is thrice as much as it was " before; and ſince the end of it, Holland has " been very diligent alſo in augmenting her fleets. " That in ſuch a juncture common prudence re- " quires, that his Majeſty ſhould make ſome ſuit- " able preparations: that he has therefore given " order, for the fiting out fifty ſail of the greateſt " ſhips againſt the ſpring, beſide thoſe which are " to be for the ſecurity of the merchants in the " Mediterranean, as foreſeeing, if he ſhould not " have a conſiderable fleet, temptation might be " given to thoſe who ſeem not now to intend it, " to give us an affront, if not to do us miſchief. And his Majeſty would be in " a very ill condition to perform his part of the " leagues, if (while the clouds were gathering ſo " thick about us) he ſhould, in hopes that the " wind would diſperſe them, omit to provide " againſt the ſtorm." He then told them, " That " his Majeſty has made ſeveral leagues, as " the triple alliance; another with the States-Ge- " neral; another with the duke of Savoy: another " with the King of Denmark; another with the " King of Spain; not to mention the leagues for- " merly made with Sweden and Portugal, nor " thoſe treaties now depending between his Ma- " jeſty and France, or between him and the States- " General touching commerce; wherein his Ma- " jeſty will have a ſingular regard to the honor of " this nation, and alſo to the trade of it, ' which " never was greater than now it is.' He added, " That his Majeſty finds by his accounts from " the year 1660 to the late war, the ordinary " charge of the fleet communibus annis, came to " about five hundred thouſand pounds a year. If " that particular alone takes up ſo much, the re- " venue will in no degree ſuffice to take off the " debts due upon intereſt, much leſs give him a fund " for ſeting out this fleet, which by common eſti- " mation cannot coſt leſs than eight hundred thou- " ſand pounds."——He then intimated to them, " That his Majeſty intended to put an end to this " meeting before Chriſtmas, and therefore prayed " them to take his Majeſty's affairs into their ſpeedy " and affectionate conſideration (1)."

The commons vote the King a large ſupply, Echard, Vol. III. p. 259.

The houſe of commons charmed with all theſe great alliances made for the honor and advantage of the nation, immediately prepared three bills, one to raiſe eight hundred thouſand pounds by way of ſubſidies (2); another to lay an additional exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors for ſix years; a third for laying impoſitions upon proceedings at law for nine years. Theſe three bills were to produce to the King two millions five hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. But, before any bill was finiſhed, his Majeſty adjourned the parliament to the latter end of January.

The Prince of Orange came to London about the cloſe of the year 1669 (3), to pay a viſit to the King his uncle. The principal reaſon of his journey, was to demand of the King the repayment of the money lent him by the Prince his father in the time of his exile (4). He was graciouſly received, and after a ſtay of about three months returned into Holland.

Before his arrival, ſir William Temple was recalled from his embaſſy in Holland (5). He was not a proper inſtrument to be imployed on the deſigns of the Cabal. Beſide the court was inclined to a ſpeedy rupture with the Dutch (6).

Sir William Temple recalled. Temple's Lett. p. 241.

After a ſhort receſs, the parliament met towards the latter end of January. The commons began with preparing a bill which made it death for any man " maliciouſly to diſable or diſmember an- " other; to put out an eye; to cut off a noſe " or lip," &c. (7). This was owing to an attempt upon ſir John Coventry, a member of the commons, in the ſtreet, in which his noſe was ſlit. This fact was, by the King's order, commited to the duke of Monmouth his natural ſon, and the duke had imployed ſome other perſons, who, after the deed, retired to his houſe (8).

February the fourteenth, the King ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons to haſten the money-bills. But the commons thought proper, before theſe bills were preſented to addreſs his Majeſty, concerning the growth of Popery, for which the concurrence of the lords was obtained. As this addreſs may ſerve to illuſtrate the hiſtory of his reign, it is not unneceſſary to inſert it intire.

He was a poor fiſherman of Yorkſhire, born in 1501, and living in the reigns of eight Kings and Queens of England, died this year, aged 169 years, exceeding the famous Thomas Parr, who died 1635, full ſeventeen years.

(7) This was afterwards called Coventry's act, from the name of the perſon that was the occaſion of it.

(8) The perſons that commited this fact, were, ſir Thomas Sandys, Charles Obrian, Eſq; Simon Parry, and Miles Reeves, who all fled from juſtice. Statutes, 22 Car. 2. c. 1. The reaſon of his uſage, it ſeems, was this: He was an oppoſer of the money-bills, and when paſſed, moved the laying a tax on the play-houſes, which were become neſts of proſtitution. This was oppoſed by the court: it was ſaid, The players were the King's ſervants, and a part of his pleaſure. Coventry aſked, Whether did the King's pleaſure lie among the men or women players? This was carried with great indignation to court. It was ſaid, this was the firſt time the King was perſonally reflected on: if it was paſſed over, more of the ſame kind would follow. Whereupon, the forementioned perſons were ſent to watch for ſir John, and leave a mark upon him. He defended himſelf ſo well, that he got more credit by it, than by all the actions of his life. His noſe was ſo nicely needled up, that the ſcar was hardly to be diſcovered. The commons put a clauſe in the bill, that it ſhould not be in the King's power to pardon the perſons concerned. Cauſes

Charles II. An' 1670.

Cauſes of the growth of Popery.

" 1. THAT there are great numbers of prieſts " and jeſuits frequenting the cities of Lon- " don and Weſtminſter, and moſt of the counties " of this kingdom, more than formerly, ſeducing " your Majeſty's good ſubjects.

" 2. That there are ſeveral chapels, and places " uſed for ſaying of maſs, in great towns, and " many other parts of the kingdom, beſide thoſe " in embaſſadors houſes, whither great numbers of " your Majeſty's ſubjects conſtantly reſort and re- " pair without controul; and eſpecially in the " cities of London and Weſtminſter, contrary to " the laws eſtabliſhed.

" 3. That there are fraternities or convents of " Engliſh Popiſh prieſts and jeſuits at St. James's, " and at the Combe in Hertfordſhire, and other " parts of the kingdom; beſide ſeveral ſchools are " kept in diverſe parts of the kingdom for the " corrupt educating of youth in the principles of " Popery.

" 4. The common and public ſelling of Popiſh " catechiſms, and other ſeditious books, even in " the time of parliament.

" 5. The general remiſſneſs of the magiſtrates " and other officers, clerks of the aſſize, and clerks " of the peace, in not convicting of Papiſts accord- " ing to law.

" 6. That ſuſpected recuſants are free from all " offices chargeable and troubleſome, and do injoy " the advantage of offices and places beneficial; " executed either by themſelves, or perſons intruſted " for them.

" 7. That the advowſance of churches, and pre- " ſentations to livings are diſpoſed of by Popiſh " recuſants, or by others intruſted by them as they " direct; whereby moſt of thoſe livings and bene- " fices are filled with ſcandalous and unfit miniſters.

" 8. That many perſons take the liberty to ſend " their children beyond the ſeas, to be educated " in the Popiſh religion; and that ſeveral young " perſons are ſent beyond the ſeas, upon the notion " of their better education, under tutors and " guardians, who are not put to take the oaths of " allegiance and ſupremacy, and uſually corrupt " the youth under their tuition into Popery.

" 9. That there have been few Exchequer pro- " ceſſes iſſued forth ſince the act of parliament " againſt Popiſh recuſants convict, tho' many have " been certified thither.

" 10. The great inſolences of Papiſts in Ireland " (where do publicly appear archbiſhops and bi- " ſhops reputed to be made ſo by the Pope, in " oppoſition to thoſe made under his Majeſty's " authority, according to the religion eſtabliſhed " in England and Ireland) and the open exerciſe of " maſs in Dublin, and other parts of that kingdom, " is farther a great cauſe of the preſent growth of " Popery. That Peter Talbot, the reputed arch- " biſhop of Dublin, was publicly conſecrated ſo at " Antwerp with great ſolemnity; from whence he " came to London, where he exerciſed his func- " tion; and was all along, in his journey to " Cheſter, treated with the character of His Grace " by the Popiſh Recuſants whom he viſited: and " at his landing at Dublin, was received with great " ſolemnity by thoſe of the Popiſh religion there, " where alſo he exerciſed his function publicly, " great multitudes then flocking to him, and ſtill " continues to do the ſame. His preſent reſidence " is within three miles of Dublin, at his brother's " colonel Richard Talbot, who is now here ſolli- " citing your Majeſty as public agent on the be- " half of the Iriſh Papiſts of that kingdom."

Remedies againſt theſe growing miſchiefs.

Charles II. An' 1670.

" We the lords and commons aſſembled in this " preſent parliament, do in all humility repreſent " to your ſacred Majeſty in theſe our petitions " following:

" 1. THAT your Majeſty by your proclama- " tion would be moſt graciouſly pleaſed to " command, that all Popiſh prieſts and jeſuits do " depart this realm, and all other your Majeſty's " dominions, on or before a ſhort day to be pre- " fixed, at their perils; except only ſuch foreign " prieſts as attend her Majeſty's perſon by the con- " tract of marriage, and embaſſadors according to " law of nations: and that all judges, &c. do cauſe " the laws now in force againſt Popiſh recuſants " convict, to be put in due execution: and in the " firſt place, for the ſpeedy convicting ſuch Popiſh " recuſants, that all judges and juſtices aforeſaid " do ſtrictly give the ſaid laws in charge unto the " juries at all aſſizes and ſeſſions, under the penalty " of incurring your Majeſty's higheſt diſpleaſure.

" 2. That your Majeſty would be pleaſed to re- " ſtrain and hinder the great concourſe of your na- " tive ſubjects from hearing of maſs, and other ex- " erciſes of the Romiſh religion, in the houſes of " foreign embaſſadors or agents, and in all other " chapels and places of this kingdom.

" 3. That your Majeſty would be pleaſed, to " take care, and cauſe, 'That no office or imploy- ' ment of public authority, truſt or command in ' civil or military affairs, be commited to, or con- ' tinued in the hands of any perſon being a Popiſh ' recuſant, or juſtly reputed ſo to be.'

" 4. That your Majeſty would be pleaſed to " take notice of all fraternities or convents of " Engliſh, and other Popiſh prieſts, jeſuits or friers, " and ſchools for the educating of youth in the " principles of Popery, erected within your Ma- " jeſty's dominions, and to cauſe the ſame to be " aboliſhed, and the ſaid prieſts, jeſuits, friers, and " ſchoolmaſters to be duly puniſhed for ſuch their " inſolences.

" 5. That your Majeſty would be pleaſed, from " time to time to require and cauſe, that all the " officers of, or relating to the Exchequer, iſſue " forth proceſſes effectually againſt Popiſh recuſants " convict certified thither. And that ſuch officers " as ſhall refuſe or neglect to do their duty as afore- " ſaid, be ſeverely puniſhed for ſuch their failures.

" 6. That your Majeſty would be pleaſed to " give order, for apprehending and bringing over " into England, one Plunket, who goes under the " name of primate of Ireland, and one Peter Talbot, " who takes on him the name of archbiſhop of " Dublin, to anſwer ſuch matters as ſhall be ob- " jected againſt them."

The King's anſwer. Echard, p. 267.

The King replied to this addreſs, that he would do what was deſired, but ſuppoſed, no perſon would wonder, if he made a difference between thoſe Papiſts, that had lately changed their religion, and thoſe that were bred up in it, and had faithfully ſerved him and his father in the late wars. A few days after, the King publiſhed a proclamation, which ran much in the ſame ſtile with thoſe that had been iſſued on this occaſion, and was no better obſerved. From the begining of the reign of James I, to the end of that of Charles II, the ſame method was conſtantly practiſed. Upon the inſtances of the parliament to prevent the growth of Popery, theſe three Kings had never ſcrupled to grant whatever was required, and conſequently publiſhed proclamations; but there was a wide difference between the publication and the execution.

Charles II. An' 1670. A reflection.

I ſhall here remark, that in the begining of the civil wars, Charles I, poſitively denied he had any Papiſts in his ſervice. But Charles II, his ſon, in this forementioned anſwer, not only publicly owns it, but ſays alſo, that in conſideration of the great ſervices of the Papiſts, to his father and himſelf in the civil wars, he is obliged to give them marks of his favor.

Money bills. Echard, Vol. III. p. 267.

This affair being terminated, the commons proceeded upon the three money bills, and, as if theſe had not been ſufficient to ſupply the King's extreme wants, they afterwards added a fourth, for impoſitions on foreign commodities. Theſe bills being ſent up to the lords, were debated in their houſe. On the ſecond reading of the ſubſidy-bill, the lord Lucas roſe up, and, in preſenſe of the King, who was then in the houſe (where he frequently came without any formality) made a ſpeech which was very diſagreeable to his Majeſty. I don't think it neceſſary to inſert the whole ſpeech, but however ſhall relate ſome paſſages, which will ſhow what many thought, tho' few had the boldneſs of the lord Lucas to ſpeak it publicly.

The lord Lucas's warm ſpeech concerning ſubſidies. Feb. 22. Id. p. 268.

He firſt complained, "That whereas, upon the "King's reſtoration, it was the hopes of all good "men, that the nation would be freed from the "burdens they had been ſo long oppreſſed with; "theſe burdens were heavier than ever, while their "ſtrength was diminiſhed, and they were leſs able "to ſupport them;—— that if the vaſt ſums given "were all imployed for the King and kingdom, it "would not ſo much trouble them: but they could "not without infinite regret of heart, ſee ſo great "a part of the money pounded up in the purſes "of a few private men, who in the time of his "Majeſty's moſt happy reſtoration, were worth "very little or nothing, but were now purchaſing "lands, and kept their coaches and ſix horſes, their "pages, and their lacqueys; while, in the mean "time, thoſe who had faithfully ſerved the King, "were expoſed to penury and want, and had ſcarce "ſufficient left to buy them bread.——But, "ſuppoſing all the money given was imployed for "the uſe of his Majeſty, and he was not cozened, "as without doubt he is, are there no bounds to, "no moderation in giving? Will it be ſaid, that "his Majeſty will not be able to maintain the "triple alliance, without a plentiful ſupply, and we "ſhall thereby run the hazard of being conquered: "This may be a reaſon for giving ſomething, but "it is ſo far from being an argument for giving "ſo much, that it may be clearly made out, 'That "it is the direct and ready way to be conquered "by a foreigner.' And it may be the policy of "the French King, by his often alarms of armies "and fleets, to induce us to conſume our treaſure "in vain preparations againſt him; and after he "has by this means made us poor and weak "enough, he may then come upon, and deſtroy "us. It is not the giving a great deal, but the "well managing the money given, that muſt keep "us ſafe from our enemies.——Beſide, what is this "but ne moriare mori, to dye for fear of dying, "and for fear of being conquered by a foreigner, "to put ourſelves in a condition almoſt as bad? "Nay, in ſome reſpect, a great deal worſe; for "when we are under the power of the victor, we "know we can fall no lower, and the certainties "of our miſeries are ſome ſort of diminution of "them: but in this wild way, we have no certainty "at all; for if you give thus much too day, you "may give as much more too morrow, and never "leave giving, till we have given all that ever we "have away.——It is therefore neceſſary to be able "to make ſome eſtimate of ourſelves: Would his "Majeſty be pleaſed to have a quarter of our "eſtates? For my part he ſhall have it: Would "he be pleaſed to have half? For my part, upon "good occaſions he ſhall have it: but then let us "have ſome aſſurances of the quiet injoyment of "the remainder, and know what we have to truſt "to.——The commons have here ſent up a bill for "the giving his Majeſty the twentieth part of our "eſtates, and I hear there are other bills alſo pre-"paring, which together will amount to little leſs "than three millions of money; a prodigious ſum! "And ſuch, that if your lordſhips afford no relief, "we muſt ſink under the weight of it. I hope "therefore, your lordſhips will ſet ſome bounds to "the over-liberal humor of the commons. If you "cannot deny or moderate a bill for money, all "your great eſtates are wholly at their diſpoſal, "and you have nothing that you can properly call "your own,——Upon the whole matter, I moſt "humbly propoſe, that you would be pleaſed to "reduce the twelve pence in the pound, to eight "pence."——

Charles II. An' 1670.

This ſpeech, afterwards printed and publiſhed, gave the King and his miniſters ſuch diſtaſte, that it was ordered to be burned by the common hangman. But however it made ſome impreſſion upon the lords, who ſent the bill to the commons with amendments, that is, with ſome alterations (1). This occaſioned a conteſt between the two houſes, the commons refuſing to receive the amendments. But in a conference the diſpute was ended, by the acquieſcence of the lords, to the reaſons of the commons. The two firſt money bills, viz. the ſubſidy bill, and the additional tax upon beer, and other liquors, being ready, the King came to the houſe of lords the ſixth of March, and paſſed theſe two acts, with another, "for reveſting the power of "granting wine-licenſes in his Majeſty's heirs and "ſucceſſors, and for ſetling a revenue on his Royal "Highneſs in lieu thereof," which amounted to "twenty-four thouſand pounds a year (2).

Money bills paſſed.

There ſtill remained two other money bills, which had been ſent to the lords, one for "impoſitions "on proceedings at law," and another for "an "additional impoſition upon ſeveral foreign com-"modities." The firſt bill paſſed the houſe of lords without difficulty. But the ſecond occaſioned a violent conteſt between the two houſes. The London merchants having preſented a petition to the lords, in which they ſhewed the diſproportion of the rates impoſed upon certain commodities to be ſuch as would utterly ruin the whole trade of theſe commodities, and bring an irreparable prejudice upon all the Engliſh plantations, and conſequently upon the kingdom; thereupon the lords judged it neceſſary to make alterations in the bill, and lower ſome of the rates, and then returned the bill to the commons. The commons maintained, the lords had no right to make any amendments in bills of impoſitions and rates, and could only receive or reject them as they were ſent, and the lords aſſerted the contrary. This diſpute produced ſeveral conferences, in which the two houſes mutually communicated their reaſons, anſwers and replies. It would be too tedious to enter into the diſcuſſion of this difference, which, beſide, would hardly be intelligible to thoſe who have not a thro' knowledge of the conſtitution of Engliſh parliaments. I ſhall only relate one circumſtance, which may be underſtood by all, and wherein conſiſted the eſſential part of the diſpute. The commons maintained, that by a fundamental right, it belonged to their houſe (in excluſion of the lords) to impoſe rates upon merchandiſe. They meaned by this fundamental right, a conſtant uſage or cuſtom, according to the principles of the parliament, in the time of Charles I. The lords, after the example of Charles I, demanded of the commons, where was the Charter or Contract to be found, by which the lords diveſted themſelves of this Right, and appropriated it to the commons with an excluſion to themſelves? To this the commons replied by another queſtion, Where was the Record by which the commons ſubmited, that this Judicature ſhould be appropriated to the lords in excluſion of themſelves? Wherever their lordſhips ſhould find the laſt record, they would ſhew the firſt indorſed upon the back of the ſame roll. In ſhort, his Majeſty perceiving the conteſt daily increaſed, came to the houſe of peers, and after the Royal aſſent given to an act for impoſitions on proceedings at law, and ſome others, he prorogued the parliament to the ſixteenth of April, 1672, and afterwards by ſeveral prorogations to the fourth of February 1672-3. So that this prorogation continued a year and nine months.

AN' 1671. A long prorogation of the parliament. April 22. Echard.

Every reader probably will be ſurpriſed at the extreme liberality of the commons to the King, and eſpecially in this ſeſſion. As to the former ſupplies, it may be ſaid, they had a foundation true or falſe. But for the preſent, which was greater than any before, it was founded upon a contingency which had not even the leaſt appearance. For it was on a ſuppoſition, that France and the States-general, who were making great preparations, might invade England, if they found her unarmed, tho' ſhe was in peace with France, and in ſtrict alliance with Holland. Beſide, the States had hitherto made no extraordinary preparations, becauſe they did not yet ſuſpect they ſhould be attacked. And as to France, Charles knew he had nothing to fear from that quarter. Nevertheleſs, upon the King's bare propoſition, ſupported by no probability, a ſum of two millions and a half was granted him, which ſome even compute at three millions. Nothing is more apt to render probable what is aſſerted by many authors, that ſcarce a member, however inconſiderable, was without a penſion from the King according to his credit in the houſe, and that theſe penſions were increaſed in proportion to the ſums granted to his Majeſty. Thus much is certain, that afterwards, upon an inquiry, ſome were found guilty of this colluſion.

Reflections upon the liberality of the commons.

Before I proceed, I muſt here mention the death of Anne Hyde ducheſs of York, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, the late chancellor. She died the thirty-firſt of March in the thirty-fourth year of her age, after an abjuration of the Proteſtant religion during her long indiſpoſition (1). From her marriage proceeded eight children, two of which only ſurvived her, Mary and Anne, who were both Queens of England. The reſt all died young (2).

CHARLES II. AN' 1671.

The duke of York formally abjures the Proteſtant religion. Echard, Vol. III. P. 277.

The duke of York was a Papiſt before the King's reſtoration, but I cannot find at what time he changed his religion. It was for ſome time a ſecret, but had now been ſo divulged, that it was openly talked of in the court and country. At length, ſoon after the death of his ducheſs he made a formal abjuration of the Proteſtant religion before father Simon an Engliſh Jeſuit, and from that time openly declared himſelf a Papiſt. His inducement, as it is ſaid, to make public profeſſion of this religion, was: the King had for ſome years, even before Clarendon's diſgrace, entertained a ſecret deſign of divorcing his Queen, whom he had never loved. He had communicated this deſign to ſome of his confidents, but it was always oppoſed by the earl of Clarendon, whether from the injuſtice of the thing, or for the ſake of his daughter the ducheſs of York and her poſterity. After the removal of that miniſter, his Majeſty finding himſelf more free, perſiſted in his deſign, which, as it is affirmed, was incouraged by the Papiſts, and approved by the court of Rome. One pretenſe for this divorce, was, that the Queen had been pre-ingaged to another, who however was not named. It was alſo pretended, ſhe was incapable of having children, tho' ſhe had twice miſcarried. But as theſe facts are very difficult to be proved, the King was aſſiſted to find a more plauſible pretenſe; which was, to lay ſnares to betray the Queen into ſuch freedoms, as might be the ground of an accuſation of adultery. But his Majeſty could not reſolve to uſe a method ſo unjuſt, and diſhonorable (3). Nevertheleſs the divorce was reſolved, and as a pretenſe was only wanting, an effectual one would certainly have been found. The Prieſts and Jeſuits, who were continually about the duke of York, had long preſſed him to make open profeſſion of the Roman Catholic religion, but had not yet been able to ſucceed, becauſe the duke ſaw, it would make him forfeit the affection of moſt of the Engliſh. At length, upon his refuſal, they ſtrenuouſly labored the affair of the divorce, and cauſed, as it is ſaid, the Pope to promiſe his conſent. When the buſineſs was thus far advanced, they intimated to the duke of York, that they were able either to effect or hinder the King's divorce, and would undertake the latter, if he would make open profeſſion of the Catholic religion. This, as it is pretended, ingaged him to declare himſelf a Papiſt, being apprehenſive, that if the King ſhould be divorced from his Queen, he would marry again, and have legitimate children. I relate theſe particulars as I find them in the hiſtories and memoirs of thoſe times, but I muſt warn the reader, that the authors of them allege no other proof than their own teſtimony (4).

King

King abſolute, or, in their lauguage, a great Prince: and under this article was compriſed, the eſtabliſhment of Popery, if not the intire deſtruction of the Proteſtant religion. For there is no viſible medium between theſe two things. I have already given the reaſon why the article of religion is omited by the King's adherents. The ſecond project was to break the triple alliance. The third to make war upon Holland, tho' it was difficult to invent any the leaſt plauſible pretenſe. To execute the two laſt, mr. Henry Coventry, who had been plenipotentiary at the treaty of Breda, was ſent to Sweden, and ſir George Downing to the Hague. Temple, as I have ſaid, was recalled; but to amuſe the States, the King feigned to ſend for Temple only to be informed of ſome matters, and that he ſhould immediately return. He was however ſtill in London, and tho' the King had no deſign to ſend him back to Holland, yet to take from the Dutch all ſuſpicion of his intention to break with them, he had hitherto refuſed his permiſſion to ſir William to ſend for his wife and family. At laſt, he was openly recalled, and obtained leave for his wife and children to come over who were ſtill at the Hague. The recalling of Temple, and ſending of Downing in his place ſufficiently diſcovered Charles's intentions (1). The firſt was extremely beloved in Holland, as he had always behaved with integrity, and a concern for the common intereſts of both nations. The ſecond had ſerved for inſtrument to ingage the King and the States in the late war, and was looked upon in Holland as a man of no honor, and a real incendiary. So that when their High Mightineſſes heard, he was coming in the room of Temple, they no longer doubted of a rupture with England. Mean while Downing being arrived at the Hague, was not wanting in proteſtations, that the King his maſter was reſolved to maintain the triple alliance, and if he was equiping a fleet, it was wholy owing to the great preparations of his neighbors, and particularly the King of France, of whom he had juſt cauſe to be jealous. But withal, he failed not to complain of the obſtinacy of the Dutch, upon an affair of little importance, concerning the colony of Surinam; adding ſome complaints of the Engliſh merchants againſt the Dutch Eaſt-India company. Theſe were the two articles on which the King intended to found a rupture, but as he did not think them of ſufficient weight, he projected to draw the States into a ſort of inſult upon him, which might give him a more plauſible pretext for a war.

To this end, the King having granted ſir William Temple a yacht to bring over his lady, the admiralty gave expreſs orders to the captain to go in queſt of the Dutch fleet, then at ſea, and, if they refuſed to ſtrike, to fire upon them. The captain met with them as he was returning with the embaſſadreſs and her children. When he ſaw the fleet paid no regard to the King's yacht, he fired ſeveral ſhots at them. Mr. de Ghent, who commanded the fleet, ſurpriſed at this inſult, ſent a boat to the yacht to know the meaning of it. The captain only anſwered, he had his inſtructions, and was bound to follow them. Upon this mr. de Ghent went to the yacht on pretenſe of paying a compliment to the embaſſadreſs, which being performed he talked with the captain, and was anſwered as before. The admiral replied, he had no orders from his maſters in that point, and did not know how the affair was agreed between his Majeſty and the States; but tho' it were ſetled, the captain could not pretend the fleet ſhould ſtrike to a yacht, which was but a pleaſure-boat, and could not paſs for a man of war. The captain ſtill perſiſted in ſaying, he only followed his orders. Nevertheleſs, the fleet did not fire a ſingle ſhot at the yacht, and the captain purſued his courſe, pleaſed that he had got off ſo well.

Beſide the two millions and a half granted to his Majeſty by the parliament, the King of France, if abbot Primi is to be credited, ſent him alſo a very conſiderable ſum to inable him to fit out a fleet much ſuperior to that of the States (2). So Charles thought only of war, tho' with all poſſible artifice he indeavored to remove all ſuſpicion of his having any ſuch deſign. He ſpent the whole ſummer, and part of autumn in progreſs thro' ſeveral parts of his kingdom. The twenty-eighth of May he celebrated the feaſt of St. George in a very ſolemn manner at Windſor, and inſtalled in the Order of the Garter, the King of Sweden, and the Elector of Saxony, by their proxies, and after them the young duke of Albemarle. He alſo made a viſit to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was magnificently entertained, and to ſeveral other places, needleſs here to mention. After his return, both their Majeſties were invited to the lord-mayors feaſt, on the twenty-ninth of October, where no coſt was ſpared to diſplay the grandeur and riches of the city of London.

An inſtallation at Windſor. Echard.

Before I proceed to the tranſactions of the next year, I think myſelf obliged to take notice of an attempt, the moſt extraordinary that can poſſibly be deviſed by a private man. I mean that of Blood, a famous villain, robber, and aſſaſſin, who formed the deſign of ſtealing the Crown, Scepter, and Globe, which are depoſited in the Tower. With the aſſiſtance only of two or three more, he executed his ſcheme ſo dextrouſly and happily, that they were got out of the Tower with their booty, before they were ſeized. To give ſome account of Blood, I ſhall briefly ſay here, that the duke of Ormond, when he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, having cauſed ſome of Blood's complices to be hanged, who intended to ſurpriſe the caſtle of Dublin, Blood ſwore, he would revenge their deaths. To this end, Blood followed the duke of Ormond into England, when he was recalled, and watched him ſo cloſe, that with the aſſiſtance of ſeven or eight perſons on horſeback, he ſtoped his coach, in the night, as he was going to Clarendon houſe, where he lived, knocked down his footmen (3), and forced the duke up behind one of the horſemen, in order to carry him to Tyburn, and hang him there, with a paper pined on his breaſt, to ſhew the cauſe of his execution. But the duke forcibly throwing himſelf off the horſe, with the villain who had tied the duke faſt to him, defeated the deſign, and the authors could never be diſcovered till after Blood's attempt upon the crown. This attempt was very extraordinary, but the King's conduct on that occaſion was ſtill more ſurpriſing. For having a curioſity to examine Blood himſelf, he ordered him to be brought to Whitehall, and put ſeveral queſtions to him, which the villain anſwered with aſtoniſhing boldneſs, confeſſing all, and unconcernedly relating the circumſtances of the affair. Then his Majeſty aſked him, whether he knew the authors of the attempt upon the duke of Ormond? Blood confeſſed, it was himſelf. Not content with this, he told the King, he had been ingaged in a deſign to kill him with a carbine, from out the reeds by the Thames ſide above Batterſea, where he often went to ſwim. But that when he had taken his ſtand in the reeds for that purpoſe, his heart was checked with an awe of Majeſty, and did not only relent himſelf, but diverted his aſſociates from the deſign. He alſo told the King, he was prepared to ſuffer death, as having deſerved it; but muſt tell his Majeſty, that he had hundreds of complices, who had bound themſelves by a horrible oath, to revenge the death of any of the fraternity, upon thoſe who ſhould bring them to juſtice; which would expoſe his Majeſty and all his miniſters, to the daily fear and expectation of a maſſacre. But, on the contrary, if he ſpared the lives of a few perſons, his own would be ſecure. The King was ſurpriſed, and probably intimidated by Blood's diſcourſe, thought, doubtleſs, the attempt of this villain on the duke of Ormond, to revenge the death of his complices, might be imitated, in revenge of his death, by his ſurviving comrades. Notwithſtanding this the King ſent the earl of Arlington to the duke of Ormond, to deſire him not to proſecute Blood, which the duke could not refuſe (1). He afterwards granted him a pardon, and not content with ſaving his life, conferred on him five hundred pounds a year in land in Ireland. From this time, Blood was continually at court, and the King treated him with that freedom and familiarity, that many perſons applied to him for favors from the King. This gave occaſion to his Majeſty's enemies to ſay, that he kept this villain about him, to intimidate thoſe who ſhould dare to offend him in things which were not puniſhable by law, as had been practiſed in the caſe of ſir John Coventry, for ſome railleries upon him in the houſe of commons. As for Edwards, the keeper of the crown, a man fourſcore years old, who had done his utmoſt, tho' in vain, to hinder the theft, and had received ſo many wounds, that he was left for dead, the King contented himſelf with aſſigning him a reward of two hundred pounds, the payment of which was ſo long delayed, that the poor man died before he received it (2).

Blood pardoned.

In the courſe of this year died two famous generals, diſtinguiſhed by their bravery and experience in the civil wars. The firſt was the lord Fairfax, generaliſſimo, and the other Edward Montague earl of Mancheſter. I ſhall ſay no more of them, becauſe they have been ſufficiently mentioned in the reign of Charles I; therefore ſhall only add, that both were very ſerviceable in the King's reſtoration (3).

Charles II. An' 1671.

Death of the lord Fairfax and the earl of Mancheſter. Echard.

The league againſt Holland, like that of Cambray againſt the commonwealth of Venice, was ſtill kept ſo ſecret, that the States could only ſuſpect it, without any certainty. The deſign of the allies was to begin with the ruin of the Dutch, before declaration of war, and then to attack them all together, at the ſame time, and in different places. The French King, the Elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Munſter, were to invade them by land, and the Engliſh and French fleet jointly to aſſault them by ſea. This was the project, but it met with an unforeſeen difficulty. Tho' Charles had received two millions five hundred thouſand pounds from the parliament, and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds from the King of France, he was ſtill in want. Indeed, he had applied part of the money received to the equipment of his fleet, which could not amount to half, and it was difficult to conceive what was become of the reſt. However this be, he ſignified to his miniſters, that he could not begin the war without fifteen hundred thouſand pounds, and as he could not apply to the parliament, which was prorogued, he promiſed the treaſurer's ſtaff, to the perſon who ſhould invent the means of raiſing that ſum. Sir Thomas Clifford proved the moſt happy and ingenious. He went to the King, and told him, that by ſhuting up the exchequer he would be ſure of that ſum. The King readily took the hint, and reſolving to follow it, performed his promiſe, and made Clifford lord-treaſurer. Some however aſcribe this project to the lord Shaftſbury, and ſay, that Clifford having artfully drawn it from him, gloried in it to the King (4).

(2) Edwards had a grant of two hundred pounds for himſelf, and one hundred for his ſon. Both, by the delays of payment, were obliged to ſell their orders for half the money, and the old man lived not long to injoy the remainder. I think the reader will not take it amiſs, if I here give an account of the manner of Blood's ſtealing the crown, as I find it in the authors under mentioned: He went to the Tower in a clergyman's habit, with a woman whom he called his wife, and who, he pretended, wanted to ſee the crown; and having ſeen it, ſhe feigned to be taken with a qualm, and deſired mr. Edwards, the keeper of the crown to ſend for ſome ſpirits, who immediately cauſed his wife to fetch ſome, of which ſhe drank, and being invited to repoſe herſelf on a bed, ſhe did ſo, and ſoon recovered. At their departure, they were very thankful for this civility. Three days after, Blood comes with a preſent of gloves from his wife, and having thus begun an acquaintance, he improves it by frequent viſits. At laſt he tells mr. Edwards, that he had a mind to make a match between a nephew of his and mr. Edward's daughter, which nephew, he ſaid, had three hundred pounds a year. Accordingly, a day was appointed for the young couple to ſee one another. Blood comes with three more, armed with rapier blades in their canes, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket piſtols. One of the fellows ſtays at the door, and the others go in. Blood told mr. Edwards, he would not go up ſtairs till his wife came down, and deſired him, in the mean time, to ſhew his friends the crown, to paſs away the time. As ſoon as they were in the room, and the door ſhut as uſual, they immediately gagged the old man, and knocked him down for indeavoring to make a noiſe. One of the companions put the globe in his breeches; Blood kept the crown under his gown, and a third was filing the ſcepter (being too long to manage) when their companion without gave them notice, that young mr. Edwards was juſt come home, and gone up ſtairs; upon which they all made off with the crown and globe. But old Edwards geting up and making a noiſe, they were purſued and taken, as they were making to their horſes, which waited at the Iron-Gate in St. Katharine's. (4) The ſubſtance of the ſtory as it was told by mr. Echard, from a manuſcript of ſir Joſeph Tyley's, is this: ——The King, under preſſing neceſſities, promiſed the white ſtaff to any one of his miniſters, who could put him in a way to raiſe fifteen hundred thouſand pounds, without applying to his parliament. The next day lord Aſhley told ſir Thomas Clifford, that there was a way to do this; but that it was dangerous, and might in its conſequence inflame both parliament and people. Sir Thomas impatient to know the ſecret, plied the lord Aſhley with viſits, and having drank him to a proper height, led him inſenſibly to the ſubject of the King's indigence; lord Aſhley warm and ungarded, droped the important ſecret of ſhuting up the exchequer. Sir Thomas took the hint, left Aſhley as ſoon as he could, went the ſame night to Whitehall, and attending till the King roſe, demanded the white ſtaff. The King renewed his promiſe if the money could be found, and then ſir Thomas diſcloſed the ſecret. The project was put in execution, and Clifford advanced to be treaſurer, and created a peer. Aſhley was touched, and ſaid, "That Clifford had ploughed with his "heifer." However, to ſatisfy him, he was firſt made earl of Shaftſbury, and ſoon after lord chancellor of England. the lord-treaſurer, all the ſums ordained to public uſes, and the intereſts of the money borrowed upon parliamentary funds, which commonly cannot be raiſed under ſeveral months, or even years. So, when the King has a mind to have all at once, the money that has been granted him, he borrows it of private perſons at a large intereſt, and aſſigns them payment upon the exchequer, which applies to this uſe the money, raiſed from the granted funds, as it comes in. Moreover, at the time I am ſpeaking of, all the London monied men, not to keep large ſums by them, put their money into the hands of bankers and goldſmiths, without intereſt. And when they wanted any part, they drew upon their goldſmiths or bankers, who immediately paid it. Now, as it was morally impoſſible, that all private perſons who had money at a banker's, ſhould want it at one time, thoſe who had the money in their hands kept only a ſum ſufficient to anſwer the uſual demands, and lent the reſt to the King at a large intereſt, upon the parliamentary funds. So, in ſhuting up the exchequer, he received all the money which came into it (1), without paying any thing of what he owed. But at the ſame time, the perſons who had truſted their money in the hands of bankers and goldſmiths, were intirely ruined, ſince it was not in their power to diſpoſe of their capital; eſpecially, as the bankers refuſed even to pay the notes daily drawn upon them, on pretenſe, that they received nothing from the exchequer. This cauſed an extreme conſternation in London; but the King and his miniſters purſued their meaſures, and, deaf to the complaints of ſo many ruined families, kept the exchequer ſhut up one year. At the expiration of which term, it continued ſhut up, by a new order, ſome months longer. But the greateſt misfortune did not conſiſt in twelve or eighteen months expectation. It is eaſy to imagine, the King having received all the money which came into the exchequer during that time, the ſums which were brought in, when it was opened, were not ſufficient to diſcharge the arrears of theſe eighteen months. This is the true ſtate of the affair, which cauſed the Engliſh to exclaim ſo loudly againſt the King and the Cabal. But the hopes the Cabal then had to render the King abſolute, made them very eaſy under the complaints and reproaches of the people.

The King intends to ſurpriſe the DutchSmyrna fleet, before he had declared war. March 13. Baſnage. Burchett. Echard. Kennet, p. 310. Primi.

But Charles had in his thoughts a project which would ſtill furniſh him with more conſiderable ſums. This was to ſurprize the Dutch fleet returning from Smyrna richly laden (2), before any declaration of war. He had practiſed the ſame thing laſt year, with regard to the Bourdeaux fleet, and received from it a great advantage. This fleet being much richer, his expectations were ſo much the greater. To this purpoſe he put to ſea thirty-ſix men of war (3) under the command of Holms, who had orders to cruiſe in the channel, and intercept them. Holms being informed that the Dutch fleet approached, divided his own into three ſquadrons. That of Holland conſiſted of ſeventy-two ſail of merchant-ſhips, many of which had no guns, under the convoy of five men of war, commanded by experienced officers. Theſe drew up the merchant-men in three ſquadrons, in good order, and put themſelves between them and the Engliſh fleet, after having injoined them to purſue their courſe without breaking their line. Holms attacked this fleet the thirteenth of March (4), and fought the whole day without gaining any advantage. The next day at nine in the morning the fight was renewed, and laſted all that day, tho' on the ſide of the Dutch, captain De Haes, who acted as admiral, had been killed about noon. On the Engliſh ſide the vice-admiral's ſhip was diſabled. On the morrow, at eight in the morning, Holms who had been re-inforced by ſome frigates, renewed the ingagement, and at laſt took one man of war, the captain and moſt of the ſailors being ſlain, and three merchant ſhips (5) which were brought into the Thames. This was all the advantage the Engliſh received from an action, which highly reflected on the King. It was carefully given out at London, that this ingagement was but an effect of chance, becauſe the Dutch refuſed to ſtrike. Tho' every one openly ſpoke againſt ſo diſhonorable an action, the King was not affected with the ſentiments of the vulgar, and inſtead of repairing the injury done to the States, in ſeizing their ſhips before the war was declared, ſent out a ſquadron to meet four Dutch India ſhips, which were immediately taken and condemned. He alſo at the ſame time, ordered all the Dutch ſhips in his ports to be ſeized, tho' by an expreſs article of the treaty of Breda, no merchant ſhips were to be taken till ſix months after a declaration of war. The States, ſeduced by ſo ill an example, ſeized alſo the Engliſh ſhips. But, upon the ſtrong repreſentation of ſome of the deputies, how much the honor of Princes and States was wounded by theſe depredations, and that the King of England's acting againſt the faith of treaties, was not a ſufficient reaſon to ingage the States to imitate ſo blameable a conduct, the Engliſh ſhips were diſcharged and ſent home. Charles could not then avoid releaſing ſome of the Dutch ſhips, but did not reſtore all.

One branch of the project formed by the Cabal was, as I ſaid, to render the King abſolute (6), and under this was comprized the extirpation of the Proteſtant, or at leaſt the introduction of the Popiſh religion; tho' father Orleans, and the writers on the King's ſide, when ſpeaking of this deſign, mention nothing of this article. Father Orleans, however, could not forbear owning it in the courſe of his hiſtory. I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from him, which, tho' extremely ſoftened with reſpect to the end, clearly ſhews, it was one of the branches of the above-mentioned project. After ſpeaking of what had paſſed concerning the Papiſts and other Non-conformiſts, he adds, "The King, "who was no good Chriſtian in his actions, tho' "a Catholic in his heart, did all that could be "expected from his indolent temper, to preſerve "the common liberty, that the Catholics might " partake of it. But the church of England prevailed, and chancellor Hyde was ſo warm upon this occaſion, that the King was obliged to yield rather to his importunities than his reaſons. It was therefore the re-eſtabliſhment of this liberty of conſcience, that the lord Aſhley believed neceſſary to the execution of the projected deſign. He communicated his thoughts to his collegues of the Cabal, who were of the ſame opinion, not only on account of the reaſon he alleged, which was, the gaining of the Nonconformiſts who were juſtly feared, but alſo upon another, which he readily approved, namely, the favoring of the Catholics, whom moſt of them loved, and the reſt eſteemed. Arlington and Clifford were ſecretly Catholics, and both died in the communion of the church. Buckingham had no occaſion to be converted, could he only have prevailed with himſelf as to libertiniſm. Aſhley was not averſe to the Catholic religion, till intereſt and malice threw him into the contrary party. It will eaſily be conceived, that the King readily conſented to it, ſince he was a Catholic, and continued ſo to his death, tho' policy cauſed him to pretend the contrary. As for the duke of York, he ſupported the deſign with all his power. All the difficulty lay in the exent of this liberty, and the two Kings of France and England, acting in concert, debated this affair in the negociation of their treaty. Several propoſals were made, ſome more, ſome leſs, advantageous to the Catholics. France was for the moſt moderate, ſafeſt, and moſt ſeaſonable methods. At laſt, it was agreed, that Charles ſhould grant liberty of conſcience to all his ſubjects in general."

From this author it appears, that religion was concerned in the projects of the Cabal. But probably, ſome were for having the progreſs of the Popiſh religion ſubſervient to render the King abſolute, and others were for rendering the King abſolute to favor the progreſs of Popery. Wherefore, theſe two articles were never ſeparated, nor indeed could be, ſince they intirely depended on each other. His Majeſty plainly ſhewed it, when he publiſhed his declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſince he could not grant this liberty without aſſuming a power to abrogate acts of parliament, or at leaſt ſuſpend the execution thereof as long as he pleaſed. This declaration, dated the fifteenth of March 1672, conſiſted of various articles, the ſubſtance of which are as follows:

Declaration for liberty of conſcience. Kennet, p. 313. Echard. Vol. III. p. 292. Burnet, p. 307. J. Phillips.

1. His Majeſty publiſhes it, " in virtue of his " ſupreme power in eccleſiaſtical matters," which is a right inherent in his perſon, and declared to be ſo by ſeveral acts of parliament.

2. He declares his expreſs reſolution to be, that the church of England be preſerved and remain intire in her doctrine, diſcipline and government, as now it ſtands eſtabliſhed by law.

3. That no perſon ſhall be capable of holding any eccleſiaſtical benefice or preferment of any kind, who is not exactly conformable.

4. That the execution of all penal laws in matters eccleſiaſtical againſt whatſoever ſort of Nonconformiſts or Recuſants, be immediately ſuſpended.

5. He declares, that he will from time to time allow a ſufficient number of places, as ſhall be deſired, in all parts of his kingdom, for the uſe of ſuch as do not conform to the church of England, to meet and aſſemble in, in order to their public worſhip and devotion. Charles II. An' 1672.

6. That none of his ſubjects do preſume to meet in any place, until ſuch place be allowed, and the teacher of that congregation be approved by him.

7. He declares, that this indulgence, as to the allowance of public places of worſhip, and approbation of teachers, ſhall extend to all ſorts of Nonconformiſts and Recuſants, except the Recuſants of the Roman Catholic religion, to whom he will no ways allow public places of worſhip, but only indulge them their ſhare in the common exemption from the executing the penal laws, and the exerciſe of their worſhip in their private houſes only (1).

War is declared againſt the Dutch. Echard, Vol. III. p. 294. Kennet, p. 310. Burnet. Phillips. R. Coke.

Two days after, Charles publiſhed his declaration of war againſt the States-General, dated the ſeventeenth of March (2). This declartion, as that of the former war, was founded upon generals, and affected pretenſes. " This is always the caſe when " war is firſt reſolved, and reaſons or pretenſes are " afterwards ſought." " The King hiſtorically " introduced his juſt reaſons to begin the firſt " war upon the States, tho' it was ended by the " treaty of Breda. He added, that peace was no " ſooner concluded than violated by the States, " in not ſending commiſſioners to London to ſetle " the trade of the two nations in the Eaſt-Indies: " and when he ſent over his embaſſador to put " them in mind of it, he could not in three years " get any ſatisfaction from them in the material " points, nor a forbearance of the wrongs which " his ſubjects received in thoſe parts."

First reflection.

' It is eaſy to ſee what great diſcuſſions theſe ge' nerals are liable to.

" 2. He ſaid, that having reſtored Surinam to " them, they were obliged by the treaty of Breda " to permit the Engliſh in that colony to remove " with their effects, but that this permiſſion was " refuſed."

Second reflection.

' The Dutch maintained on the contrary, that
' the Engliſh inhabitants of Surinam remained there
' upon their own choice.'

" 3. He complained of abuſive pictures and me-" dals diſperſed over Holland, reflecting on his " honor."

Third reflection.

' The States ſaid, they knew but of one abuſive
' medal, the ſtamp of which they had ordered to ' be broke.'

" 4. He complained, that in Holland his right " of the flag had been repreſented as ridiculous."

Fourth reflection.

' It is eaſy to perceive, whether his pretenſion
' concerning the yatch which brought over the ' lady Temple was juſt or not.'

This was the ſubſtance of what was moſt plauſibly alleged for undertaking the war. He ended with this declaration.——— " And whereas we " are ingaged by a treaty to ſupport the peace made " at Aix-la-Chapelle, we do finally declare, that " notwithſtanding the proſecution of this war, we " will maintain the true intent and ſcope of the " ſaid treaty; and that in all the alliances which we " have or ſhall make in the progreſs of this war, we " have and will take care, to preſerve the ends thereof

(2) To furniſh the government with ſome fair pretenſions at leaſt for this war, the commitee for the Eaſt-India company was ſummoned to ſhew, whether the Dutch had not broke in upon their trade, for which public ſatisfaction ought to be demanded; They anſwered, and gave it under their hands, That ſince the treaty at Breda, the Dutch had ſufficiently obſerved the articles of Trade. Kennet, p. 310.

" inviolable,

Charles II. An' 1672.

" inviolable, unleſs provoked to the contrary." He took but little care of his honor, in pretending to ſhew, that his deſign in breaking with the States and uniting with France, was, to maintain the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. But there was nothing ſo abſurd which the Cabal did not think they could impoſe on the public, tho' they were herein much miſtaken, as will appear in the ſequel.

This war was in ſuch direct oppoſition to the intereſt of England and all Europe, the defenſe of which Charles had ſo often boaſted to undertake by means of the triple league; it was ſo contrary to juſtice, equity, faith, and the religion of the Engliſh, publicly profeſſed by the King, that no man could believe it till the blow was ſtruck. The Hollanders imagined, the King only intended to exact ſome money from them, or at moſt to intimidate them in order to oblige them to reſtore the Prince of Orange his nephew to the poſts injoyed by his anceſtors. France herſelf could ſcarcely believe but that his Majeſty intended to deceive her, till he had fallen upon the Smyrna fleet. But all were miſtaken in aſcribing to the King any affection for his people. His ſole aim was to render himſelf deſpotic, in order to injoy all the riches of England without controul, and without any obligations to his parliament. His preſumptive heir, the duke of York, found his account in ſo fine a ſcheme; and beſide thought of eſtabliſhing the Catholic religion for which he was extravagantly zealous. As for the Cabal, they were perſons intirely deſtitute of all principles of honor, juſtice, or religion, each of whom was wholly bent on making his fortune by ſacrificing the public intereſt. For it cannot be thought, that men of their abilities could be ignorant, that what they were acting was directly contrary to the intereſts of the nation. They did not imagine, they could execute their grand project without a ſtrict alliance with the King of France, who artfully perſuaded them, that after the republic of Holland ſhould be deſtroyed, the two crowns would jointly labor to render the King abſolute in England, and eſtabliſh the Romiſh religion. But they had afterwards too much cauſe to believe France had deceived them. Indeed it was not Lewis's intereſt to render the King of England abſolute in his dominions, but rather to ſow and cheriſh diviſion between Charles and his ſubjects, in which, by ſeeming to enter into the views of the Cabal, he proved but too ſucceſsful. But there occurred in the execution of this project an obſtacle, which the ſecret counſellors ſhould have foreſeen, and perhaps did, without being able to prevent it. This was the King's immenſe profuſeneſs, by reaſon of which all the ſums received from France and the parliament were inſufficient to ſupport the war two years, ſo that his Majeſty was obliged to have recourſe to the parliament, who at laſt broke meaſures ſo well-concerted. On the contrary, this project alarming all Europe, the States found protectors, who rendered the execution very difficult.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 297.

The very day the declaration of war againſt the States was publiſhed at London, the like was done at Paris, founded on no juſter grounds: for the French King gave no other reaſon for the war, than his diſpleaſure at the conduct of their High Mightineſſes. This union between France and England (which then appeared openly, whatever care had been hitherto taken to conceal it) ſhewed the ridiculouſneſs of what the King ordered the lord-keeper to tell the parliament, " That common prudence re- " quired, that his Majeſty ſhould make ſuitable " preparations, when France had ſuch forces both " at land and ſea." By this it appeared, that the King ſcrupled not to tell his parliament the contrary of what he thought, which could not but make him loſe the confidence of his people, as it accordingly happened.

The French King declares war againſt Holland. March 28. Baſnage. Kennet, p. 313. Echard. R. Coke.

Charles II. An' 1672.

The biſhop of Munſter, about a month after, alſo proclamed war againſt the Dutch, on pretenſe, that they had indeavored to corrupt the governors of his frontier-places. As for the Elector of Cologne, he had already introduced French troops into his dominions, to provide, as he pretended, for his ſecurity. But tho' he proteſted an intention to obſerve an exact neutrality, the Dutch were perfectly informed of his treaty with France. Thus theſe four Princes were united for the intire deſtruction of the republic of the United-Provinces, without mentioning ſeveral Princes of Germany, ingaged by the King of France to ſtand neutral, that they might not aſſiſt the Hollanders.

The biſhop of Munſter declares war againſt the Dutch.

The Elector of Cologne an ally of France.

The States having ſome time foreſeen this impending ſtorm, had indeavored to divert it, by giving the King of England all the ſatisfaction he reaſonably could expect. They had offered to agree to whatever he deſired concerning the flag, and beſide, they had, on the twenty-fourth of February, made the Prince of Orange captain-general, and admiral, tho' he was then but twenty-two years of age. They believed, this was ſufficient to content the King his uncle, yet ignorant that his deſign was to overturn their republic, without any regard to the intereſts of the Prince of Orange. This change in favor of the young Prince, would perhaps have never been made, had it not been held neceſſary to appeaſe the King of England. There were three parties in Holland: that of the Penſionary (which was the moſt powerful, and called the Louveſtein party, from the name of the caſtle where the Prince's father had confined the leading men of this faction) that of the Prince of Orange; and a third which affected a neutrality, and had hitherto joined with neither of the two firſt, but on this occaſion believed it neceſſary to join with the ſecond, in hopes of ſatisfying the King of England. The States therefore ſent a deputation to the Prince, offering him the dignities of captain-general and admiral, and the Penſionary de Wit, to his mortification, was appointed head of this deputation. Thus the Prince of Orange ſaw himſelf captain-general, but without an army, or at leaſt, with an army ſo inconſiderable, and filled for the moſt with unexperienced officers, choſen more for their attachment to the Penſionary, than their perſonal merit.

I ſhall not relate the progreſs of the King of France, and his two allies, the biſhop of Munſter and the elector of Cologne, in the firſt campain. This is ſo well known, that it will be time loſt to recite it. Let it ſuffice to obſerve, that the French King took the field the begining of May; made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places on the Rhine, without almoſt any oppoſition; and ſwimming that river, ſubdued all Guelderland with the towns upon the Yſſel, and at laſt arrived at Utrecht, which had ſent deputies to Doeſburgh to offer their ſubmiſſion to his commands. At the ſame time, the biſhop of Munſter, after ravaging the province of Overyſſel, invaded Frieſeland and Groningen, ſo that only Holland and Zealand remained free, of which the former was threatened with a like invaſion.

But this was not all the States had to fear. While three of their provinces were loſt, and two others attacked, the danger from ſea was not inconſiderable. The two fleets of France and England joined the begining of May; the firſt conſiſting of forty, and the laſt of a hundred men of war. That of the Hollanders had ſeventy-two large ſhips, and forty frigates and fireſhips, and conſequently was very inferior in number to the combined fleet of England

England and France (1). It was commanded by the famous Ruyter, assisted by Cornelius de Wit, the Pensionary's brother, as deputy from the States. Ruyter having put to sea before the enemies fleets were joined, had indeavored to prevent their union. But not succeeding, and being informed, that the two fleets lay at anchor in Solbay in Suffolk, he resolved to attack them. He had like to have surprized them, but being disappointed, prepared for battle. The two fleets of France and England, now composing but one, were ranged in three squadrons. The duke of York, high-admiral of England, commanded the red squadron; the count d'Etrées, the white; and the earl of Sandwich, the blue. The fleet of the States was likewise divided in the same manner; Ruyter was opposed to the duke of York, Bankert to count d'Etrées, and Van Ghent to the earl of Sandwich. All I can gather from the various descriptions of this battle, fought the twenty-eighth of May, is, that both sides displayed all the art and skill which experience had taught the commanders and officers; that they fought with equal bravery, with almost equal loss, and both sides challenged the victory. The admiral-ship of the English being disabled, the duke of York was obliged to hoist his flag in the London. The Royal James, commanded by the earl of Sandwich, not being able to disingage from a fireship, after she had sunk two, was blown up with the earl and her whole crew (2). The English lost two ships more, the Hollanders three, and Van Ghent was killed. The historians of the two parties equally pretend, that their fleet chaced that of the enemies, but both speak of it very slightly. For, it is not intirely the same with ingagements at sea, as with those at land, where commonly he that remains master of the field of battle, justly assumes the honor of the victory; whereas in naval ingagements, a fog, a calm, a wind, either contrary or tempestuous, may oblige the victorious fleet to retire the first. However bonfires were equally made at London, and the Hague, for the success of this battle, tho' with very little reason. The English complain, the French did not discharge their duty, and only fought at a distance, after having separated from the fleet. This conduct is ascribed to secret orders given to count d'Etrées, not to expose his Majesty's ships too much, but to leave the English and Dutch fleets to destroy one another (3).

Sometime before this, the King had created the earl of Lauderdale, duke of the same name; the lord Ashley Cooper earl of Shaftsbury; lord Arlington, earl of Arlington; and sir Thomas Clifford, lord Clifford. About the same time sir Thomas Osborn was sworn of the privy-council, and the new duke of Lauderdale, and the earl of Arlington, received the order of the garter. This was doubtless, to recompense these members of the Cabal, for their great services, in advising him to suspend, by his sole authority, the execution of two acts of parliament (4), till he should think convenient to take off the suspension. Tho' this suspension was not in itself disadvantageous to the public, yet, as it proceeded from the same principle by which the King assumed a power of suspending the penal laws against the Non-conformists, it was sufficiently evident, that he would not stop there.

I have already observed the sad condition of the States of the United-Provinces. There were two Provinces, Guelderland and Utrecht, in the power of the French, Overyssel was in the hands of the Elector of Cologne and the bishop of Munster. The two provinces of Friesland and Groningen were not only threatened, but even attacked. In fine, the province of Holland found no readier way to stop the progress of the French King (5), who was at Utrecht, than by opening the sluices, and laying the counrry under water (6). This melancholly situation of affairs, raised a great discontent among the Dutch, and as the Pensionary de Wit had been many years at the head of the government, all the calamities of his country were charged to his ill conduct. Moreover, the people openly accused him of betraying his country. At last, this general discontent rose to sedition, which caused the States of Holland to annul the perpetual edict made in the year 1667, wherein they had obliged themselves never to own the Prince of Orange for Stadtholder, and to dispense with that oath; after which, the Prince was made Stadtholder. Sometime after, the two brothers, Cornelius and John de Wit, the first grand bailiff of Putten, and the other Pensionary of Holland, but who had lately thrown up his imploy, were torn in pieces by the mob of the Hague. The story is too well known to need a recital. It suffices to say, the Prince of Orange remained in peaceable possession of the government of Holland and Zealand; for Friesland and Groningen had a separate Stadtholder, viz. the young Prince John Casimir of Nassau, under the tuition of the Princess his mother, and three provinces were in the hands of the adversary.

moment of his life (1). The King of England ſeconded his ally in this deſign. The States had ſent embaſſadors to him with propoſals of peace, as they had alſo to the King of France at Utrecht. But Charles, after a refuſal to treat but in conjunction with France, and fearing the States deſign was to diſunite them, or render them jealous of each other, diſpatched the duke of Buckingham, and the earl of Arlington, two members of the Cabal *, into Holland, on pretenſe of treating of a peace jointly with France. Theſe embaſſadors paſſing thro' the Hague, in their way to Utrecht, affected to give out, that they were come to bring peace. But when they came to treat, their propoſals were ſo exorbitant, that it was evident peace was not his Majeſty's view in this embaſſy. It was rather to draw cloſer the alliance between France and England, and concert new meaſures for the proſecution of the war, as the ſequel clearly diſcovered. In paſſing thro' the Hague, the duke of Buckingham aſked the Prince, what it was he propoſed to himſelf in the deſperate ſituation of his country. To which the Prince replied, "That it was true their "condition was dangerous, but he had one way "ſtill not to ſee its ruin compleated, and that was "to lie in the laſt dyke." It is reported, the ſame duke, in a viſit to the Princeſs of Orange, having told her that they were good Hollanders, was immediately anſwered by her, "That was more than "they aſked, which was only that they ſhould be "good Engliſhmen." For this war was ſo evidently contrary to the intereſt of the Engliſh nation, that the people themſelves openly murmured at it. But as I have ſaid, not only on this occaſion, but throughout this whole reign, the intereſt of the King, and that of the people were always directly oppoſite. Charles, after the example of his father and grandfather, thought he could ſilence the complaints of the people by a proclamation to forbid, under ſevere penalties, ſpeaking againſt the government, but this ſerved only to increaſe the murmurs.

In this interval, the King of France ſeeing, that the drowning of Holland put a ſtop to his conqueſts, marched his army into Flanders, leaving the duke of Luxemburgh at Utrecht, and came to Paris in Auguſt, attended by the duke of Monmouth, who, in purſuance of Charles's ingagement in their treaty, had brought him, at the opening of the campain, ſix thouſand effective men.

I ſhall not recite the particulars of the war carried on by land during the reſt of the campain, becauſe England had no part in it, and beſide it is fully deſcribed by the hiſtories of thoſe times. It is ſufficient for the reader to know in general, that tho' the States had ſome ſucceſs againſt the biſhop of Munſter, their affairs were reduced to a wretched condition, and the neighborhood of the duke of Luxemburgh ſcarce gave them time to breathe. Their whole refuge lay in the alliances they expected to make with the Emperor, Spain, and ſome Princes of Germany, and in the hopes that the Engliſh parliament which was to meet, according to the prorogation, the thirtieth of October, would ſee the intereſt of England, and of all Europe. But the King deprived them of this laſt reſource, by proroguing the parliament to February.

The Dutch conceive great hopes from the parliament. Arlington's Lett.

The King declared in council, the fourth of December, that he would raiſe more forces, and diſpoſe of them in convenient quarters, to be imployed on occaſion. And for payment of them, ordered, that the exchequer ſhould continue ſhut till the firſt of May 1673, tho' he had poſitively promiſed it ſhould be opened the begining of the year. On this account he publiſhed a proclamation, in which it was ſaid, "That notwithſtanding his "Majeſty had not been wanting on his part, to "comply with all honorable ways and means that "might effect a peace, yet the continuance of "thoſe inevitable neceſſities which firſt obliged "him to ſhut up the exchequer, compelled him to "continue to ſtop the payment of monies till the "firſt of May next: doubting not but that his lov-"ing ſubjects would have ſuch truſt and confi-"dence in his juſtice, that it would take away all "apprehenſions of their being in the leaſt defrauded "of their juſt dues."

The ways and means uſed by the King to effect a peace, conſiſted, in his embaſſadors demanding, in his name, a million of pounds ſterling for the expenſes of the war; the compliment of the flag without any exception; a hundred thouſand pounds yearly for the liberty of fiſhing; the ſovereignty of all that ſhould remain of the United Provinces, for his nephew the Prince of Orange; a participation of the whole India trade; the town of Sluis; the iſles of Cadſant, Walcheren, Goerée, Voorne; and laſtly, an intire ſatisfaction to the King of France. It muſt have been great obſtinacy in the States to find fault with ſuch reaſonable demands. Conſequently the King could not in honor diſpenſe with the continuation of the war, and the keeping the exchequer ſhut to maintain it.

Sir Orlando Bridgeman reſigning the great-ſeal, the new earl of Shaftſbury was made lord-high-chancellor (2). A few days after, the King performed his promiſe to Clifford, by making him lord-treaſurer, ſo that all the great offices of the ſtate were held by the Cabal, or by perſons devoted to their intereſts. But that it may be ſeen, how the five lords of the Cabal flattered the King, and one another, at the very time the nation was moſt loudly exclaiming againſt the government, I ſhall inſert here part of a ſpeech made by the lord Shaftſbury, as chancellor, to the lord Clifford, when he tendered him the oath in Weſtminſter-hall, upon his admiſſion to the office of treaſurer. After telling him the nature of his office, he added,——"My "lord, I may juſtly ſay you are in a place of the "very firſt rank as to dignity, power, truſt, and "influence of affairs; a place that requires ſuch a "man as our great maſter's wiſdom hath found for "it; from whoſe natural temper we may expect "courage, quickneſs and reſolution; from whoſe "education, wiſdom, and experience; and from "whoſe extraction from that noble and illuſtrious "houſe of the Cliffords (3), an heroic mind, a large "ſoul, and a unſhaken fidelity to the crown. My "lord, it is a great honor, much even beyond the "place itſelf, that you are choſen to it by the King, "who without flattery, I may ſay, is as great a "maſter in the knowledge of men and things, as "this, or any other age hath produced: and let me "ſay farther, it is not only your honor that you "are choſen by him, but it is your ſafety too, that "you have him to ſerve; with whom no ſubtle

" infinuations of any near him, nor the aſpiring " intereſt of a favorite, ſhall ever prevail againſt " thoſe that ſerve him well. Nor can his ſervants " fear to be ſacrificed to the malice, fury, or miſ- " take of a more ſwelling popular greatneſs; a " Prince under whom the unfortunate fall gently; " a Prince, in a word, that beſt of all mankind de- " ſerves the title of 'deliciæ humana generis.' It will hereafter appear, that the earl of Shaftſbury did not long preſerve the ſentiments of eſteem and admiration for the King, expreſſed in this ſpeech.

The Cabal had hitherto ſailed with a proſperous gale on a very dangerous ſea, famous for wrecks, without any oppoſition; but at length they were ſtoped in their courſe by a rock which it was not poſſible to avoid, I mean the parliament. It was now almoſt two years ſince the parliament was aſſembled, and as, in that interval, the King had taken ſome ſteps which inſtiled great fears into his ſubjects, the new ſeſſion was expected with the utmoſt impatience, in hopes, that the parliament would apply proper remedies to the preſent evils, and find means to prevent thoſe with which the kingdom was ſtill threatened. The parliament therefore met the fourth of February, and, by the direction of the court choſe a ſpeaker; ſir Edward Turner, the laſt ſpeaker, having been made chief baron of the exchequer. The choice falling upon ſir Job Charleton, he deſired to be excuſed; but the lord chancellor Shaftſbury told him, before the King and both houſes, that no excuſes would be admited.

A new ſpeaker choſen.

" The conjuncture of time (ſays he) and the King's " and kingdom's affairs, require ſuch a houſe of " commons, and ſuch a ſpeaker. For with rever- " ence to the Holy Scripture, the King may on this " occaſion ſay, 'he that is not with me is againſt " me:' for he that doth not now put his hand and " heart to ſupport the King in the common cauſe " of this kingdom, can hardly ever hope ſuch an- " other opportunity, or find a time to make ſa- " tisfaction for the omiſſion of this." Preſently after, his Majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard.

" I Am glad to ſee you here this day; I would " have called you together ſooner, but that I " was willing to eaſe you and the country, till " there was an abſolute neceſſity. Since you were " laſt here, I have been forced to a moſt important, " neceſſary and expenſive war; and I make no " doubt, but you will give me ſuitable and effec- " tual aſſiſtance to go thro' with it. I refer you " to my declaration for the cauſes, and indeed the " neceſſity of this war; and ſhall now only tell you, " that I might have digeſted the indignities to my " own perſon, rather than have brought it to this " extremity, if the intereſt as well as the honor of " the whole kingdom had not been at ſtake: and " if I had omited this conjuncture, perhaps I had " not again ever met with the like advantage. You " will find, that the laſt ſupply you gave me, did " not anſwer the expectation for the end you gave " it, the payment of my debts. Therefore I muſt " in the next place recommend them again to your " eſpecial care.

" Some few days before I declared the war, I " put forth my declaration for indulgence to Diſ- " ſenters, and have hitherto found a good effect " of it, by ſecuring peace at home, when I had " war abroad. There is one part in it that hath " been ſubject to miſconſtruction, which is that " concerning the Papiſts; as if more liberty were " granted to them, than to the other Recuſants; " when it is plain, there is leſs: for the others have " public places allowed them, and I never intended " that they ſhould have any, but only have the " freedom of their religion in their own houſes, " without any concourſe of others. And I could " not grant them leſs than this, when I had ex- " tended ſo much more grace to others, moſt of " them having been loyal, and in the ſervice of " me, and of the King my father: and in the " whole courſe of this indulgence, I do not intend, " that it ſhall any ways prejudice the church, but I " will ſupport its rights, and it in its full power. " Having ſaid this, I ſhall take it very ill to re- " ceive contradiction in what I have done. And " I will deal plainly with you, 'I am reſolved to " ſtick to my declaration.' There is one jealouſy " more that is maliciouſly ſpread abroad, and yet " ſo weak and frivolous, that I once thought it not " of moment enough to mention; but it may have " goten ſome ground with ſome well-minded peo- " ple, and that is, 'That the forces I have raiſed in " this war, were deſigned to controul law and pro- " perty:' I wiſh I had had more forces the laſt ſum- " mer, the want of them convinces me, I muſt " raiſe more againſt this next ſpring; and I do not " doubt but you will conſider the charge of them " in your ſupplies. I will conclude with this aſſur- " ance to you, 'That I will preſerve the true Re- " formed Proteſtant religion, and the church, as " it is now eſtabliſhed in this kingdom; and that " no man's property or liberty ſhall ever be in- " vaded.' I leave the reſt to the chancellor."

Charles II An' 1672.

The ſpeech afterwards ſpoke by the chancellor is ſo remarkable, that it well deſerves a place in this hiſtory.

My Lords, and you Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the Houſe of Commons.

" THE King hath ſpoke ſo fully, ſo excel- " lently well, and ſo like himſelf, that you " are not to expect much from me. There is not " a word in his ſpeech that hath not its full weight: " and I dare with aſſurance ſay, will have its effect " with you. His Majeſty had called you ſooner, " and his affairs required it, but that he was re- " ſolved to give you all the eaſe and vacancy to " your own private concerns; and the people as " much reſpite from payments and taxes, as the ne- " ceſſity of his buſineſs, or their preſervation, would " permit. And yet (which I cannot but here men- " tion to you) by the crafty inſinuations of ſome " ill-affected perſons, there have been ſpread ſtrange " and deſperate rumors, which your meeting to- " gether this day, hath ſufficiently proved both " malicious and falſe. His Majeſty hath told you, " that he is now ingaged in an important, very " expenſive, and indeed, a war abſolutely neceſ- " ſary and unavoidable. He hath referred you to " his declaration, where you will find the perſo- " nal indignities by pictures and medals, and other " public affronts, his Majeſty hath received from " the States; their breach of treaties, both in the " Surinam, and Eaſt-India buſineſs: and at laſt " they came to that height of inſolence, as to deny " the honor and right of the flag, tho' an undoubted " jewel of this crown, never to be parted with, and " by them particularly owned in the late treaty of " Breda, and never conteſted in any age. And " while the King firſt long expected, and then ſo-

" lemnly

Charles II. An' 1672.

" lemnly demanded ſatisfaction, they diſputed his " title to it, in all the courts of Chriſtendom, and " made great offers to the French King, if he " would ſtand by them againſt us. But the Moſt " Chriſtian King too well remembered, what they " did at Munſter, contrary to ſo many treaties and " ſolemn ingagements; and how dangerous a neigh- " bor they were to all crowned heads. The King " and his miniſters had here a hard time, and lay " every day under new obloquies. Sometimes they " were repreſented as ſelling all to France for mo- " ney to make this war: Portſmouth, Plymouth, " and Hull, were to be given into the French hands " for caution. The next day news came, that " France and Holland were agreed. Then the " obloquy was turned from treachery to folly: the " miniſters are now fools, that ſome days before " were villains. And indeed the coffee-houſes were " not to be blamed for their laſt apprehenſions; " ſince if that conjunction had not taken effect, then " England had been in a far worſe caſe than it now " is, and the war had been turned upon us. But " both Kings knowing their intereſts, reſolved to " join againſt them, who were the common ene- " mies to all Monarchies, and I may ſay eſpecially " to ours, their only competitor for trade and " power at ſea; and who only ſtand in their way, " to an Univerſal Empire, as great as Rome. " This the States underſtood ſo well, and had " ſwallowed ſo deep, that under all their preſent " diſtreſs and danger, they are ſo intoxicated with " that vaſt ambition, that they ſlight a treaty, and " refuſe a ceſſation. All this, you, and the whole " nation ſaw, before the laſt war; but it could " not then be ſo well timed, or our alliance ſo " well made. But you judged aright, 'That at " any rate, Delenda est Carthago, " that government was to be brought down.' And " therefore the King may well ſay to you, it is " your war! He took his meaſures from you; and " they were juſt and right ones: and he expects a " ſuitable aſſiſtance to ſo neceſſary and expenſive an " action; which he has hitherto maintained at his " own charge, and was unwilling either to trouble " you, or burthen the country, until it came to " an inevitable neceſſity. And his Majeſty com- " mands me to tell you, that unleſs it be a certain " ſum, and ſpeedily raiſed, it can never anſwer " the occaſion.

" My Lords and Gentlemen. Reputation is the " great ſupport of war or peace. This war had " never begun, nor had the States ever ſlighted the " King, or ever refuſed him ſatisfaction; neither " had this war continued to this day, or ſubſiſted " now, but that the States were deceived in their " meaſures, and apprehended his Majeſty in that " great want of money, that he muſt ſit down un- " der any affronts, and was not able to begin or " carry on a war. Nay, at this day the States ſup- " port themſelves amongſt their people by this only " falſehood, 'That they are aſſured of the temper " of England, and of the parliament, and that you " will not ſupply the King in this war; and that " if they can hold out till your meeting, they " will have new life, and take new meaſures.' " There are lately taken two of their principal " agents, with their credentials and inſtructions " to this purpoſe, who are now in the Tower, and " ſhall be proceeded againſt according to the law " of nations. But the King is ſufficiently aſſured " of his people; knows you better; and can never " doubt his parliament. This had not been men- " tioned, but to ſhew you of what importance the " frankneſs and ſeaſonableneſs of this ſupply is, as " well as the fullneſs of it. Let me ſay, the King " has brought the States to that condition, that " your hearty conjunction at this time in ſupplying " his Majeſty, will make them never more formid- " able to Kings, or dangerous to England. And " if after this you ſuffer them to get up, let this be " remembered, 'The States of Holland are Eng- " land's eternal enemies, both by Interest " and Inclination.' In the next place, to " the ſupply for the carrying on of the war, his " Majeſty recommends to you the taking care of " his debts. What you gave the laſt ſeſſion did " not anſwer your own expectation. Beſide, an- " other conſiderable aid you deſigned his Majeſty, " was unfortunately loſt in the birth; ſo that the " King was forced for the carrying on his affairs, " much againſt his will, to put a ſtop to the pay- " ments out of the exchequer. He ſaw the preſ- " ſures upon himſelf, and growing inconveniences " to his people by great intereſt; and the difference " thro' all his buſineſs between ready money and " orders. This gave the King the neceſſity of that " proceeding; to make uſe of his own revenue, " which hath been of ſo great effect in this war. " But tho' he hath put a ſtop to the trade and gain " of the bankers, yet he would be unwilling to " ruin them, and oppreſs ſo many families as are " concerned in thoſe debts: beſide, it were too diſ- " proportionable a burden upon many of his good " ſubjects. But neither the bankers, nor they, " have reaſon to complain, if you now take them " into your care, and they have paid them what " was due to them, when the ſtop was made, with " ſix per Cent intereſt from that time. The King " is very much concerned both in honor and in- " tereſt, to ſee this done, and yet he deſires you " not to miſ-time it; but that it may have only the " ſecond place, and that you will firſt ſetle what " you intend about the ſupply.

" His Majeſty has ſo fully vindicated his decla- " ration from that calumny concerning the Papiſts, " that no reaſonable ſcruple can be made by any " good man. He has ſufficiently juſtified it by the " time it was publiſhed in, and the effects he hath " had from it; and might have done it more from " the agreeableneſs of it, to his own natural diſpo- " ſition, which no good Engliſhman can wiſh other " than it is. He loves not blood, or rigorous ſeve- " rities; but where mild or gentle ways may be " uſed by a wiſe Prince, he is certain to chuſe " them. The church of England and all good " Proteſtants, have reaſon to rejoice in ſuch a head, " and ſuch a defender. His Majeſty doth declare " his care and concerns for the church, and will " maintain them in all their rights and privileges, " equal, if not beyond any of his predeceſſors. He " was born and bred up in it: it was that his father " died for: we all know how great temptations " and offers he reſiſted abroad, when he was in his " loweſt condition; and he thinks it the honor of " his reign, 'That he hath been the reſtorer of the " church.' It is that he will ever maintain, and " hopes to leave to poſterity in greater luſtre, and " upon ſurer grounds, than our anceſtors ever ſaw " it. But his Majeſty is not convinced, that vio- " lent ways are the intereſts of religion, or the " church. There is one thing more, that I am " commanded to ſpeak to you of, which is the " jealouſy that hath been fooliſhly ſpread abroad, of " the forces the King has raiſed in this war. Where- " in the King hath opened himſelf freely to you, " and confeſſed the fault on the other hand. For if " this laſt ſummer had not proved a miracle of " ſtorms and tempeſts, ſuch as ſecured their Eaſt- " India fleet, and protected their ſea-coaſts from a " deſcent, nothing but the true reaſon, want of " money, could have juſtified the defect in the " number of our forces. It is that his Majeſty is " provided

" provided for againſt the next ſpring, having " given out orders for the raiſing of ſeven or eight " regiments more of foot, under the command " of perſons of the greateſt fortunes and quali- " ty. And I am earneſtly to recommend to " you, that in your ſupplies, you will take into " your conſideration, this neceſſary addition of " charge.

" And after his Majeſty's concluſion of his " ſpeech, let me conclude, nay, let us all con- " clude with bleſſing God, and the King! Let us " bleſs God, that he hath given us ſuch a King, " to be the repairer of our breaches, both in " church and ſtate; and the 'reſtorer of our paths " to dwell in:' that in the midſt of war and miſery, " which rages in our neighbor countries, 'our " garners are full, and there is no complaining in " our ſtreets;' and a man can hardly know that " there is a war. Let us bleſs God, that he hath " given this King ſignally the hearts of his people, " and moſt particularly of his parliament, who in " their affection and loyalty to their Prince have " exceeded all their predeceſſors: a parliament, " with whom the King hath many years lived with " all the careſſes of a happy marriage. Has the " King had a concern? You have wedded it. " Has his Majeſty wanted ſupplies? You have " readily, chearfully, and fully provided for them. " You have relied upon the wiſdom and conduct " of his Majeſty in all his affairs; ſo that you " have never attempted to exceed your bounds, or " to impoſe upon him: while the King on the " other hand, hath made your counſels the foun- " dation of all his proceedings; and had been ſo " tender of you, that he hath, upon his own revenue " and credit, indeavored to ſupport even foreign " wars, that he might be leaſt uneaſy to you, " or burdenſome to his people. And let me ſay, " That tho' this marriage be according to Moſes's " law, where the huſband can give a bill of di- " vorce, put her away, and take another; yet I " can aſſure you, it is as impoſſible for the King " to part with this parliament, as it is for you to " depart from that loyalty, affection, and dutiful be- " havior, you have hitherto ſhewn towards him. " Let us bleſs the King for taking away all our " fears, and leaving no room for jealouſies; and " for thoſe aſſurances and promiſes he hath made " us. Let us bleſs God and the King, that our " religion is ſafe; that the church of England is " the care of our Prince; that parliaments are " ſafe; and that our properties and liberties are " ſafe. What more hath a good Engliſhman to " aſk? 'But that this King may long reign,' and " this triple alliance of King, parliament, and peo- " ple may never be diſſolved."

Remarks upon this ſpeech.

I ſhall make no reflections on this ſpeech, becauſe it would lead me too far; and beſide, I imagine every diſ-intereſted reader can ſee the falſity of moſt of the things related, and the groſs artifice wherewith they are vented. I ſhall only obſerve, that this ſpeech was ſpoke by a member, or rather by the head of the Cabal, who perfectly knew the King's ſecret intentions. The earl of Shaftſbury therefore muſt have had a forehead of braſs to pronounce ſuch a ſpeech before ſo auguſt an aſſembly. But very likely, this was only for form ſake, and the Cabal believed themſelves ſo ſecure, that the parliament itſelf would not dare to ſeem to know their artifices. However they were miſtaken, for the houſe of commons had, even before the King and chancellor delivered their ſpeeches, given ſome indications of vigor. Preſently after their meeting, they loudly complained of writs iſſued out by the lord chancellor, for electing and returning of perſons to ſit in their houſe, in the room of ſuch as were dead, or removed. And, by the way, all the members elected by virtue of theſe writs, were the chancellor's creatures. This complaint occaſioned the King, immediately after the two ſpeeches, to declare to the commons, " That " he had given order to the lord chancellor to " ſend out writs, for the better ſupply of their " houſe, having ſeen precedents for it; but if any " ſcruple or queſtion did ariſe about it, he left it " to the houſe to debate as ſoon as they could." Accordingly the commons, the very next day, voted thoſe writs and returns irregular, and expelled all the members thus elected.

Members unduly elected turned out of the houſe.

There were in this parliament, as in moſt others, two parties, called the Court and Country party. This was their diſtinction, and it manifeſtly implied, that the intereſts of the court were directly oppoſite to thoſe of the people, as the intereſts of one party are uſually to thoſe of the contrary. The court party had always prevailed, while the people were perſuaded of the good intentions of the King and his miniſters. But as his Majeſty diſcovered himſelf, both by his way of living, aud frequent ſigns of irreligion; or by his inclination for the Papiſts; or by his profuſion and avidity of money; or laſtly, by his union with France and the war with the States, his party ſenſibly decreaſed every day, for two very natural reaſons. Firſt, becauſe many of thoſe members, who, at the begining, were of the King's party thro' inclination and zeal for religion, while they conſidered him as protector of the church of England, loſt this inclination, as ſoon as they were convinced, that the King was far from deſigning the good of the church or ſtate. His Majeſty's proteſtations loſt all their effect, when it was once ſeen, that his actions ſo little correſponded with his words. Secondly, for the ſame reaſon, the people, perceiving that religion and the ſtate were in danger, choſe ſuch repreſentatives to fill the vacancies of the houſe, whoſe principles were directly oppoſite to the deſigns of the court. As the ſeats by the death of the members could not but be very numerous in a parliament, which had now ſate twelve years, the country party came by degrees to prevail, and the King and his miniſters no longer found it ſo eaſy to carry whatever they deſired, as at the opening of the parliament. It is certain, ſo long as the people do not ſuſpect the King of ill deſigns againſt liberty and religion, the court party prevail in the parliament, or rather there are not then two different parties. For, ſuppoſing the King an exact obſerver of the laws himſelf, and careful to ſee them punctually obeyed, there can be no difference between the two parties, but with reſpect to the quantity of money granted to the King. But as the people are under obligations to the King, for his maintenance of order, equity, moderation, and juſtice in the government, they are never uneaſy with the power and wealth heaped on ſuch a King, and commonly the country party, if there is one in the parliament, is much inferior to the King's. But the caſe is quite otherwiſe when the people are once prejudiced againſt their Sovereign, and no longer confide in his promiſes. For then, the court party is compoſed of men, who have only their own private fortunes in view, and is not ſo numerous as that of the people, which, beſide the public intereſt, find likewiſe a private advantage in oppoſing the court's deſigns. In this caſe, the people uſually chuſe able repreſentatives, and ſuch as are believed well affected to their country, and it is very rare that the intrigues of the court are capable of hindering theſe elections. A proof of what I advance was ſeen in the elections of the parliament of the third of November 1640, under Charles I, wherein the country country-party was ſo ſuperior to that of the court. This proof is confirmed by the tranſactions of the parliament I am now ſpeaking of, which for twelve years had appeared ſo devoted to his Majeſty, and which changed from one extreme to another, when they had loſt their former confidence in the King and his miniſter. It is in vain to aſcribe this change to the intrigues and cabals of ſome particular enemies of the court. Never could private perſons be powerful enough to corrupt a whole parliament, or the greater part, if their credit was not built upon the miſmanagement of the King and his miniſters. As we are entering upon a new period, I believe it neceſſary to prepare the reader for this change, by ſhowing him the true cauſe of it.

In the two ſpeeches of the King and the chancellor, we have ſeen what vaſt ſupplies the King demanded of his parliament, viz. a conſiderable aid for the ſea-ſervice; another for the land; a third to diſcharge ſome old debts; a fourth to refund the money taken out of the exchequer, and which could not amount to leſs than two millions two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling for the ſpace of ſeventeen months. All this computed, muſt have amounted at leaſt to five millions. Tho' the chancellor's ſpeech had but little weight with the commons, they would however ſhow, that in demanding a redreſs of grievances, as was their intention, they did not act thro' a ſpirit of paſſion and revenge. Wherefore, tho' they were by no means convinced of the neceſſity or juſtice of the war undertaken by the King, they voted a ſupply of an eighteen months aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds a month, which in all amounted to twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds, for the King's extraordinary occaſions, without ſpecifying that it was for the ſupport of the war. But for fear his Majeſty ſhould prorogue them when the money bill was paſſed, they reſolved that the redreſs of grievances ſhould keep an even pace with it.

Addreſs of the commons againſt the declaration for liberty of conſcience. Echard, Vol. III. p. 314.

To this end, the nineteenth of February, the commons preſented an addreſs to the King, in which they told him——— "That having taken "into conſideration his declaration for indulgence to "Diſſenters, they found themſelves bound in duty "to inform his Majeſty, 'That penal laws in "matters eccleſiaſtical cannot be ſuſpended but by "act of parliament;' they therefore moſt humbly "beſought his Majeſty, to give ſuch directions, "'That no apprehenſions or jealouſies, might "remain in the hearts of his faithful ſubjects. To this addreſs the King ſent the following anſwer. "That he was very much troubled, that the de-"claration which he put out for ends ſo ne-"ceſſary to the quiet of this kingdom, eſpecially "in that conjuncture, ſhould prove the cauſe of "diſquiet, and give occaſion to the queſtioning of "his power in eccleſiaſtics, which he finds not "done in the reigns of any of his anceſtors. That "he never had thoughts of uſing it otherwiſe than "as it hath been intruſted in him to the peace and "eſtabliſhment of the church of England, and the "eaſe of all his ſubjects in general: neither doth "he pretend to ſuſpend any laws wherein the pro-"perties, rights, or liberties of any of his ſubjects "are concerned; nor to alter any thing in the "eſtabliſhed doctrine or diſcipline of the church "of England: but his only deſign in this was to "take off the penalties inflicted by ſtatutes upon "the Diſſenters, and which he believed, when "well conſidered of, they themſelves would not "not wiſh executed according to the rigor of the "law: neither hath he done this with any thought "of avoiding, or precluding the advice of his "parliament; and if any bill ſhall be offered to "him, which ſhall appear more proper to attain "the aforeſaid ends, and ſecure the peace of the "church and kingdom, when tendered in due "manner to him, 'He will ſhew how readily "he will concur in all ways that ſhall appear for "the good of the kingdom."

The King's anſwer. Feb. 23.

CHARLES II. AN' 1672.

The commons eaſily perceived, the King was not inclined to deſiſt from his declaration. Wherefore, three days after, they preſented another addreſs, in which, "They thanked him for his gra-"cious aſſurances and promiſes of 'maintaining "the religion eſtabliſhed, and the liberties and "properties of the people:' And they did not in "the leaſt doubt, but that his Majeſty had the ſame "gracious intentions in giving ſatisfaction to his "ſubjects, by his anſwer to their laſt petition and "addreſs: but that they found, that the ſaid an-"ſwer was not ſufficient to clear the apprehenſions "that might juſtly remain in the minds of his "people, by his Majeſty's having claimed a power "to ſuſpend penal laws in matters eccleſiaſtical, "and which his Majeſty did ſtill ſeem to aſſert, "in the ſaid anſwer, 'to be intitled in the crown, "and never queſtioned in any of the reigns of his "anceſtors:' wherein they humbly conceived his "Majeſty had been much miſinformed, ſince no ſuch "power had ever been claimed or exerciſed by "any of his Majeſty's predeceſſors. And if it ſhould "be admited, might tend to the interrupting the "free courſe of the laws, and altering the legi-"ſlative power, which had always been acknow-"leged to reſide in his Majeſty, and in his two "houſes of parliament. They therefore with an "unanimous conſent became humble ſuitors to his "Majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to give them a "full and ſatisfactory anſwer to their ſaid petition "and addreſs, and that his Majeſty would take ſuch "effectual order, 'That the proceedings in this mat-"ter, might not for the future be drawn into con-"ſequence or example." The King's anſwer to this addreſs was, "It is of conſequence, and I "will take it into conſideration."

A ſecond addreſs from the commons. Feb. 26

The King's anſwer.

At the time theſe addreſſes were preparing, ſir Job Charleton, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, being taken ill, humbly prayed his Majeſty, that he might be eaſed of the burden he was no longer able to ſuſtain. Edward Seymour, ſo famous in the reign of William III, was, by the court's recommendation, choſen in his room.

Mr. Seymour choſen ſpeaker of the commons. Kennet, p. 318.

The King and the Cabal were extremely miſtaken in imagining, that the declaration of liberty of conſcience, would gain the Preſbyterians, in return for ſo great a favor. The leaders of that party were too wiſe to be caught in ſo palpable and dangerous a ſnare. It was not difficult for them to perceive they were only deſigned as inſtruments to advance the intereſt of the Romiſh faith. When they reflected, that this favor was received from the King, the duke of York, and the members of the Cabal, they could not be perſuaded it flowed from a principle of religion or humanity. Beſide, they ſaw ſo many extraordinary proceedings, ſo many invaſions upon the rights of the people; the Papiſts indulged in their religion; the King making exorbitant demands upon his parliament; an army incamped at the very gates of London (1) in the midſt of winter; a war begun to deſtroy the only Proteſtant ſtate capable of ſupporting religion; and Catholics in the principal poſts; all this ſufficiently demonſtrated, that the ſuſpenſion of the penal laws was not for their ſake. So, inſtead of thanking his Majeſty for this pretended favor, alderman

Charles II. An' 1672.

Love, a city-member, and an eminent Diſſenter, ſpoke with the greateſt warmth againſt the declaration (1). This declaration for liberty of conſcience, wrought a great change in the houſe of commons. For that houſe, which had been ſo extravagantly animated againſt the Preſbyterians, ſeeing them ſacrifice their own intereſt to that of religion and the kingdom, ordered a bill to be brought in for their eaſe; a bill by which all the penalties againſt them in the act of uniformity were removed, and nothing required but taking the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy. This bill was read the firſt time on the twenty-ſeventh of February, and was completed in a few days. But the lords having made ſome amendments, the King prorogued the parliament before theſe amendments could be agreed to by the commons.

A bill prepared by the commons in favor of the Preſbyterians.

This bill, which was readily paſſed by the commons, ſufficiently ſhewed their diſtruſt of the court with regard to the declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſince by it all pretenſe was taken away of confounding the Preſbyterians with the other Non-conformiſts. As long as the commons had not ſuſpected the King's intention to favor Popery, they had affected to rank all the Diſſenters in one claſs, in order to include the Preſbyterians in the ſtatutes made againſt Non-conformiſts in general. But when his Majeſty was perceived to uſe this confuſion to favor the Papiſts, the commons were willing to own the ſeveral ſects ought to be diſtinguiſhed, and rather than abandon religion to the intrigues and artifices of the court and the Papiſts, reſolved to eaſe the Preſbyterians. In this they diſcovered a true zeal for the Proteſtant religion in general, knowing, it was not ſo dangerouſly attacked by the Preſbyterians as the Papiſts. But they ſhewed their attachment to the Proteſtant religion not only on this occaſion. At the very time they were preparing this bill for the eaſe of the Preſbyterians, another was brought in to injoin frequent catechiſing in the parochial churches (2) for the inſtruction of youth, intimating thereby, how neceſſary this precaution was thought in the preſent juncture. But this bill, as well as the other, was rendered abortive by the parliament's prorogation (3).

A reflection upon the conduct of the commons.

Burnet.

There can be no plainer indication of what the parliament thought of the deſigns of the court in favor of the Papiſts, than the addreſs preſented by both houſes to the King about the ſame time. This addreſs contained, firſt complaints on the growth of Popery; on the great reſort of Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits in the Kingdom; on the admiſſion of ſo many recuſants into places of truſt, and particularly in the army. After this, the two houſes deſired, "1. That his Majeſty would be pleaſed "to iſſue out his Royal proclamation, to com- "mand all prieſts and jeſuits (with exception of "thoſe in attendance upon the Queen, not being "natural born ſubjects) to depart within thirty "days out of the kingdom: and that his Majeſty "would be pleaſed, in the ſame proclamation, to "command all judges and other officers, to put "the laws in execution againſt all ſuch prieſts and "jeſuits, as ſhould be found in the kingdom after "that time. 2. That his Majeſty would be "pleaſed likewiſe to iſſue out commiſſions, to "tender the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy to "to all officers and ſoldiers now in his ſervice and "pay, and that ſuch as refuſed the ſaid oaths "might be immediately diſbanded. 3. That the "commiſſaries of the muſters be commanded and "injoined by his Majeſty's warrant, upon the pe- "nalty of loſing their places, not to permit any "officer to be muſtered in the ſervice and pay of "his Majeſty, until he hath taken the oaths of "allegiance and ſupremacy, and received the ſa- "crament of the lord's ſupper, according to the "uſage of the church of England; and that every "ſoldier ſhould take the ſaid oaths before his firſt "muſter, and receive the ſacrament in like "manner, before his ſecond muſter." Upon this addreſs, his Majeſty publiſhed a proclamation in the uſual ſtile, the ſeventh of that kind, by which (after a declaration, that as he had always adhered to the church of England, againſt all temptations whatſoever, ſo he was reſolved to maintain and defend it) he ſtrictly commanded all jeſuits and Romiſh prieſts to depart the kingdom, and the laws to be put in due execution, againſt all Popiſh recuſants, or thoſe juſtly ſuſpected ſo to be, &c. This proclamation was not ſatisfactory to the commons, becauſe it extended but to one ſingle article of their petition, without any mention of the removal of Papiſts from places of truſt. Wherefore, they proceeded to a new bill, in order to obtain their end, being reſolved not to finiſh the money bill, till they had procured a redreſs of their grievances, and particularly a revocation of the declaration for liberty of conſcience.

A proclamation upon it. Id. p. 318.

The commons enter upon new meaſures.

Charles was never ſo perplexed ſince his reſtoration. The Cabal had promiſed to make him abſolute, but after all, ſuggeſted no other means, than the uſing of force, at all hazards. By degrees he had hoped to attain his aim, in gaining now one point, then another, and laſtly to ſee himſelf able to trample on all oppoſers. He had moreover relied on the aſſiſtance of France, after the commonwealth of Holland ſhould be deſtroyed. But he had prepoſterouſly imagined, he ſhould have time to form all his meaſures, and be able to ſupport his deſigns, whenever they ſhould meet with oppoſition. Perhaps too he had depended on the condeſcenſion of this parliament, by reaſon it had hitherto been favorable to him. But as the commons were proceeding, the time was come, that the King muſt either give way, or break with them. In this laſt caſe, he had too much ſenſe to believe, that a handful of Papiſts, with a few flattering courtiers and miniſters, were able to ſupport him, at a time when he could expect no aſſiſtance from France, and when the male-contents might be countenanced by a Dutch fleet. Beſide, his exchequer was empty: and therefore he muſt have reſolved, by means of his army, to raiſe money on his ſubjects; knowing if he had not wherewith to content his adherents, he would hardly ingage them to betray the intereſts of their country. But this army was Proteſtant, excepting a few Popiſh officers and ſoldiers. The officers of the fleet, and the ſailors, were alſo Proteſtants. It was therefore unnatural to expect ingaging ſuch a fleet and army in his deſigns, ſo contrary to their religion and liberties. Laſtly, he conſidered, that theſe very miniſters and courtiers, who appeared ſo devoted to his ſervice, would deſert him, as it happened to the King his father, when he ſhould be no longer able to protect them. In ſhort, it was too ſoon to begin the execution of a project of this nature, for which he was unprepared, and yet, by the parliament's laſt addreſs, he was obliged either to execute or relinquiſh it. His honor ſeemed ingaged to ſupport the declaration for liberty of conſcience, for he had told the parliament that he would adhere to it, and his inclination led him to favor the Papiſts, whoſe religion he had ſecretly imbraced. He moreover found himſelf obliged not to abandon thoſe miniſters to the parliament's reſentment; who, in giving him their advice, had depended on his protection. But honor was not capable to balance the difficulties which he foreſaw, if he perſiſted in his enterprize. On the other hand, his council was divided. The duke of Ormond and the earl of Arlington adviſed him to wait a more favorable opportunity; but the duke of York, and the reſt of the Cabal, were for throwing off the maſk, and ſupporting his declaration. They repreſented, that his father's ruin was owing to his condeſcending to the firſt demands of the parliament of 1640; and ſaid, they ſaw no leſs cauſe to fear now; for ſhould the declaration be recalled, other demands would be ſet up, which would never end, till they were carried ſo high, that the King would not be able to grant them, without undoing himſelf: and that after a thouſand condeſcenſions, he would at laſt be obliged to break with the parliament, and all the fruit he could reap from this compliance, would be to make them the more inſolent. They farther added, that his holding his reſolution a few days would bring the parliament to reaſon, his Majeſty having a party among them which began to make the leaders waver: and that there were forces ſufficient on foot to ſupport the one ſide, and intimidate the other. It is pretended, the earl of Shaftſbury undertook to anſwer for the ſucceſs. All this was very capable to hold the King in ſuſpenſe. It is believed, the ladies ingaged in this affair, and fearing that a rupture would deprive them of the King's bounties, ſtrongly ſollicited him to recal his declaration. However the King, after ſome heſitation, called for the declaration, and with his own hands broke the ſeal.

He recalls his declaration. Burnet, p. 351. Echard.

The King came to the parliament the eighth of March, and after preſſing the commons to diſpatch the money bill, ſaid to both houſes, ——— "If "there be any ſcruple yet remaining with you "touching the ſuſpenſion of the penal laws, I here "faithfully promiſe you, that what hath been "done in that particular, ſhall not for the future be "drawn into example and conſequence; and as I "daily expect from you a bill for my ſupply, ſo "I aſſure you, I ſhall as willingly receive and paſs "any other you ſhall offer me, that may tend to "the giving you ſatisfaction in all your juſt griev-"ances."

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Ibid.

This ſpeech was ſo agreeable to the parliament, that both houſes went in a body and thanked the King for ſo full and ſatisfactory an anſwer.

Is thanked for it by both houſes.

But if the two houſes were pleaſed, the Cabal was not ſo. They had formed a project, and prepared a ſcheme to render King Charles abſolute. Nay, they had taken ſome ſteps towards its execution. This ſcheme had never been formed, had it not been ſuggeſted, the King would have the courage and reſolution to withſtand the complaints of the parliament: for the projectors could never imagine the parliament would ſuffer the liberties of the people to be invaded without oppoſition. All their hope therefore was founded upon his Majeſty's ſteadineſs. They were to ingage in a conteſt, in which they flattered themſelves to render the King victorious. But, to their great aſtoniſhment, they ſaw the King was retreating, when he ſhould have prepared for battle, and conſequently the hopes of victory were intirely vaniſhed. But this was not all they had to apprehend; they were in danger of being abandoned by the King, to the reſentment of the two houſes after this firſt ſtep; for how could they hope for his Majeſty's protection who had juſt given ſuch manifeſt marks of his own fear?

The Cabal very much diſpleaſed with the King.

Charles II. An' 1672.

The earl of Arlington, as I have obſerved, had in ſome meaſure, deſerted the Cabal, by his advice to the King, to revoke his declaration for liberty of conſcience. The earl of Shaftſbury ſoon followed him, but in a manner more ſurprizing, more public, and with more remarkable circumſtances. As ſoon as he perceived, the King had not ſufficient reſolution to execute the great work which was projected, he thought it but juſt to forſake a Prince, who had forſaken himſelf, and left his counſellors expoſed to danger. This was the ſecond time the earl had experienced Charles's inconſtancy, and want of reſolution. The declaration affair was common to him with the reſt of the Cabal. But the writs iſſued out of chancery for the election of members to fill the vacant ſeats in the houſe of commons, were peculiar to him. He had undertaken to iſſue theſe writs as chancellor, on pretenſe of ſome precedents which were never known, on the King's poſitive promiſe to ſtand by him; and yet, he was deſerted by his Majeſty, at the firſt inſtance of the commons, or rather before their complaints. This was, however, a thing of very great importance. For if the crown could have iſſued writs for filling the vacancies, it could have been very eaſy for the miniſters to have had ſuch members returned as they pleaſed, as it happened on this firſt occaſion, wherein all thoſe who were choſen were creatures of the court. Father Orleans, who received his information of the Engliſh affairs from King James II, poſitively affirms, as one that could not be miſtaken when he follows ſuch a guide, "That the ancient cuſtom was, on the death of a "member, for the chancellor to iſſue a writ under "the great-ſeal, for the election of another, and "tho' the writ contained nothing to obſtruct "the freedom of the elections, yet the King might "find means to prevent any member from being "choſen, who was againſt him. That this cuſtom "had been changed during the troubles of the laſt "reign, when the commons aſſumed he power of "iſſuing the writs by their ſpeaker, and that this "abuſe had been ſuffered to continue, ſince the "King's reſtoration, thro' the weakneſs or igno-"rance of the chancellors before Shaftſbury." But this is a groundleſs aſſertion, as appears from what the King himſelf ſaid to both houſes, at the begining of this ſeſſion, "That he had given order to the lord "chancellor to ſend out writs, for the better ſupply "of their houſe, having ſeen precedents for it." Had this been a right inherent in the crown, and firſt invaded by the commons, during the troubles of the laſt reign, would the King have ſaid only, "that he had ſeen ſome precedents for it." This remark is only to ſhew, with what caution father Orleans's hiſtory is to be read, tho' dictated by King James himſelf.

Shaftſbury turns to the country party. Burnet. Echard.

Father Orleans refuted.

The earl of Shaftſbury throws himſelf into the party of the people. Orleans.

The earl of Shaftſbury was therefore more expoſed to the reſentment of the commons, than any other of the Cabal, not only for pernicious counſels given the King, in conjunction with his four colleagues, the ſecret whereof was not yet known, but chiefly for the writs iſſued by him as chancellor, ſo deſtructive of their rights and privileges. He had therefore reaſon to fear a vigorous proſecution for this fact, and it is certain, the oppoſite party to the court had already projected an accuſation againſt him. On the contrary, the weakneſs he had diſcovered in the King, gave him no hopes of protection from thence. He believed therefore, he had no other way to divert the impending ſtorm, than by quiting the King, and throwing himſelf into the contrary party. "He executed this re-"ſolution, ſays father Orleans, the day after the "King reſolved to revoke his declaration for

Charles II. An' 1672.

" liberty of conſcience. It was eleven at night " before the King had taken his laſt reſolution, and " the next morning the earl of Shaftſbury appeared " in the houſe of lords, at the head of the moſt " violent party, againſt the Catholic religion, the " Dutch war, and the union with France." If father Orleans is to be credited, he did more, for in a full houſe he diſcovered the reaſons which had induced the King to grant that liberty of conſcience, join with France, and declare war againſt Holland. I doubt not his diſcovering this ſecret to his new party, but confeſs, I muſt have better evidence than that of father Orleans, to convince me that this diſcovery was made publicly in a full houſe, and on this very occaſion, eſpecially, before the King and duke of York, who were that day preſent in the houſe. This would have been a formal accuſation againſt his Majeſty, the duke of York, and the other four members of the Cabal, of which he could have given no proofs, if they had been demanded. He had too much ſenſe to expoſe himſelf to ſuch danger. The occaſion of his declaring publicly againſt the King, on the day I am ſpeaking of, was this.

The earl of Shaftſbury declares publicly againſt the King. Tyley. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 321.

The lord treaſurer Clifford, ignorant of Shaftſbury's intentions, paid him a viſit the night before, and communicating to him a project for eſtabliſhing a perpetual fund to free the King from his dependence on the parliament, read to him a ſpeech, he had prepared to ſpeak on the morrow in the houſe of lords, concerning this project. The earl of Shaftſbury ſeemed highly pleaſed with the ſpeech, and deſired to hear it again. Next day, the King and duke of York coming to the houſe to countenance this project with their preſenſe, the lord Clifford ſpoke his ſpeech. He had no ſooner done, than the earl of Shaftſbury ſtood up, and anſwered his ſpeech from the begining to the end. He demonſtrated this project to be extravagant and impracticable; that it would overturn the government, and perhaps ſend the King and Royal family abroad again, to ſpend their days in exile, without hopes of a return. If the treaſurer's ſpeech ſurprized the lords, who perceived the deſign of it, their aſtoniſhment was increaſed when they ſaw the chancellor, a leading member of the Cabal, declare ſo openly againſt the King. It is ſaid, the duke of York, while Shaftſbury was ſpeaking, whiſpered the King, " What a rogue have you of a lord " chancellor!" And that theKing replied, " What " a fool have you of a lord treaſurer!" I know not whether the truth of theſe particulars is to be relied on, ſome of which are improbable. For what likelihood is there, that his Majeſty, after breaking the ſeal of his declaration with his own hands for fear of the parliament, ſhould appear, within a few hours after, in the houſe of lords, to ſupport, by his preſenſe, the treaſurer's project, which tended to the ſubverſion of parliaments? Or that he ſhould call the treaſurer fool, for a propoſal which the King could not be ignoraut of, and had doubtleſs approved (1)?

Charles II. An' 1672.

The earl of Shaftſbury, however, from this time was always at the head of the country party, and cauſed the King to undergo great mortifications, as hereafter will appear. But I muſt give here a very material caution to thoſe who read father Orleans's hiſtory, or ſuch Engliſh or foreign authors as eſpouſe the King's cauſe. All theſe writers paint the earl of Shaftſbury in very black colors. He was, according to them, the greateſt villain that ever lived; his wickedneſs was anſwerable to the extent of his genius, and the depth of his penetration. He was perpetually contriving how to perplex the King and duke of York, or rather to ruin them irrecoverably. He was not only the head but the ſoul of his party, by which they were actuated. In ſhort, every thing tranſacted afterwards by the parliament againſt the King, is ſolely imputed to him, and it is artfully inſinuated, that, had it not been for ſuch an agent, the nation would have remained in tranquillity, and the parliament, content with the King's favorable anſwers and gracious promiſes, would have been quiet, and attempted nothing againſt the court. Thus, according to theſe writers, all the meaſures and precautions taken afterwards by the parliament againſt the deſigns of the court, were intirely owing to Shaftſbury's malice and revenge. It is eaſy to perceive, that their deſign is to diſpel the grounds of the parliament's fear and complaint of the conduct of the court, by inſinuating, that theſe complaints were frivolous, and the effects of Shaftſbury's vengeance, who, they ſay, directed both houſes of parliament, or rather had them intirely at command. For my part, I am no way concerned to vindicate the earl of Shaftſbury's honor, but believe myſelf obliged to remark, for the more eaſy diſcovery of the truth, that the Cabal's project to render the King abſolute, and introduce Popery, is of unqueſtionable certainty. The authors juſt mentioned, ſcruple not to own it, and ſhould they deny it, the thing would not be leſs true. Conſequently the parliament coming to a full and exact knowledge of this deſign, which was only before ſuſpected, had all the reaſon in the world for their fear and caution againſt the King and his miniſters. This being granted, let the earl of Shaftſbury have been a villain, or an honeſt Advice to the readers concerning the earl of Shaftſbury.

(1) This buſineſs of Shaftſbury's turning againſt the court, is thus related by Burnet. " The lord Clifford reſolving to aſſert " the declaration for liberty of conſcience, ſhewed the heads he intended to ſpeak on to the King, who approved of them. He " began the debate with rough words, calling the vote of the commons, Monſtrum horrendum ingens, and run on in a high " ſtrain. When he had done, the earl of Shaftſbury, to the amazement of the whole houſe ſaid, he muſt differ from the lord " that ſpoke laſt, toto cœlo. He ſaid, while theſe matters were debated out of doors, he might think with others, that the " King's ſupremacy did warrant the declaration: but now, that ſuch a houſe of commons were of another mind, he ſubmited " his reaſons to theirs. They were the King's great council, and muſt both adviſe and ſupport him. The King was all in fury " to be thus forſaken by his chancellor, and told the lord Clifford, how well he was pleaſed with his ſpeech, and how highly " offended with the other. The debate went on, and upon a diviſion the court had the majority. But above thirty of the moſt " conſiderable of the houſe proteſted againſt the vote. So the court ſaw they gained nothing in carrying a vote, that drew " after it ſuch a proteſtation. It ſeems, Clifford, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, were for violent meaſures, while Arlington " and Shaftſbury preſſed the King to content the parliament. Accordingly, in the afternoon of the day that the matter had " been argued in the houſe of lords, Shaftſbury and Arlington got all thoſe members of the commons, who were in the court " party, to go privately to the King one after another, and tell him, that upon Clifford's ſpeech the houſe was in ſuch fury " that probably they would have gone to impeachments, had it not been for Shaftſbury's ſpeaking on the other ſide, who, they " believed, ſpoke the King's ſenſe, as the other did the duke's. So they made the King apprehend, the chancellor's ſpeech, " with which he was ſo offended, was really a great ſervice done him, and perſuaded him farther, that he might now ſave " himſelf, and obtain an indemnity for his miniſters, if he would part with the declaration, and paſs the bill. Whereupon, " before night, the King was quite changed, and ſaid to his brother, that Clifford had undone himſelf, and ſpoiled all by his " ſpeech; and tho' Shaftſbury had ſpoke like a rogue, yet that had ſtoped a fury, which the other's indiſcretion had kindled. " The duke, in the evening told Clifford what the King ſaid. Upon which Clifford went to the King, and ſaid, he thought, " that in what he had done he had both ſerved and pleaſed the King, but was ſurprized to find by the duke, that the King " was of another mind. The King, in ſome confuſion, owned, that all he had ſaid was right in itſelf, but he ſhould have " conſidered better what the commons could bear. Clifford finding he muſt loſe the white ſtaff, conſulted with Buckingham " whom to recommend for treaſurer, and they pitched upon ſir Thomas Oſborn, afterwards duke of Leeds, p. 348, &c."

man; let him have betrayed the King's ſecrets, and acted only thro' a ſpirit of revenge; let his fear of the parliament be the ſole motive of his ingaging in the country party againſt the King; or let him have acted from a principle of honor and duty, in order to ſave the church and ſtate, the thing itſelf remains the ſame. The good or bad qualities of the earl of Shaftſbury did not cauſe the parliament to have more or leſs reaſon to apprehend the deſigns of the King and his miniſters. If they were prejudicial to religion and the ſtate, as cannot be denied, the parliament had reaſon to take the beſt meaſures to prevent them. Why therefore are theſe meaſures, theſe precautions, aſcribed to Shaftſbury's malice and artifices, ſince there was another and more natural cauſe. Before the earl of Shaftſbury appeared in the oppoſite party to the court, the parliament had begun to take theſe precautions, tho' the court's deſigns were yet but ſuſpected: they were better informed by this earl; why therefore can it be ſuppoſed, that after this information, they ſhould ſuddenly relinquiſh their former motives, and act only with a view to ſerve as inſtruments of Shaftſbury's revenge? This is not even probable, and yet the authors abovementioned loſe no opportunity of reproaching the earl, and aſcribing all the mortifications the King afterwards received, ſolely to him. Beſide the reader's inſtruction, my deſign, in what I have ſaid, is to hinder ſuch as have read, or ſhall read the other hiſtorians, from thinking it ſtrange that I do not every moment exclaim againſt the earl of Shaftſbury's conduct, as if he were the ſole author of what was done againſt the King; and that I content myſelf with ſaying, in a word, this peer uſed all his intereſt and credit to break the meaſures of the King and his miniſters.

The teſt act paſſes the commons. Statute b. 25 Car. II. c. 2. Echard, Vol. III. p. 321, 326. Kennet. Burnet.

Immediately after this change in the earl of Shaftſbury, the commons paſſed a bill, afterwards called the teſt act, intitled, "An act for preventing the "dangers which may happen from Popiſh recu- "ſants." This act required, that all perſons injoying any office or place of truſt and profit, ſhould take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy in public and open court, and ſhould alſo receive the ſacrament in ſome pariſh church, immediately after divine ſervice; and deliver a certificate ſigned by the miniſters and church-wardens, atteſted by the oaths of two credible witneſſes, and upon record: and that all perſons taking the ſaid oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy ſhould likewiſe make and ſubſcribe this following declaration.——— "I do declare, "That I do believe, that there is not any tranſub- "ſtantiation in the ſacrament of the Lord's- "ſupper, or in the elements of bread and wine, "at, or after the conſecration thereof, by any per- "ſon whatſoever.——— This bill readily paſſed the houſe of commons, and after ſome difficulties, was alſo approved by the lords (1). The earl of Briſtol, tho' a Papiſt, made a ſpeech on this occaſion, and concluded with ſaying, "upon the whole "matter, however the ſentiments of a Catholic "of the church of Rome (not of the court of "Rome) may oblige me, upon ſcruple of con- "ſcience, to give my negative to this bill, yet as "a member of a Proteſtant parliament, my advice "prudentially cannot but go along with the main "ſcope of it, the preſent circumſtances of time, "and affairs conſidered, and the neceſſity of com- "poſing the diſturbed minds of the people."

March 15. Echard.

Beſide this bill, there was another preparing to prevent intermarriages between Proteſtants and Papiſts. This tended directly to break the preſent negociation of the duke of York's marriage with an archduchеſs of Inſpruch (2), and to hinder him from marrying any Catholic Princeſs whatever. In the mean while, the King was very uneaſy, ſeeing, the parliament was informed of his ſecret reſolutions, and effectual meaſures were taken to prevent their execution. Wherefore he quickened the commons by ſeveral meſſages, to finiſh the money bill. But the commons, inſtead of ſatisfying him, having provided for the ſecurity of religion, preſented him two addreſſes of grievances, one concerning England, the other Ireland. In the firſt, they told him, that they were firmly perſuaded of his intention to govern according to the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom. Yet finding that ſome abuſes and grievances were crept into the government, they craved leave humbly to repreſent them to his Majeſty's knowledge, and to deſire, Another bill to prevent the duke of York's marrying with a Popiſh Princeſs. Echard, Vol. III. p. 323.

Two petitions relating to grievances. Ibid.

"1. That the impoſition of twelve pence per "chaldron upon coals, for providing of convoys, "by virtue of an order of council dated the fif- "teenth of May 1672, may be recalled, and all "bonds, taken by virtue thereof, cancelled.

"2. That his Majeſty's proclamation of the "fourth of December 1672, 'For preventing diſor- "ders which may be commited by ſoldiers,' and "whereby the ſoldiers now in his Majeſty's ſer- "vice are in a manner exempted from the ordinary "courſe of juſtice, may likewiſe be recalled.

"3. And whereas great complaints have been "made out of ſeveral parts of the kingdom, of "diverſe abuſes commited in quartering of ſol- "diers, that his Majeſty would be pleaſed to give "orders to redreſs thoſe abuſes, and in particular, "that no ſoldiers be hereafter quartered in any "private houſes, and that due ſatisfaction may be "given to the inn-keepers and victuallers where "they lye, before they remove.

"4. And, ſince the continuance of ſoldiers in "this realm, will neceſſarily produce many incon- "veniencies to his Majeſty's ſubjects, they humbly "repreſented it as their petition and advice, that "when this preſent war is ended, all the ſoldiers "that have been raiſed ſince the laſt ſeſſion of "parliament may be diſbanded.

"5. That his Majeſty would likewiſe be pleaſed "to conſider of the irregularities and abuſes in "preſſing ſoldiers, and give orders for the preven- "tion thereof for the future."

Theſe demands ſhew, how the court by degrees was laboring to introduce an abſolute authority: Firſt, by a light impoſition, by virtue of an order of council, of twelve-pence upon every chaldron, or thirty-ſix buſhels of coals. The tax was inconſiderable, but the conſequence very great. Secondly, the magiſtrates, in aſſuming the power of quartering of ſoldiers in private houſes, eaſily found an opportunity to gall and oppreſs their enemies, and ſuch as were not well-inclined to the court. Thirdly, in preſſing ſoldiers, the officers had room to commit many acts of injuſtice, by liſting not the moſt proper perſons for the ſervice, but the rich who were able to redeem themſelves with money. Tho' this practice was much uſed with regard to ſailors, and continues to this day, it had never extended to ſoldiers, or at leaſt but on very extraordinary occaſions.

(2) The articles of that marriage were concluded in October 1672; and, as the earl of Arlington ſent word to ſir William Godolphin, "upon terms ſomewhat incongruous as to our government here, but in ſubſtance much to his Majeſty's and Royal High- "neſs's ſatisfaction." Arlington's Letters, Vol. II. p. 391. But tho' the Princeſs of Inſpruch's religion pleaſed the French King, yet the intereſt this marriage would bring with it, did not; ſo that he propounded the Princeſs of Modena R. Coke, p. 166. CHARLES II. AN' 1672.

The petition concerning the Iriſh grievances contained ſeveral articles chiefly relating to religion. In one of theſe the commons deſired, his Majeſty would be pleaſed to diſmiſs out of all command, civil or military, colonel Richard Talbot, who notoriouſly aſſumed the title of agent for the Roman Catholics in Ireland, and forbid him all acceſs to his court. This Talbot was afterwards created duke of Tyrconnel, and lord lieutenant of Ireland by James II. (1)

The King's anſwer. Id. p. 125.

The King replied to theſe addreſſes, that as they conſiſted of ſo many different parts, it could not be expected he ſhould give an immediate anſwer. But promiſed, that for the ſeveral particular things contained in them, he would before the next meeting take ſuch effectual care, that no man ſhould have reaſon to complain. After this, the money-bill paſſed without oppoſition. But, not to approve expreſly the war for which this money was intended, the bill was intitled, "A ſupply of his Ma-"jeſty's extraordinary occaſions (2)," and a particular proviſo was tacked to it, "That no Papiſt ſhould "be capable of holding any public imployment.

AN' 1673. Acts paſſed. Statute-b.

Before the bill in favor of the Proteſtant Diſſenters and ſome others were ready, the King came to the houſe the twenty-ninth of March, and paſſed ſeveral acts, among which were the money bill, the teſt act, and an act for a general and free pardon, but with many exceptions (3). Then he adjourned the parliament to the twentieth of October. If the King in his declaration for liberty of conſcience had intended the eaſe of the Proteſtant Non-conformiſts, as he would have it believed, he might have deferred the adjournment of the parliament a few days, till the bill paſſed in their favor was ready, or at leaſt might have preſſed the two houſes to finiſh it. But as the Papiſts were excluded from the benefit of this act, he ſhewed no farther concern for the intereſt of the Preſbyterians, but adjourned the parliament before the lords had given their conſent to the bill.

The teſt act having received the Royal aſſent, moſt of the Catholic officers quited their poſts. During theſe tranſactions in parliament, preparations for the ſea war were making in England and Holland with equal ardor and vaſt expenſe. The duke of York having reſigned his office of lord high-admiral, Prince Rupert was appointed to command the fleet. Ruyter having ſecret intelligence, that the Engliſh fleet would not be ſoon ready, put to ſea with forty-two men of war, and ſixteen veſſels to be ſunk in the Thames (5). He came into the mouth of the river the ſecond of May, where he found he had been impoſed on, and that forty-five large ſhips were coming to attack him. Upon this diſappointment, he retired expecting the reſt of his fleet at Schonevelt in Zealand. In this interval, Prince Rupert failed to meet the French fleet coming from Breſt, and joined them in the channel the ſixteenth of May. After this junction, the combined fleet conſiſted of one hundred and forty ſail of all ſorts, of which there were thirty large French ſhips (6). The Dutch fleet had but a hundred and nine ſail, viz. fifty-four large ſhips, fourteen frigats, twenty-four fire-ſhips, eleven advice-boats, and ſix galliots (7). As I am not ſufficiently verſed in marine affairs to give clear deſcriptions of ſea ingagements, I ſhall only ſay, that this year was ſignalized by three naval expeditions, fought with ſuch equal loſs, that neither could juſtly boaſt of victory, tho' both challenged it in every battle. The firſt was fought near Shonevelt the twenty-eight of May. The ſecond off Fluſhing the fourth of June, but this was rather a canonading of about four hours, after which, both ſides retired to their reſpective coaſts. The third, fought the eleventh of Auguſt, was the moſt obſtinate. The Engliſh loſt vice-admiral Spragg, who was drowned in changing his ſhip (8), and the Dutch vice-admiral Sweers. The loſs of the great ſhips in theſe three ingagements was inconſiderable, but on both ſides many leſſer ones were either burned or ſunk. In a word, nothing deciſive happened at ſea this campain, and therefore I need not be more circumſtantial (9).

Theſe two conqueſts, and the neceſſity the King of France was under to maintain the war againſt Spain (which had at laſt declared againſt him, beſide that the Emperor and ſeveral German Princes, were alſo upon the point of declaring for the States) obliged him to abandon all his conqueſts in the United Provinces, except Maeſtricht and Grave, where he left gariſons, after having drawn away all the reſt in November.

to Francis duke of Modena, and the marriage was immediately concluded and ſolemnized by his proxy † earl of Peterborough. The King of France greatly contributed to this match, by declaring the young Princeſs, then but fifteen years of age, an adoptive daughter of France, and by ingaging to pay her portion.

† Henry Mordaunt.

As the duke's marriage with a Catholic Princeſs could not but be very diſagreeable to the Engliſh, the court eaſily foreſaw, that the parliament, which was to meet the twentieth of October, would indeavor to oppoſe it. There were ſeveral bills ready, which could be finiſhed in few days; and as the parliament was only adjourned, the court feared they would begin with compleating theſe bills, two of which the court was deſirous to put a ſtop to, viz. the bill againſt inter-marriages between Proteſtant and Papiſts, and that for the eaſe of the Proteſtant Diſſenters. Wherefore the King was eaſily perſuaded to prorogue the parliament. The firſt thing the commons did, after their meeting, was, to preſent an addreſs to his Majeſty, deſiring that the duke's marriage with the Princeſs of Modena might not be conſummated, and that he might not be married to any but a Proteſtant. Upon this, the King prorogued the parliament to the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month, to defeat the two bills above-mentioned, and ſome others no leſs agreeable to him.

The commons addreſs againſt the duke's marriage. Kennet. Echard. Burnet.

The parliament prorogued.

The twenty-ſeventh of October the King coming to the parliament with the uſual formalities, made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them. "———That having conſented to a negociation "at Cologne, he hoped to have welcomed them "with an honorable peace; but the Dutch had "diſappointed him in that expectation, and treated "his embaſſadors at Cologne with the contempt "of conquerors, and not as might have been ex-"pected from men in their condition. That this "obliged him to move them again for a ſup-"ply, the ſafety and honor of the nation neceſ-"carily requiring it; that it muſt be proportion-"able to the occaſion, and if he had it not ſpee-"dily, the miſchief would be irreparable in his "preparations for the next ſpring.———" He told them, "That he was ſteady in main-"taining all the profeſſions and promiſes made "to them concerning religion and property; "and ſhould be very ready to give them freſh "inſtances of his zeal for preſerving the eſta-"bliſhed religion and laws, as often as any occa-"ſion ſhall require. In the laſt place, he com-"mended to their conſideration and care, the "the debt he owed the Goldſmiths, in which "very many other of his good ſubjects were in-"volved.———"

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard, Vol. III. p. 333.

The Goldſmiths's debt was contracted by the King when he ſhut up the Exchequer, and amounted to more than two millions ſterling. Thus Charles after a ſeizure of other men's property, by a pure act of authority, pretended, it belonged to the parliament to make reparation, on account of the application of this money to a war, of which he had not vouchſafed to communicate the deſign to them. This was the hardeſt caſe that had for a long time happened in England. For, on one hand, it was a melancholy thing to ſee ſo many families ruined, in ſupport of an expenſe which ought to have been common to the whole nation: but on the other hand to pay this debt, was to eſtabliſh a precedent of a terrible conſequence, and authoriſe the King and his ſucceſſors to imploy the ſame, or the like methods, for raiſing of money, without conſent of parliament. As for the twelve hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds granted the King for his extraordinary occaſions in the laſt ſeſſion, he believed, that ſum ought not to be imployed in diſcharging this debt, nor even in maintaining the Dutch war, ſince a new ſupply was demanded for that purpoſe.

CHARLES II. AN' 1673.

After the King had ended his ſpeech, the chancellor inlarged with great eloquence upon all the points touched by his Majeſty. But his ſpeech made little impreſſion on the commons. They were no ſooner returned to their houſe, but inſtead of voting the King thanks for his ſpeech, they adjourned themſelves to the thirtieth day of the month. The ſame day his Majeſty ſent them his anſwer to their addreſs concerning the duke of York's marriage, the ſubſtance of which was, "———That he perceived the houſe of com-"mons had wanted a full information of this mat-"ter, the marriage not being barely intended, but "compleated, according to the forms uſed among "Princes, and by his Royal conſent and autho-"rity: nor could he in the leaſt ſuppoſe it diſ-"agreeable to the houſe of commons, his Royal "Highneſs having been, in the view of the world, "for ſeveral months, ingaged in a treaty of mar-"riage with another Catholic Princeſs, and yet a "parliament was held during the time, and not the "leaſt exception taken at it." The houſe was by no means pleaſed with this anſwer; and therefore reſolved to preſent a ſecond addreſs, with their reaſons againſt this marriage. The ſame day, it was voted, that a bill ſhould be prepared for a general teſt between Proteſtants and Papiſts, that is to ſay, an oath which ſhould ſerve to diſtinguiſh Proteſtants from Papiſts, with this clauſe. "That they "who refuſed to take it ſhould be incapable of "bearing any office civil or military, or to ſit in "parliament, or to come within five miles of the "court."

A bill for a general teſt. Id. p. 336.

The commons took the King's ſpeech into conſideration, the thirty-firſt of October, and after a ſerious debate in a grand commitee, came to the following reſolution, "That the houſe conſider-"ing the preſent condition of the nation, will not "take into any farther debate, the conſideration of "any aid, or ſupply, or charge upon the ſubject, "before the time of payment of the eighteen months "aſſeſſment granted by a late act of parliament, "intitled, 'An act for raiſing the ſum of twelve "hundred, thirty-eight thouſand, ſeven hundred, "and fifty pounds, be expired; except it ſhall "appear that the obſtinacy of the Dutch ſhall render "it neceſſary; nor before this kingdom be effectu-"ally ſecured from Popery, and Popiſh coun-"ſellors, and the other preſent grievances be re-"dreſſed."

Vote of the commons to grant no more ſupplies to the King. Ibid.

His Majeſty, as may well be imagined, was extremely offended with this reſolution, and the more as it was followed by an addreſs for a general faſt to be obſerved throughout the whole nation, which intimated to the people, that the kingdom was in great danger. Two days after, the houſe in a body waited on the King with a ſecond addreſs againſt the duke of York's marriage, in which after many compliments, they repreſented to him,——"1. That "if this match do proceed, it will be a means to "diſquiet the minds of his Proteſtant ſubjects at "home; and to fill them with endleſs jealouſies "and diſcontents; and will bring his Majeſty into "ſuch alliances abroad, as will prove highly pre-"judicial, if not deſtructive to the intereſts of the "very Proteſtant religion itſelf. 2. They find by "ſad experience, that ſuch marriages had increaſed "and incouraged Popery in the kingdom, and had "given opportunity to Prieſts and Jeſuits to propa-"gate their opinions, and ſeduce great numbers of "his Majeſty's ſubjects. 3. They greatly " fear this may be an occaſion to leſſen the affec- " tions of the people to his Royal Highneſs, who " is ſo nearly related to the crown, and whoſe " honor and eſteem they deſire may always be in- " tirely preſerved. 5. That for another age more " at leaſt, this kingdom will be under the continual " apprehenſions of the growth of Popery, and the " danger of the Proteſtant religion. Laſtly, they " conſidered, that this Princeſs having ſo near a " relation and kindred to many eminent perſons of " the court of Rome, may give them great op- " portunities to promote their deſigns, and carry " on their practiſes here, and by the ſame means " penetrate into his Majeſty's moſt ſecret counſels, " and more eaſily diſcover the ſtate of the whole " kingdom. And finding by the opinions of very " learned men, that it is generally admited, 'That " ſuch treaties and contracts by proxies are diſſolve- " able,' of which there are ſeveral inſtances to be " produced, they do in all humility beſeech his " Majeſty, to put a ſtop to the conſummation of " this intended marriage. And this they do the " more importunately deſire, becauſe they have " not, as yet, the happineſs to ſee any iſſue of his " Majeſty, that might ſucceed in the government " of his kingdom."—— To this addreſs the King briefly replied, " That it was a matter he would " take into his preſent conſideration, and would " ſpeedily return an anſwer." After which the commons proceeded farther, and voted the ſtanding army a grievance, and accordingly, prepared an addreſs to be preſented to his Majeſty, ſhewing, " That the ſtanding army was a grievance, and a " burden to the nation."

Vote againſt a ſtanding army. Echard, Vol. III. p. 337.

But the fourth of November, the day on which the commons were to preſent their addreſs, the King came unexpectedly to the houſe of peers, and ſent for the commons. It happened that the ſpeaker and the uſher of the black-rod met both in the door of the houſe of commons, but, as the ſpeaker was within the houſe, the door was immediately ſhut againſt the uſher, who came with the King's meſſage. The ſpeaker was forced into the chair, and while the uſher continued knocking at the door, the houſe voted, " 1. That the alliance with " France was a grievance. 2. That the evil coun- " ſellors about the King were a grievance." And " 3. That the duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, " and not fit to be truſted or imployed in any office " or place of truſt." Upon which there was a general cry, " To the queſtion! To the queſtion!" But the uſher of the black-rod knocking earneſtly at the door, the ſpeaker leaped out of the chair, and the houſe roſe in great confuſion. When the commons came to the houſe of lords, the King made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, in which he repreſented the great advantages which the enemy would reap from the leaſt appearance of a difference between him and his parliament.——He told them, he would not be wanting to let all his ſubjects ſee, " That no care ſhould be greater than his own in " the effectual ſuppreſſion of Popery." He then prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh day of January following, and thus put and end to the twelfth ſeſſion of this long parliament, which had ſate but nine days.

Other votes contrary to the King,

The parliament prorogued.

Immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, the King took the great-ſeal from the earl of Shaftſbury, and gave it to ſir Heneage Finch (1), with the title of lord-keeper. Soon after, the King ordered that no perſon who was a Roman Catholic, or reputed to be ſo, ſhould preſume to come near his perſon or court. He likewiſe publiſhed a proclamation for the rigorous execution of the laws againſt Papiſts. This was the eighth of the kind ſince his reſtoration, and executed as the other ſeven.

Proclamation againſt Papiſts.

But this proclamation was not capable to remove the fears occaſioned by the duke of York's marriage with the Princeſs of Modena, which was conſummated the twenty-firſt of November, on the day of her arrival in England with the ducheſs her mother (2).

January 14. Conſummation of the duke's marriage.

The parliament meeting the ſeventh of January, the King repreſented to both houſes,——" That " no propoſal of peace from the Dutch had been " yet offered with an intent to conclude, but only " to amuſe: that therefore the way to a good " peace, was to ſet out a good fleet, which there " was time enough to do effectually, if the ſupply " was not delayed.——That a ſpeedy, a pro- " portionable, and above all, a chearful aid, was " now more neceſſary than ever: he once more " put them in mind of his debt to the Goldſmiths: " and then told them, that his alliance with France " had been very ſtrangely miſrepreſented to them, " as if there were certain ſecret articles of dangerous " conſequence; but he would make no difficulty " of leting the treaties, and all the articles of them, " without any the leaſt reſerve, be ſeen by a ſmall " commitee of both houſes, who might report the " true ſcope of them."

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Echard.

Then the lord-keeper inlarged on all theſe points with exceſſive flattery to the King, for his extraordinary care to maintain the laws and religion, and that this might not be doubted, he alleged for proof, the aſſurances given by his Majeſty. Above all, he magnified the King's offer, of leting them ſee the treaties with France, as a condeſcenſion which could not be ſufficiently acknowleged, but by an extraordinary ſupply. In ſhort, the King's and the keeper's ſpeeches were founded upon this principle, that the war with the States was juſt and neceſſary, and conſequently to be vigorouſly ſupported, in order to obtain a peace both ſafe and honorable.

Speech of the keeper of the great-ſeal.

I do not find, that the two houſes much regarded the King's offer of laying before them his treaties with France, by reaſon it was in his power to ſhew them what he pleaſed, and ſuppreſs the reſt. His Majeſty perceived therefore, into what difficulties the Cabal had thrown him by their violent counſels. He had loſt the confidence of his people, and neither his words nor his promiſes were any longer credited. It was in vain for him to proteſt his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and the liberties of his ſubjects: theſe proteſtations could not obliterate his paſt conduct, which gave but too juſt cauſe to ſuſpect his ſincerity. Wherefore, the parliament, without regarding his words, conſidered his actions, and labored to take effectual meaſures, to prevent the execution of the court's deſigns, which were but too apparent. There were many things concerning which they openly expreſſed their fear and diſcontent. 1. The growth of Popery publicly incouraged by the court. 2. The exorbitant power of France, which in the end could not but prove prejudicial to England. 3. The Dutch war, undertaken directly contrary to the intereſt of England, and for which however the King was inceſſantly demanding ſupplies, on a ſuppoſition of its being juſt and neceſſary, tho' he had alleged for it no lawful cauſe. 4. The management of affairs in Ireland, where the act of eſtabliſhment was openly trampled on, and

CHARLES II. AN' 1673.

Papiſts continually advanced or incouraged. 5. The King's proceedings in England, which were clear evidences of his principles and deſigns; viz. his raiſing a land army without any neceſſity; his granting liberty of conſcience by his ſole authority; his ſhuting up the exchequer; his diſpenſing with acts of parliament; his making a ſtrict alliance with France, when he ſhould rather have uſed his indeavors to oppoſe the increaſe of its greatneſs. 6. The open profeſſion of the Popiſh religion by the duke of York, and his marriage with a Popiſh Princeſs, authoriſed by the King notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the parliament. 7. The three miniſters, ſtill imployed by the King, viz. Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, all three of the moſt arbitrary principles, plainly diſcovered, it was not for the good of the kingdom, that the King uſed their counſels. Theſe cauſes of complaint were too real, to be ſilenced by the King's general proteſtations, on every occaſion, to maintain the laws and religion. Something more ſubſtantial than words was neceſſary to diſpel the ſuſpicions and fears of the people and parliament. Wherefore the houſes reſolved to reſtore the government to its natural ſtate. This very parliament which had conſidered as execrable rebels the oppoſers of Charles I's uſurpations, was obliged to purſue the ſame meaſures againſt the incroachments of Charles II, as were begun by the parliament of 1640. If civil war was not the conſequence, it is to be aſcribed to the weakneſs, fears, or perhaps to the abilities of the King, who, leſs obſtinate, and more diſcerning than his father, did not think proper to abandon himſelf intirely to the counſels of his miniſters, and particularly of the duke his brother. For certainly, as the parliament ſtood affected, an extreme confuſion, if not a ſecond and more bloody inteſtine war, muſt have been the event of the King's attachment to his principles and deſigns. Nothing is more proper to confirm this conjecture, than the revolution in the reign of James II. That Prince, naturally more furious and obſtinate than his brother, reſolving to run all hazards, found the Engliſh, in their turns, as reſolute to venture all in the defenſe of their laws, religion and liberty.

The parliament's deſign.

A reflection upon it.

Addreſs of the lords for the removal of Papiſts. Kennet.

In order to proceed according to this plan, the houſe of lords preſented an addreſs to the King, praying him to iſſue out his Royal proclamation, requiring all Papiſts, and reputed Papiſts, to remove out of London and Weſtminſter, during the ſeſſion of the parliament. Accordingly his Majeſty publiſhed a proclamation without delay, dated the fourteenth of January, declaring, "That as he had "always manifeſted his zeal for the preſervation "of the true religion eſtabliſhed in this kingdom, "and to hinder the growth and increaſe of Popery, "ſo he was now ready, upon this occaſion, to pre-"vent all fears and dangers that might ariſe by the "concourſe of perſons of that profeſſion, in or near "the cities of London and Weſtminſter, &c." This pretended zeal had ſhewed itſelf but in eight proclamations, already publiſhed by him at ſeveral times againſt the Papiſts, the negligent execution of which is very viſible from the number. When the King's affectation of boaſting continually his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and againſt Popery, is conſidered; and when, on the other hand, it is remembered, that he had abjured the Proteſtant religion, and had a chapel ſecretly in his palace, where he daily heard maſs, and ſometimes even communicated the ſame day at both Proteſtant and Popiſh chapels, one knows not what to think of ſuch monſtrous diſſimulation.

A proclamation upon it. Ibid. Echard, Vol. III. p. 345.

CHARLES II. AN' 1673.

The next day, both houſes joined in an addreſs to the King for a general faſt, to implore God's bleſſing againſt the efforts of Popery, &c. Nothing was more offenſive to the King than ſuch addreſſes, which plainly implied, that religion was in danger, and thro' his fault; but he durſt not refuſe them, and therefore the fourth of February was appointed for a day of humiliation.

Addreſs of both houſes for a faſt. Ibid.

At laſt, the commons taking his Majeſty's laſt ſpeech into conſideration, voted, "That the houſe "will in the firſt place proceed to have their grie-"vances effectually redreſſed; the Proteſtant reli-"gion, their liberties and properties effectually "ſecured; and to ſuppreſs Popery, and remove "all perſons and counſellors Popiſh affected, or "otherways obnoxious or dangerous to the go-"vernment." Then they preſented an addreſs to the King,——"That the militia of the city of "London, and county of Middleſex, might be "in readineſs at an hours warning, and the mi-"litia of all other counties in England at a days "warning, for ſuppreſſing of all tumultuous inſur-"rections which might be occaſioned by Papiſts or "any other male-contented perſons." The King anſwered to this addreſs, "That he would take a "ſpecial care, as well for the preſervation of their "perſons, as of their liberties and properties."

A mortifying vote to the King. Id. p. 346.

An addreſs.

His anſwer.

This addreſs was only an intimation to the people, that the kingdom was in danger, and to juſtify beforehand the meaſures intended to be taken by the houſe, againſt thoſe who were conſidered as the principal authors of this danger, I mean, the members of the Cabal. By the death of lord Clifford, and the earl of Shaftſbury's change, this council was reduced to three, viz. the dukes of Buckingham and Lauderdale, and the earl of Arlington. The houſe began with the duke of Lauderdale, and unanimouſly voted, "That an addreſs ſhould be pre-"ſented to his Majeſty, to remove the duke of "Lauderdale from all his imployments, and from "his preſenſe and councils for ever, being a perſon "obnoxious and dangerous to the government."

Vote againſt the duke of Lauderdale. Ibid. Burnet.

The duke of Buckingham, while the commons were debating upon the heads of his accuſation, requeſted to be heard before their houſe, which was granted. But as his ſpeech in vindication of himſelf, was full of ambiguities, the houſe refered his examination to the next day, and drew up ſome queries, to which he was required to give direct anſwers. As theſe queſtions follow from what had paſſed, and tend to illuſtrate the hiſtory, I think myſelf obliged to inſert them, without adding his anſwers, the greateſt part of which left things as obſcure as they were before (1).

January 13. Burnet.

1. Whether any perſon declared to his grace any ill advice or purpoſes againſt the liberties and privileges of the houſe of commons, or to alter the government; who they were, and what they adviſed?

2. Some words fell from your grace yeſterday, wherein you were pleaſed to ſay, you had got nothing, but others had goten three, four, or five hundred thouſand pounds; who were they that had goten theſe ſums, and by what means?

Queſtions propoſed to the duke of Buckingham. Echard, Vol. III. p. 347.

His anſwer to this was,——That he was not at all acquainted by what means they got ſo much: that the duke of Ormond had got five hundred thouſand pounds, which was upon record; that lord Arlington had not got ſo much, but had got a great deal.

(1) The firſt day of his being before the houſe, he fell into ſuch diſorder, that he pretended he was taken ill, and deſired to be admited again. Next day he was more compoſed. He juſtified his own deſigns, laying all the ill counſels upon others, chiefly the lord Arlington, intimating plainly, that the root of all errors was in the King and Duke. He ſaid, hunting was a good diverſion, but if a man would hunt with a brace of lobſters, he would have but ill ſport. He had applied this ſaying to Prince Rupert and lord Arlington; but now it was underſtood to go higher. Burnet, p. 367.

Charles II. An' 1673.

3. By whoſe advice was the army raiſed, and monſieur Schomberg made general (1)?

4. By whoſe advice was this army brought up to awe the debates and reſolutions of the houſe of commons?

5. Who made the triple alliance?

6. Who made the firſt treaty with France, by which the triple alliance was broken?

He anſwered, I made it.

7. By whoſe advice was the exchequer ſhut up, and the order of payment there broken?

8. Who adviſed the declaration in matters of religion?

9. Who adviſed the attacking the Smyrna fleet before the war was proclaimed (2)?

10. By whoſe advice was the ſecond treaty at Utrecht?

11. By what counſel was the war begun without the parliament, and thereupon the parliament prorogued?

12. By whoſe advice was the parliament prorogued the fourth of November laſt?

I do not think fit to inſert all the duke's anſwers, becauſe it is not juſt to prejudice the reader againſt thoſe, whom, to clear himſelf, the duke of Buckingham accuſed. But the queſtions are very proper to ſhew, what it was that the commons blamed in the conduct of the King and Cabal. They were ſo little ſatisfied with the duke's anſwers, that they paſſed the ſame vote againſt him as againſt Lauderdale.

The commons, it ſeems, chiefly intended to ruin the earl of Arlington, ſince, notwithſtanding his defenſe before the houſe, they drew up an impeachment againſt him, conſiſting of ſeveral articles. But this impeachment was not purſued, I do not think it juſt to mention the articles ſince I cannot alſo inſert what the earl could urge in his defenſe. I ſhall therefore only add, that this impeachment chiefly concerned the open protection, granted to the Catholics by the earl of Arlington as ſecretary; and ſome actions tending to promote arbitrary power, or his own private intereſt (3).

The earl of Arlington impeached. Id. p. 349.

A bill for a teſt. Id. p. 350.

The commons after this, proceeded to prepare a bill for a general teſt, by which every perſon refuſing to take it, ſhould be made incapable to injoy any office civil or military; to ſit in either houſe of parliament; or to come within five miles of the court. The teſt was in theſe words:

The teſt.

"I do ſolemnly, from my heart, and in the "preſenſe of Almighty God profeſs, teſtify and "declare, that I do not believe in my conſcience "that the church of Rome is the only Catholic "and Univerſal Church of Chriſt, out of which "there is no ſalvation; or that the Pope hath any "juriſdiction or ſupremacy over the Catholic "church in general, or over myſelf in particular; "or that it belongs to the ſaid church of Rome "alone to judge of the true ſenſe and interpretation "of the Holy Scriptures; or that in the Holy Sa"crament of the Euchariſt, there is made a perfect "change of the whole ſubſtance of the bread into "Chriſt's body, or of the whole ſubſtance of the "wine into Chriſt's blood, which change the ſaid "church of Rome calleth Tranſubſtantiation; or "that the virgin Mary, or any other ſaint ought "to be worſhipped or prayed unto: and all theſe "aforeſaid doctrines and poſitions, I do renounce "and diſclaim, as falſe and erroneous, and con- "trary to God's word, and the Chriſtian religion." Charles II. An' 1673.

It was not without reaſon that this oath was called the teſt or trial, ſince it was as a touch-ſtone to diſtinguiſh the Papiſts from the Proteſtants, there being no Catholic who could in conſcience take this oath. The King had already given his conſent to an act which impoſed much the ſame oath: but that was only for thoſe who were in office or imployment, whereas this was univerſal, and might be required of all ſuſpected perſons. But, before the bill was ready, the King prorogued the parliament, and ſo defeated both this, and ſeveral other bills tending to the ſame purpoſe.

The States make propoſals to the King for a peace. Baſnage, Vol. II. p. 458. Echard. Burnet.

The States-General knowing that the parliament approved not of the war the King was making on them, never ceaſed ſolliciting his Majeſty to a ſeparate peace (4), and had offered him whatever he could reaſonably expect, in ſuppoſing he deſigned the advantage of his kingdom. But as that was not the caſe, it is plain, their offers could not ſatisfy him. To content him, the commonwealth of the ſeven provinces ſhould have been intirely deſtroyed, and the King of France put in poſſeſſion. But as he durſt not openly avow this demand, he pretended to find in the offers of the States, only ambiguous or inſolent propoſitions, and from thence took occaſion to reject them.

The King begins to fall in his pretenſions.

But afterwards affairs took a turn which obliged him to come into other meaſures. The victories he hoped for at ſea, with the aſſiſtance of France, came to nothing. If his fleet was not beaten in the four late ingagements, at leaſt, it had gained no advantage over that of the Dutch. He had expected to give the States a mortal wound by a deſcent into Holland, and for that purpoſe had ſent for Schomberg to head his forces. But that general had been unſucceſsful in his expedition, and obliged to return without any thing done. The King of France, as I ſaid, had been forced to abandon his conqueſts in Holland, to defend himſelf againſt the new enemies raiſed him by the States. In ſhort, the parliament diſcovering the ſecret intent of this war, not only refuſed any farther ſupplies, but were preparing to bring the adviſers to juſtice. On the other hand, the King had managed the money granted by parliament, and that of the exchequer, with ſo little oeconomy, that he had not one ſhilling left. His profuſion had been ſo exceſſive, that it appeared, from orders counterſigned by the earl of Arlington ſecretary of ſtate, that he had given away above three millions ſterling, to ſeveral private perſons. In a ſhort, he knew not which way to turn himſelf for the continuance of the war, as he ſaw his parliament little inclined to furniſh the means. All theſe reaſons were very capable to induce him to liſten to the offers made him by their High Mightineſſes. He therefore by degrees began to diſcover, that he ſhould not be averſe to a reaſonable peace, provided the States would have ſuch regard to his honor as he had room to expect.

The States commiſſion the Spaniſh embaſſador at London to make a peace in their name. Baſnage. Temple. Echard. Kennet.

When there was no other difficulty, the States wrote him a very ſubmiſſive letter, and at the ſame time ſent full powers to the marquis del Freſno, the Spaniſh embaſſador at London, to conclude a peace in their name, on the conditions before offered, but rejected by the King, on pretenſe they were only deſigned to amuſe him. Theſe propoſals were ſo reaſonable, and offered in ſo ſolemn a manner, that they could not be rejected without alarming the whole nation, and confirming the ſuſpicions, which were but too general, that this war was not deſigned for the advantage of the people. Beſide, the King's affairs required a ſpeedy pacification (1).

(4) The States, ſays Burnet, commited a great error in deſiring this peace, without deſiring at the ſame time, that King Charles ſhould enter into the alliance for reducing the French to the terms of the triple alliance. But the Prince of Orange thought, that if he could once ſeparate the King from his alliance with France, the other point would ſoon be brought about. p. 366.

The King aſks advice of the parliament. Echard, Vol. III. p. 351.

The King, preſently after the receit of the States letter, came to the parliament the twenty-fourth of January, and communicated to both houſes the offers made by the Dutch, deſiring their advice on this affair. They anſwered, that it was their opinion, his Majeſty ſhould proceed in a treaty with the States, in order to a ſpeedy peace. From that time, all difficulties relating to the peace were removed, in the conferences between the marquis del Freſno, and the King's commiſſioners (2), and the treaty was concluded in a fortnight (3).

Peace concluded.

The commons go on with examining into grievances. Echard.

During this ſhort interval, the commons proceed to take into conſideration the nation's grievances. They inſiſted chiefly on keeping an army compoſed of regular troops, and after a vote that it was a grievance to the kingdom, they reſolved to addreſs his Majeſty for diſbanding all forces raiſed ſince the year 1663. The examination of this affair gradually led them to that of the horſe and foot guards, eſtabliſhed by the King without the concurrence or approbation of the parliament. It was found, that they were of vaſt charge to the King and kingdom; that they were a ſtanding army in diſguiſe, which might be eaſily augmented: that guards were only uſeful in arbitrary governments; that they were altogether inſignificant, as appeared from the King's daily truſting his perſon to his people without a guard.

The King acquaints the parliament with the peace. Kennet. Echard.

This debate was interrupted by the King's coming to the houſe of peers, the eleventh of February. The commons being ſent for, the King communicated to both houſes, that he had ſigned the peace with the Dutch. He told them moreover, in anſwer to their addreſs concerning the forces, that he had given orders for diſbanding even more than were deſired, and for ſending back the Iriſh regiments. He added, that he muſt needs acquaint them, that there was a great want of capital ſhips, and he ſhould be glad to be equal in number with his neighbors: He hoped therefore to have their aſſiſtance on ſuch an occaſion, to preſerve the honor and ſafety of the nation. The houſes thanked him for the peace he had made, and for his gracious anſwer to their addreſs.

He deſires a ſupply.

Grievances relating to Scotland and Ireland. Echard.

However this was not capable to induce the commons to ſuſpend their debates upon the grievances. They voted, "that a commitee ſhould be appointed to inſpect the laws lately made in Scotland, whereby, an army is authorized to march into England or Ireland, by the ſole direction of the council of Scotland; and peruſe ſuch other laws as tend to the breach of the union of the two nations." In a grand commitee they likewiſe reſolved, that a commitee ſhould be appointed to inſpect the ſtate and condition of Ireland, more eſpecially with regard to religion, the militia, and the forces of that kingdom. They moreover appointed another commitee. —— "To inſpect the law, and to conſider how the King might commit any ſubject by his immediate warrant, as the laws then ſtood; and to report their opinions;" and farther, "They were to conſider how the law then ſtood touching the commiting of perſons by the council-table, and to report the ſame." On this occaſion they ordered a particular bill to be brought in, concerning writs of Habeas Corpus, which was read three times, and paſſed the houſe. A bill was likewiſe ordered to be brought in for a teſt to be taken by the members of both houſes.

Charles II. An' 1673.

The Habeas Corpus.

The King mortified.

It was a great mortification to the King to ſee the commons ſo rigorouſly examining his conduct; for all their reſolutions, in this ſeſſion, pointed to the former proceedings of the court. It may well be imagined, that as the project of the Cabal was to render the King abſolute, and advance the intereſts of Popery, the King and his miniſters had not been very ſcrupulous to gain firſt one point, and then another, in order to eſtabliſh precedents, and put his Majeſty in poſſeſſion of arbitrary power, in things which were not equally obvious to all. As the commons proceeded, it plainly appeared, they were reſolved not to omit any point. The King therefore to defeat their deſigns, made uſe of his conſtant method, and coming to the parliament the twenty-fourth of February, prorogued it to the tenth of November following, before any bill was ready for the Royal aſſent. Thus ended the thirteenth ſeſſion of this parliament, after ſitting ſix weeks and three days. The prorogation was afterwards continued, and laſted about fourteen months.

The peace is proclaimed. Collect. of Treaties, Vol. III. p. 277.

The peace was proclaimed the twenty-eighth of February in London, with much greater demonſtrations of joy and ſatisfaction from the people, than the war had been two years before. The ſole difference between this peace and that of Breda was, that the ſhips and veſſels belonging to the Dutch, whether ſingle or in fleets, ſhould ſtrike the flag, and lower their top-ſail to thoſe of England (4), provided they carried the King's flag. Moreover the States were to pay the King eight hundred thouſand patacoons, at four payments, viz. two hundred thouſand on the exchange of the ratifications, and the reſt at three payments, within the ſpace of three years. Thus the people of England diſcharged the expenſe of this war, and the King alone reaped the advantage (5).

An' 1674. The King abandons himſelf to his pleaſures. Burnet.

The King finding himſelf freed from the cares of war, and the uneaſineſſes cauſed by the parliament, abandoned himſelf intirely to a ſoft, indolent, and effeminate life. The ducheſs of Orleans his ſiſter had brought him, at their interview at Dover, the daughter of a gentleman of Bretagne, called de Queroüalle, who commanded the King's affection

And that it might have ſome ſhew of a peace both begged and bought, he propoſed, that a ſum of money ſhould be offered the King by the States, which ſhould be made over by him to the Prince, for the payment of the debt he owed him. Rouvigny, the French embaſſador, preſſed the King much to give his parliament all ſatisfaction in points of religion. The King anſwered him, if it was not for his brother's folly (la ſottiſe de mon frere) he would get out of all difficulties. In concluſion, the Prince of Orange brought the States to make applications to the King, in the ſtile of thoſe who begged peace, tho' it was viſible they could have forced it, with the offer of two or three hundred thouſand pounds for the expenſe of the war, p. 366, 367.

beyond any of his miſtreſſes, and was created dutcheſs of Portſmouth. But his particular fondeſs for her did not prevent his having many others, by whom he had ſeveral children, educated with no ſmall expenſe. In ſhort, not to dwell on what paſſed at a court ſo corrupted as that of Charles II, I ſhall only ſay, that the King's miſtreſſes had ingroſſed the whole credit of the court, and that he granted whatever they required.

Governed by his miſtreſſes.

It does not appear, that Lewis complained much of Charles for deſerting him, in making a ſeparate peace with the Dutch. This cauſed ſeveral politicians to imagine, that the King of France had given full conſent to this peace, in order to make Charles mediator between him and his enemies, whoſe number, ſince the laſt year, was greatly increaſed. This ſuſpicion is farther confirmed by Charles's offering his mediation to the King of France, ſoon after his peace with the States, which he readily accepted, without ſhewing the leaſt reſentment of what had been lately tranſacted. When the King was ſatisfied that his mediation was accepted by France, he ſent ſir William Temple into Holland to offer the ſame to the States. As their towns and provinces were now recovered, except Maeſtricht and Grave, they paſſionately wiſhed for peace. The only obſtacle was, the intereſt of their allies, the Emperor, the Empire, and Spain, who having ingaged in the war for their ſervice, could not be abandoned without extreme ingratitude. The only way to pleaſe them, was to bring matters to a treaty, where they might find their ſatisfaction. So without being over ſollicited, they accepted the King of England's mediation. It is true, France and the allies, had already accepted that of the King of Sweden, who had uſed his indeavors to procure a peace by his embaſſadors at the congreſs of Cologne. But ſince that congreſs was broken off by the forcible carrying away of Prince William of Furſtemberg (1), the Swede had rendered himſelf ſuſpected to the allies, by diſcovering too much partiality to France. So the States were not diſpleaſed in finding another mediator to renew the conferences, tho' they had no great reaſon to confide in King Charles. But they were deſirous of peace, and ſuch was the ſituation of the affairs of Europe, that to find another mediator would be difficult. Wherefore, it was more advantageous to accept him, than to have none at all, and loſe the hope of terminating the war. Nevertheleſs, they ſo ſtrongly ſollicited all the Princes their allies, that at laſt they were induced to accept the King of England's mediation. But there was a wide difference between agreeing upon a mediator, and concluding a peace. So many various intereſts to adjuſt, made it eaſy to ſee, that peace would be a very difficult work; beſide the accidents which the continuation of the war might produce, and which would be too apt to alter the pretenſions of the two parties. For inſtance, while a mediation of peace was talked of at the Hague, a battle was fought at Seneff, which indeed decided nothing, but might have had great conſequences, if victory had intirely declared for one of the armies (2). Moreover, the Prince of Orange took Grave in October.

and bring their allies to do the ſame.

Aug 1ſt. Temple. Burnet.

I cannot forbear taking notice of a thing which became more public afterwards, and of which I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more fully, viz. that at the very time Charles performed the office of a mediator, he received from France an annual penſion of one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. By this we may judge of his impartiality. Moreover, it appears in Coleman's letters, the duke of York's ſecretary (3), ſome of which were wrote this year, that there was a cloſe union between the King of France, and the duke of York, and that the latter intirely relied on the aſſiſtance of France for the execution of the project formed in favor of the Engliſh Papiſts. This manifeſtly ſhews, that Charles had not deſiſted from his firſt deſigns, and only waited a favorable opportunity to execute them, when France, diſcharged from the burden of this preſent war, ſhould be in a condition to grant him the neceſſary aſſiſtance.

During theſe tranſactions, the Papiſts of England were laboring to prevail with the King to diſſolve a parliament which was ſo oppoſite to them; this alſo appears in Coleman's letters. But his Majeſty did not think it adviſeable to take ſuch a ſtep ſo ſoon, which might have done him great prejudice, by exaſperating the people, and from which he could reap no other advantage, than to procure ſome eaſe for the Papiſts. But this was not his principal aim. For tho' he was a diſguiſed Papiſt, he had ſo little zeal for religion, that he was by no means inclined to hazard his temporal intereſts, in complaiſance to the Popiſh party. He publiſhed therefore on the contrary, a proclamation, to ſtifle the falſe report that the parliament would quickly be diſſolved, and thereby to ſatisfy the people that the thing had never come under deliberation.

May. Echard, Vol. III. p. 364.

To finiſh the events of this year 1674, I ſhall only take notice of ſome particulars which may be of uſe in the ſequel. In September, the earl of Arlington was made lord chamberlain of the King's houſhold, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, who had been plenipotentiary at the congreſs of Cologne, was made ſecretary in his ſtead. On the other hand, the duke of Buckingham, who had been the King's principal favorite, loſt his favor and credit to ſuch a degree, that his Majeſty, without any ceremony, gave him a public affront, in declaring his office of chancellor of Cambridge vacant, and in influencing the election in favor of his natural ſon the duke of Monmouth.

The earl of Clarendon died this year at Roan in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, after an exile of ſeven years; during which he digeſted the memoirs he had collected to compoſe his Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars of England. The famous John Milton, author of the poem called Paradiſe Loſt, died alſo this year (4),

Of the five members of the Cabal, only the earl of Arlington, and the duke of Lauderdale remained about the King. Accordingly, he was the firſt who adviſed the King to call in his declaration for liberty of conſcience, and when he ſaw the parliament acting with ſuch vigor to break the meaſures of the court, he affected an extraordinary zeal for the Proteſtant religion. He was conſtant at ſermons and ſacraments, and carried his diſſimulation ſo high, as to perſecute the Papiſts, whom he had till now protected. Some even ſay, he adviſed the King to remove the duke of York from his court. But if, by theſe proceedings, he gained any favor with the people, he loſt it with the King and duke, who no longer confided in him as before. The King had particularly ſhewn he was diſpleaſed with him, by giving the treaſurer's ſtaff to ſir Thomas Oſborne, afterwards earl of Danby, which had ever been Arlington's ambition. This rendered the two earls mortal enemies to each other, and cauſed them to labor each other's deſtruction. The earl of Arlington, ſeeing that his enemy daily gained ground on him, imagined he might recover his former credit and favor by performing a ſignal ſervice for the King; which was, to ingage the Prince of Orange to enter into the meaſures of the Engliſh court, for procuring ſuch a peace as was deſired by the courts of France and England. As his counteſs was mr. Odyck's ſiſter, who was much in the Prince's confidence, he imagined, that with the aſſiſtance of Odyck, and his other relations and friends, it would be eaſy to ſucceed in the ſcheme he had projected. Wherefore, he obtained the King's leave to go to the Hague to execute his deſign. But as he was ignorant of the temper, humor, and character of the Prince of Orange, he took that very courſe to gain him which he ſhould have avoided. He indeavoured to vindicate all the proceedings of the Cabal and Engliſh court, by reaſons ſo weak and oppoſite to truth, that he ſeemed in his diſcourſe to the Prince, to think he had to deal with a perſon ignorant of the moſt common affairs, which could not but offend him. But what gave him the greateſt diſtaſte was, that he attempted to draw him into a diſcovery of the Engliſh lords, with whom he had held a ſecret correſpondence during the laſt war. In a word, this journey proved ſo unſucceſsful, that he loſt not only the Prince of Orange's eſteem, but all his credit with the King. Beſide, he farther incured the duke of York's hatred, by propoſing to the Prince, without any ceremony, as it is ſaid, a marriage with the Princeſs Mary, the duke's eldeſt daughter, which was afterwards accompliſhed. It ſeems, the duke foreſaw how fatal that marriage would be to him. After the earl's return to court, his credit ſo viſibly declined, and the King ſhewed it ſo openly, that the courtiers made no ſcruple, for his Majeſty's diverſion, to mimic him in his preſenſe. Thus had the earl of Clarendon been uſed. It is ſaid, that colonel Talbot, afterwards earl of Tyrconnel, having been ſome time abſent from court, and on his return ſeeing the earl of Arlington one day acted by a perſon with a black patch on his noſe, and a white-ſtaff in his hand, could not forbear reproaching the King with his ingratitude, in ſuffering a man to be thus unworthily treated, who had ſerved him ſo faithfully, as well in his exile, as ſince his reſtoration; to which his Majeſty in excuſe replied, that he had no reaſon to be ſatisfied with the earl's conduct; "For, not content to come to prayers "as others did, he muſt be conſtant at ſacraments "too." Why, anſwered Talbot, "Does not your "Majeſty do the very ſame thing? God's fiſh! "replied the King with ſome heat, I hope there "is a difference between Harry Bennet and Me."

The King remains fixed to his firſt projects.

This ſhews, the King had changed neither inclination nor principles ſince his deſigns had appeared to be ruined. The truth is, he was not pleaſed with the members of the Cabal, tho' he did not diſlike their counſels, but their not having purſued the general deſign with ſufficient ability. Sir William Temple in his memoirs relates, that before he departed to offer the King's mediation to the States, he indeavored, in a private audience, to make the King ſenſible how ill adviſed and how ill ſerved he had been by the Cabal; to which the King anſwered----"It is true, I have ſucceeded ill; but if "I had been well ſerved, I might have made a "good buſineſs enough of it:" and ſo proceeded to juſtify what was paſſed. His Majeſty is therefore to be conſidered, at the time I am ſpeaking of, that is, during the fourteen months interval between the two ſeſſions, as waiting a favorable opportunity for the better executing his deſigns. And this opportunity was not to be found till France ſhould be at peace with her enemies, and in a condition to aſſiſt her ſecret ally. In the mean time, the King ſeems to have had no other buſineſs, than to get as much money as he could from his parliament. He began therefore, according to cuſtom, with publiſhing a proclamation againſt Popiſh prieſts and jeſuits, to prepare the parliament's favorable aſſiſtance.

The thirteenth of April, the fourteenth ſeſſion of this parliament began. The King opened it with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them—— "That the principal end of his calling them now, "was to know what they thought might be wanting to the ſecurity of religion and property, and "to give himſelf the ſatisfaction of having uſed "his utmoſt indeavors to procure and ſetle a right "underſtanding between him and his parliament--- "For he muſt tell them, that he found the contrary was ſo much labored, and the pernicious "deſigns of ill men had taken ſo much place under "ſpecious pretenſes, that it was high time to be "watchful in preventing their contrivances, of "which this was not the leaſt; that they indeavored, by all means they could deviſe, to make "it impracticable any longer to continue this preſent parliament —— That he had done as much "on his part as was poſſible to extinguiſh the "fears and jealouſies of Popery; and would "leave nothing undone that might ſhew the world "his zeal to the Proteſtant religion as eſtabliſhed "in the church of England, from which he would "never depart. He then recommended the con"dition of the fleet, which he was not able, he ſaid, "to put into that ſtate it ought to be, and which re"quired a conſiderable ſum of money as well to "repair as to build. Laſtly, he told them, that "the ſeaſon of the year would not permit a long "ſeſſion ——— That he intended to meet them "again the next winter, and in the mean time "recommended to them all, ſuch temper and mo"deration in their proceedings, as might tend to "unite him and them in counſel and affections, "and diſappoint the expectations of thoſe, who "could only hope, by violent and irregular mo"tions, to prevent the bringing the ſeſſion to a "happy concluſion."

The commons thanked the King for his ſpeech and promiſes to preſerve their religion and liberties: but as he had given them only proclamations, the little efficacy of which was well known, they held them inſufficient, and accordingly proceeded to a new bill againſt the growth of Popery, and particularly Popiſh prieſts, that is, ſuch as had received orders from the ſee of Rome.

This done, the commons preſented a long addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, in which they ſaid,—— "That upon a ſerious examination "of the ſtate of the kingdom, they found, that "ſome perſons in great imployment under his "Majeſty, had fomented deſigns contrary to the "intereſt of both his Majeſty and his people, in"tending to deprive them of their ancient rights "and liberties, among which was the duke of "Lauderdale " Lauderdale (1), this was clearly pointing at the " Cabal. That he had openly affirmed in the pre- " ſenſe of his Majeſty ſiting in council, and before " diverſe of his ſubjects attending there, ' That his " Majeſty's edicts ought to be obeyed; for his " edicts are equal with laws, and ought to be " obeyed in the firſt place.' They then repre- " ſented to his Majeſty ſome acts which had been " made by the parliament of Scotland, by which " it appeared, that there was a militia ſetled in " that kingdom of twenty thouſand foot, and two " thouſand horſe, ' who were obliged to be in a " readineſs to march into any part of this kingdom, " for any ſervice wherein his Majeſty's honor, au- " thority, and greatneſs may be concerned; and " were to obey ſuch orders and directions, as they " ſhall from time to time receive from the privy- " council there,' and that the duke of Lauderdale " was the promoter of this act. That by this " means England was expoſed to an invaſion from " Scotland under any pretenſe whatſoever, while " the duke of Lauderdale was intruſted with the " adminiſtration of that kingdom. For theſe rea- " ſons, they humbly beſought his Majeſty to re- " move the ſaid duke for ever from his perſon and " council." The King did not think fit to grant this requeſt, and gave ſome reaſons for his refuſal, which were not ſatisfactory to the commons. And therefore they reſolved to prepare againſt the duke a ſecond addreſs.

and refuſed by the King.

The earl of Danby's conduct examined by the commons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 378. Burnet.

The commons, after attacking the old members of the Cabal, proceeded againſt a new one, viz. the lord treaſurer Danby, who was believed to be deeply ingaged in the project of making the King abſolute. They examined his whole conduct ſince his admiſſion into that high poſt, and drew up ſeveral articles, in which they accuſed him of great miſdemeanors. In one of theſe articles, he was accuſed of ſaying at the hearing of a cauſe in the treaſury-chamber, " That a new proclamation is " better than an old act." But as ſufficient proofs could not be found to ſupport the charge, it was droped.

From theſe proceedings of the commons, it may be eaſily infered, that they were extremely jealous of the King and his miniſters, and doubted not of the court's intention to introduce Popery, and invade the liberties of the ſubject. Thoſe who would wholly aſcribe the ill humor of the commons to Shaftſbury's influences, can hardly anſwer the abovementioned facts, which would not be leſs true, tho' the earl of Shaftſbury had never been born.

The King is deſired by the commons to call home his forces from France; which he refuſes. Echard.

The commons ſhowed alſo their diſtruſt in another point, which to the King was no leſs grievous. By an addreſs they prayed him to recal his troops out of France, and prevent his ſubjects from ingaging in that ſervice for the future. The King rejected the firſt part of the addreſs, on pretenſe that, in the treaty concluded with the States, he had not ingaged to recal thoſe troops, and that it could not be done without prejudice to the peace, which he now injoyed, with all his neighbors: but by a proclamation he prohibited his ſubjects from entering into the ſervice of France.

The lords afraid that the commons are going too far. Kennet, p. 332. Echard.

While the commons were thus proceeding with vigor, and giving on all occaſions ſignal marks of their diſtruſt, the lords remained idle, and ſeemed regardleſs of the fears and jealouſies expreſſed by that houſe. Nay ſome, particularly the biſhops, obſerving that the commons were gradually departing from the principle which had been eſtabliſhed by this ſame parliament, as well concerning the church of England, as the Royal authority, feared they would lean too much to the oppoſite ſide. At the begining of this parliament, while it was believed that the King was and ever would be a protector of the church of England, and would give continual proofs of his affection for a people who had ſo generouſly reſtored him, it was thought the Royal authority could not be carried too high, nor too many precautions taken againſt the Non-conformiſts. But the face of affairs being changed, and the King having ſhown by his conduct ſince his acceſſion to the throne, that he really deſigned to introduce Popery, and render himſelf abſolute, theſe ſame principles, which had been conſidered as a bulwark to defend both church and ſtate, appeared too apt to countenance the deſigns aſcribed to the King and his miniſters, of invading the government and the eſtabliſhed religion. The commons therefore ſeeing the King was not the perſon he appeared to be, and that he took advantage of the acts made in his favor to advance his own intereſts, which were not thoſe of the nation, uſed all poſſible precautions to hinder the execution of his deſigns. Theſe precautions went ſo far, that the houſe of lords were at laſt apprehenſive, that the commons intended to overturn every thing eſtabliſhed concerning the Royal prerogative and the church's ſecurity, and that by degrees the nation would again become Republican and Preſbyterian. It is pretended the biſhops were all or moſt of them of this opinion. To prevent an evil which to them appeared very dangerous, * the earl of Lindſey brought into the houſe of lords a bill, intitled, " An act to prevent the dangers which may ariſe " from perſons diſaffected to the government." By this bill all perſons who injoyed any office eccleſiaſtical, civil or military, all privy-counſellors and members of parliament, were obliged, under a penalty, to take the oath which had been introduced firſt in the corporation act, then in the militia act, and afterwards more fully in the five mile act. The oath, to ſave the reader the trouble of looking for it elſewhere, was thus expreſſed, " I do " declare that it is not lawful upon any pretenſe " whatſoever to take up arms againſt the King; " and that I do abhor the traiterous poſition of " taking arms by his authority againſt his perſon, " or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him, " in purſuance of ſuch commiſſion: and I do ſwear, " that I will not at any time indeavor the alteration " of the government either in church or ſtate. So " help me God."

* Robert Bartu. Bring a bill into their houſe to check their deſigns.

When this oath was inſerted in the three forementioned acts, it produced no conſiderable debate, for the reaſons I have been ſpeaking of; but the caſe was very different when it was propoſed in this ſeſſion. Firſt, becauſe it was rendered in a manner univerſal, ſince it was extended to all perſons in any office whatever, and even to privy-counſellors and members of parliament. Secondly, becauſe the times were altered, and moſt men had not the ſame opinion of the King, as when the three former acts were made. This bill occaſioned debates in the upper houſe, which laſted ſeventeen days, without a poſſibility of coming to any concluſion (2). There were two powerful parties in the houſe, one for, and the other againſt the bill, and the biſhops votes turned the ſcale on the ſide of the firſt. This appeared in that notwithſtanding all the efforts of the oppoſers of the bill to hinder its being refered to a commitee, they could not ſucceed. Whereupon ſome lords of that party entered their proteſtation againſt it (1). The ſame thing happened when the bill came to be examined in a commitee of the whole houſe. In fine, with regard to the ſubſtance of the bill, the two parties diſplayed all their art and eloquence, the one for the paſſing, and the other for rejecting it. In general, thoſe who argued for the bill maintained, that "the poſition "of taking up arms by the King's authority againſt "his perſon, or againſt thoſe that are commiſſioned by him," was falſe and pernicious; and they ſupported their opinion by inſtances of what had been done in the laſt reign, where it cauſed ſuch great diſorders, and occaſioned the ſubverſion both of church and ſtate. They ſaid therefore, that the kingdom ſtill abounding with Fanatics, Republicans, and enemies of the church, it was abſolutely neceſſary to impoſe this oath upon them, to diſtinguiſh them, that it might be known who were to be guarded againſt. That otherwiſe there was danger of ſeeing one day renewed, the diſorders which had reduced the kingdom to ſo deplorable a condition, and that the oath injoined by this bill, was, "a moderate ſecurity to the church and "crown (2)."

Burnet, p. 383.

Kennet, p. 332.

The other party maintained (3), "That the "oath impoſed by this, contained three clauſes, "the two firſt aſſertory, and the laſt promiſſory; "that it was worthy the conſideration of the biſhops, whether aſſertory oaths, which are properly appointed to give teſtimony of a matter "of fact, of which a man is capable to be aſſured "by the evidence of his ſenſes, be lawful to be "made uſe of to confirm or invalidate doctrinal "propoſitions; and whether that legiſlative power, "which impoſes ſuch an oath, does not neceſſarily "aſſume to itſelf an infallibility. And as to promiſſory oaths, it was deſired, that the learned prelates would conſider the opinion of Grotius de "jure belli & pacis, lib. ii. cap. 3. who ſeems to "make it plain, that thoſe kinds of oaths are forbidden by our Savior Chriſt, Matt. v. 34, 37. "And whether it would not become the fathers of "the church, when they have well weighed that "and other places of the New Teſtament, to be "more tender in multiplying oaths, than hitherto "the great men of the church have been?" But the queſtion being put, the oath was voted by the majority of the houſe, the biſhops being all for it.

The bill paſſes. Echard, Vol. III. p. 381.

Then they proceeded to the particulars of the oath contained in the bill, and it was alleged by the oppoſers, that the poſition of "taking arms by "the King's authority againſt his perſon," was true and neceſſary in a limited government, like that of England, otherwiſe this would be to ſurrender the rights and liberties of the ſubject, to a Prince, who being ſuppoſed a tyrant (which was a very poſſible caſe) would not be reſtrained by the fear either of God or man. That ſhould ſuch a future King undertake to aboliſh all the laws, and invade the eſtates and liberties of his ſubjects, they would be obliged, by this oath, not to reſiſt him, but to ſubmit to his yoke. That even without ſuppoſing ſuch a tyranny, a King might happen to be made priſoner by his own ſubjects, as was the caſe of Henry III and Henry VI, and then thoſe who ſhould have the Sovereign in their hands, might act in his name and authority, by virtue of his commiſſion, while the ſubjects would be reſtrained by the obligation of this oath from indeavoring to free him from captivity. In a word, ſeveral other probable caſes were alleged, by which it was evidently proved, that the oath ought neceſſarily to have ſome reſtrictions, if it was not intended to ſurrender to the King all the liberties of the nation. But as ſuch reſtrictions could not be eaſily expreſſed, they concluded, it was much better, to leave the oath in generals, which ſhould not comprehend all poſſible caſes, as ſeemed to be the intention of this oath, from the terms in which it was conceived.

Charles II. An' 1675.

This buſineſs was interrupted by an accident which raiſed between the two houſes a violent conteſt. The particulars I ſhall not relate as they ſuppoſe a knowledge of many things concerning the privileges of both houſes, with which few foreigners are acquainted. I ſhall content myſelf with briefly ſhowing the occaſion. One dr. Shirley having brought an appeal in the houſe of lords, from a decree in chancery, againſt ſir John Fagg, a member of the houſe of commons, they ordered Shirley to be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms for a breach of privilege. The warrant for taking Shirley into cuſtody was forcibly taken from the ſerjeant's deputy, by the lord Mohun. The commons demanded juſtice of the peers againſt the lord Mohun, and were anſwered, that he had done only his duty. The quarrel thus begun, daily increaſed, ſo that both houſes, in their anſwers and replies, came to language ſo reproachful, that there was no hope of an accommodation (4). Wherefore the King, on the ninth of June, came to the houſe of peers, and prorogued the parliament to the thirteenth of October. Thus ended the fourteenth ſeſſion of this parliament, before the money bill, and other public bills were ready for the Royal aſſent. The commons had deſigned to grant the King three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling (5), but at the ſame time reſolved to apply the ancient tonage and poundage to the maintenance of the navy, according to its original deſign, which amounted to four hundred thouſand pounds a year. As his Majeſty would have been a real ſufferer by ſuch an appropriation, he was not uneaſy at having ſuch an opportunity to prorogue the parliament, chuſing rather to be deprived of a ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds, than loſe a revenue of four hundred thouſand.

It muſt be obſerved that this bill was contrived by the church party, and was diſliked by the duke, and the Papiſts in general, becauſe they thought the bringing any teſt in practiſe, would certainly bring on one that would turn them out of the houſe.

Intrigues for the diſſolution of the parliament. Id. p. 390.

In England, ſince the laſt ſeſſion, there were ſome intrigues at court to ingage the King to diſſolve the parliament. The Preſbyterians earneſtly wiſhed it, hoping that the people, diſſatisfied with the court, would, as uſually happens, chuſe repreſentatives who had other principles than thoſe of the preſent parliament. The Papiſts had paſſionately deſired this diſſolution before the laſt ſeſſion, but, as it appears in one of Coleman's letters of Auguſt this year, they had altered their mind, and expected much from this very parliament which had hitherto been ſo averſe to them. But it is not ſeen on what this hope was founded. I ſhall hereafter mention this and ſome other letters of Coleman, in which it evidently appears, that the Papiſts were at this time very active to procure great advantages to their religion, and relied much on the duke of York, and the aſſiſtance of France.

The parliament opened with a ſhort ſpeech from the King. Kennet, p. 333. Echard.

October thirteen, the King opened the fifteenth ſeſſion of this parliament with a very ſhort ſpeech, in which, after recommending union to both houſes, and the intereſts of the church of England, he demanded money, as well for building ſhips, as for taking off the anticipations upon his revenues, deſiring them to remember, it was now above three years ſince he aſked any thing of them for his own private uſe.

The keeper's ſpeech.

Then the lord keeper made a ſpeech full of flattery to the King, in which he indeavored to ſhow, that no King had ever a more ſincere affection for his ſubjects, or labored with more zeal for the preſervation of religion and liberty, and therefore it was not to be doubted, but they would behave themſelves like thoſe who deſerved to be called his Majeſty's friends, and that they would likewiſe ſet him at eaſe.

The commons reſume the interrupted bills. Id. p. 393.

But the commons, inſtead of being moved by ſo unſeaſonable rhetoric, and by ſuch ill grounded reaſons, reſumed the conſideration of the bills left unfiniſhed the laſt ſeſſion, for the liberty of the ſubject, and added others for its better ſecurity.

Examine the public accounts. Id. p. 394. Burnet.

Afterwards they took into conſideration the ſums granted to the King for the laſt war, and the expenſes thereof, and found, that the charges amounted to a million leſs than the receit, without being able to diſcover to what uſes this million had been applied (1).

In the report made of this affair, it was ſaid, that the parliament was not obliged to pay the King's private debts by a tax, for if this pretenſion was admited, they would have the like debts to pay about a year and half hence, and thereby incourage the court to exact yearly a million and half, as they had hitherto done: that ſince the end of the war, the whole charge of the government, both by ſea and land, amounted not to above ſeven hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, and the clear income of the revenue came at leaſt to ſixteen hundred thouſand, and conſequently there ought to have been a yearly remainder of near a million: and yet the King had anticipated his revenues near a million more, to pay which would be to intail perpetual anticipations upon the kingdom, to its utter ruin and deſolation. The parliament therefore reſolved to grant the King nothing for taking off theſe anticipations. Nevertheleſs, a few days after they voted a ſupply of three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling for the building of twenty large ſhips of war (2), but withal reſolved to appropriate tonage and poundage to the uſe of the navy, which could not but be very diſagreeable to the King.

An attempt of a jeſuit. Kennet, p. 337. Echard, Vol. III. p. 396.

The debates of the commons were a little interrupted, by a report made to the houſe of the inſolence of a French jeſuit named St. Germain. This jeſuit being informed, that one Luzancy a French prieſt had imbraced the Proteſtant religion, and afterwards had publicly preached to juſtify his converſion, went to him, and, threatening to aſſaſſinate him, or carry him away by force into France, extorted from him a recantation in writing of his converſion and ſermon. This was done during the ſeſſion of parliament. A complaint was laid before the ſecretaries of ſtate, and alſo before the commons, atteſted by Luzancy, with an addition of the following particulars, which he offered to ſwear. That father St. Germain in ſeveral conferences with him declared: 1. That the King was a Roman Catholic in his heart. 2. That the court were indeavoring to get a liberty of conſcience in England for the Roman Catholics, and that granted, in two years, moſt of the Engliſh would acknowlege the Pope. 3. That he knew the King's intentions concerning religion, and that he was ſure his Majeſty would approve of all he ſhould do in that matter. 4. That he laughed at the parliament, as being only a wave that had but a little time; and ſaid, that no body was better welcome at court, and had greater intrigues with any of the nobility than he. 5. That it was good ſometimes to force people to heaven; and that there was an infinite number of prieſts and jeſuits in London, that did God very great ſervice. Luzancy added farther, that many perſons of good credit and repute, were ready to juſtify upon oath, that ſeveral of the Roman Catholics had ſpoken things quite as bad or worſe. In ſhort, that they were grown ſo bold and inſolent, that a proſelyte could not walk the ſtreets without being threatened and called opprobrious names.

This affair threw the houſe into a ferment, and obliged the King to publiſh a proclamation, promiſing two hundred pounds for the apprehending of St. Germain. But that jeſuit was now retired into France, from whence he held a conſtant correſpondence with Coleman the duke of York's ſecretary, in whoſe letters it appeared, that the duke labored the advancement of Popery with the utmoſt aſſiduity.

I have before taken notice how much this parliament had been againſt the Preſbyterians, and that the diſcovery of the court's deſigns had induced them to bring in a bill for their relief, but that the bill became abortive by a ſudden prorogation of the parliament. The affair of Luzancy and St. Germain cauſed the commons to think of a like bill, but they were prevented by the lords. The duke of Buckingham having in a ſpeech to the peers ſhown the miſchiefs ariſing from perſecuting the Proteſtant Diſſenters, deſired leave to bring in a bill for their eaſe, which was granted immediately.

A bill brought into the houſe of lords, in favor of Non-conformiſts. Echard.

But this bill, and all the reſt prepared by the commons, were unhappily ſtifled in their birth by the revival of the former conteſt between the two houſes. This diſpute about privileges was managed with ſuch warmth on both ſides, that it was moved in the houſe of lords, to preſent an addreſs to the King to diſſolve the parliament, and the queſtion being put, it paſſed in the negative by only two voices. At length, his Majeſty ſeeing no expedient could poſſibly be found to reconcile the two houſes, prorogued the parliament from the twenty-ſecond of November to the fifteenth of February 1677, that is, for fifteen months.

The quarrel between the houſes revived.

The parliament prorogued. Kennet. Echard.

I ſhall cloſe this year with ſome leſs important tranſactions, which ought not to be omited.

In May, the Prince of Newburg came into England, and was received with great marks of diſtinction by his Majeſty, as well on account of his perſonal merit, as in conſideration of the civilities received by the King in his exile from the duke his father.

The Prince of Newburg arrives in England. Kennet. Echard.

The ducheſs of Mazarine having a difference with her huſband, retired into England this year, where it is pretended, ſhe would have ſupplanted the ducheſs of Portſmouth (1), had not an intrigue with a certain courtier been too ſoon diſcovered to the King. However he aſſigned her a penſion of four thouſand pounds ſterling annually. Her houſe, to the day of her death, was the rendezvous of all the men of wit and quality, and St. Evremond, a refugee as well as herſelf, was one of her moſt conſtant attendants.

And the Ducheſs of Mazarine.

The nineteenth of December, Heneage lord Finch, baron of Daventry, who had been lord keeper, was made lord high chancellor.

Finch made lord chancellor.

The moſt remarkable deaths were thoſe of dr. Lightfoot, dr. Willis, and Bulſtrode Whitelock (2). The laſt has been frequently mentioned in the recital of the differences between Charles I, and the parliament.

Deaths. Ibid.

As the parliament was not to meet next year, the Catholics and the court which openly protected them, were leſs reſerved, and appeared more active. This gave great uneaſineſs to the people, who, beſide, ſaw with concern the growing greatneſs of Lewis XIV, and the indolence of Charles, who, inſtead of being diſturbed or jealous, ſeemed to behold it with pleaſure. It may be affirmed, that the principal article of Charles II's reign conſiſts, in the perpetual oppoſition between the particular intereſts of the King and thoſe of the Engliſh nation. All the world ſaw and were ſenſible of it. It was the common talk, and the ſubject of daily libels. His Majeſty therefore by proclamation ſuppreſſed all coffee-houſes, on pretenſe of being places where diſaffected perſons met, and deviſed malicious and ſcandalous reports againſt the King and his miniſters. Immediately after was publiſhed another proclamation, for diſcovering and puniſhing the authors, who daily publiſhed libels in London againſt the government. But it is ſeldom found, that ſuch proclamations produce any great effects, eſpecially in England, where the liberty of ſpeaking or writing againſt the government is more unreſtrained, than in any other country.

Proclamation againſt libels.

Tho' laſt year all the contending powers had conſented to ſend their plenipotentiaries to Nimeguen, to treat of a peace, by the mediation of England, there was no great likelihood of a general pacification. Sir William Temple and ſir Leoline Jenkins, the Engliſh mediators and embaſſadors, repaired to Nimeguen in July, and only found there the plenipotentiaries of France, and thoſe of the States-general. The Emperor, the King of Spain, the Elector of Brandenburg, retarded the negociations, as much as poſſible, in hopes, that the King of England, being concerned in the preſervation of the Netherlands, would not ſuffer them to fall under the dominion of France, and that this would ingage him in the end to declare for the allies. But they were extremely miſtaken in imagining that the intereſt of England was that of the King. It was this that made the proceedings of the Engliſh court always unintelligible to them, as well as to the reſt of the Princes of Europe, who were ignorant of Charles's ſecret deſigns, and his ingagements with the French King.

AN' 1676.

At the begining of the campain of 1676, the King of France took Conde and Bouchain, after which, in June, he returned to Paris, leaving his army under the command of the count de Schomberg. On the other ſide the Prince of Orange beſieged Maeſtricht towards the end of July, which gave Schomberg opportunity to take Aire, and march to the relief of Maeſtricht. His approach and ſome other accidents obliged the Prince to raiſe the ſiege.

Baſnage. Echard.

The campain being ended, all eyes were turned to the negociations at Nimeguen. It was ſoon apparent, that the deſign of France was only to divide the allies, and make a ſeparate peace with the States. The King of England had alſo the ſame view, and therein aſſiſted France with all his power, having ſent orders to ſir William Temple, to indeavor to perſuade the States, and the Prince of Orange, to give their conſent. The States were inclinable enough, but the Prince of Orange could not be prevailed with, who thought, it would be a betraying of the common cauſe, and the intereſt of the Princes, who had ingaged in the preſervation of Holland, which, without their aſſiſtance had been irrecoverably loſt. He ſaid, it was in his uncle's power to oblige the French to peace when he pleaſed by declaring againſt them. But nothing was farther from Charles's intention, who, inſtead of being jealous of the King of France, was privately doing him all the ſervice he could, in ſolliciting the States, and his nephew the Prince, to make a ſeparate peace.

He indeavors to disabuse the confederate Princes. Echard, Vol. III. p. 404.

The hope entertained by the allies, that England would at last declare against France was the greatest obstacle to a pacification. The King not being ignorant of it, believed he ought to undeceive the allies, in order to induce them to make such a peace as the French King desired. For this reason, he published two proclamations, in which, on pretense of regulating some things concerning the neutrality, his design was to show he had no intention to depart from it.

French privateers molest the English. Kennet, p. 338, &c.

As the King had made peace with Holland, the French privateers infested the Channel in such a manner, that without any regard to the neutrality of England, they seized its ships, and, as if in open war, made them prizes (1). It was proved, that they had taken fifty-three since the peace. Finally, the thing went so far, that the commissioners of trade were obliged to present a report concerning these indignities, to the King, and to pray him that he would take some course to prevent it. His Majesty very graciously received this report, and sent orders to his embassadors at Paris to make complaints on this occasion; but that was all the satisfaction the merchants could obtain (2). For the French court knowing that Charles would not break with them for fifty-three ships belonging to private men, regarded not these complaints. The King's indolence produced at least this effect, that the people of England, inraged to see themselves thus exposed to the piracies of the French, were extremely desirous of a war with that nation, in order to be revenged, and impatiently waited the meeting of the parliament, in belief that both houses would be more careful, than the King, of the interest of his kingdom.

The English desirous of a war with France.

Proclamation against Papists, &c. Echard, Vol. III. p. 406.

Nothing memorable happened the remaining part of this year, except a proclamation published by the King, forbiding his subjects to hear mass in the Queen's chapel in Somerset house, or in the houses of embassadors. These proclamations were always expressed in very rigorous terms; but executed with such negligence, that the frequency of them only served to shew, how little desirous the King was to have his orders strictly observed. They were usually a preparative to the next session, but during the intervals of parliament, the Romish priests and jesuits, who swarmed in the kingdom, and all other Papists, were sure of impunity.

A question started whether the parliament was not dissolved. Kennet. Echard. Burnet, p. 401. R. Coke.

The King, as I said, had prorogued the parliament for fifteen months, a few days only excepted. This prorogation, the longest ever known, raised a doubt, whether by it the parliament was not actually dissolved. This question was owing to the statute of Edward III, never repealed, whereby it was inacted, that a parliament should be held once every year, and oftner if occasion required. This dispute made a great noise in the kingdom, and books were published on both sides. The court party in general maintained, that the parliament was not dissolved, and the contrary party pretended it could not meet, after a fifteen months interruption. I believe the interest of neither party was herein much concerned, tho' perhaps some private persons might have found some advantage in a new parliament.

Charles II. An' 1676.

The King's speech to the parliament. Echard.

The parliament however met the fifteenth of February according to the prorogation. The King in his speech to both houses declared, "That he "was prepared to give them all the satisfaction "and security in the great concerns of the Protestant religion, as established in the church of "England, that should be reasonably asked, or "could consist with Christian prudence. And "he declared himself as freely, that he was ready "to gratify them in a farther security of their "liberty and property (if they could think it was "wanted) by as many good laws as they should "propose, and as could consist with the safety of "the government, without which there could be "neither liberty nor property left to any man." After, this, imagining he had given both houses intire satisfaction, he told them, "That he ex-"pected and required from them, that all occa-"sions of differences between the two houses "should be carefully avoided.——In the next "place, he desired them to consider the neces-"sity of building more ships, and how much all "their safeties were concerned in it.——And, "as they knew him to be under a great burden "of debts, he hoped, they would not deny him "the continuance of the additional revenue of "excise, which was near expiring.——And, "that they might be satisfied how impossible it "was (whatever some men thought) to support "the government with less than the present re-"venue, they might at any time see the yearly "established charge, by which it would appear, "that the constant and unavoidable charge being "paid, there would remain no overplus towards "the discharging those contingencies which might "happen in all kingdoms, and which had been "a considerable charge to him the last year."

The chancellor's speech. Echard, Vol. III. p. 412.

Then the chancellor inlarged on all these points; but as his speech was wholly founded upon this unquestionable truth, according to him, that the King had only the welfare of his people at heart; I shall transcribe only this single passage.——"For "the King hath no desires but what are public; "no ends or aims which terminate in himself; "all his indeavors are so intirely bent upon the "welfare of his whole dominions, that he doth "not think any man a good subject, who doth "not heartily love his country: and therefore let "no man pass for a good patriot, who doth "not heartily love and serve his Prince. Pri-"vate men indeed are subject to be misled by "private interests, and may entertain some vain "and slender hopes of surviving the public; but "a Prince is sure to fall with it, and therefore "can never have any interests divided from it. "To live and die with the King, is the highest "profession a subject can make, and sometimes "it is profession only and no more; but in a "King it is an absolute necessity, it is a fate in-"evitable, that he must live and die with his "people. Away then with the vain imaginations "of those who infuse a misbelief of the govern-"ment; away with all those ill meant distinc-"tions between the court and the country, be-"tween the natural and political capacity; and "let us all who go about to persuade others, "that there are several interests, have a care of "that precipice, to which such principles may "lead them."

and made a very long ſpeech, to prove, that the parliament was diſſolved by the laſt prorogation. He grounded his opinion upon ancient ſtatutes "which "(he ſaid) are not like women, the worſe of being "old," and chiefly upon the ſtatute of Edward III, viz. "That a parliament ſhould be holden every "year once, and more often, if need be." He added, "tho' theſe words are as plain as a pike-"ſtaff, and no man living, that is not a ſcholar, "can poſſibly miſtake their meaning, yet the gram-"marians in thoſe days made a ſhift to explain, that "the words, 'if need be,' related as well to the "words, 'every year once,' as to the words, "'more often,' and ſo by this grammatical whim-"ſey of theirs, have made this ſtatute to ſignify "nothing. For this reaſon in the thirty-ſixth year "of the ſame reign, a new act of parliament was "made, in which thoſe unfortunate words, 'if "need be,' are left out, and that act, relating to "Magna Charta, and other ſtatutes, made good. "Here now, my lords, there is not left the leaſt "color for any miſtake, for it is plainly declared, "'That the Kings of England muſt call a parlia-"ment once within a year." Then he reduced the whole matter to this dilemma. "Either the Kings "are bound by theſe acts, or elſe the government "of England by parliaments is at an end. For if "the Kings have power, by an order of theirs, to "invalidate an act made for the maintainance of "Magna Charta, they have alſo power, by an "order of theirs to invalidate Magna Charta it-"ſelf." It appears by the ſequel of this ſpeech that the duke of Buckingham's aim was to put an end to this parliament, which had continued ſo long, and thereby rendered the commons, in ſome meaſure, ſovereigns over their countrymen. The duke was ſeconded by the earls of Saliſbury and Shaftſbury, and the lord Wharton. At laſt, after great debates, the houſe ſent all four to the Tower (1), from whence they were ſhortly after releaſed, except the earl of Shaftſbury, who was continued there above a year, becauſe he would not own the juſtice of his impriſonment (2).

Shortly after, the commons voted the King a ſupply of five hundred and eighty-four thouſand pounds, to build thirty ſhips, without appropriating tonage and poundage. Beſide, they continued for three years the additional tax upon beer, which was to expire the twenty-fourth of June.

It ſoon after appeared, that their grand affair was to ſtop the great progreſs of France in the Netherlands, and ingage the King in a war with that kingdom, to which end, they preſented the following addreſs:

The commons addreſs the King againſt France. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 417, &c. Burnet. R. Coke.

"We your Majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects, do "moſt humbly offer to your Majeſty's conſidera-"tion, that the minds of your people are much diſ-"quieted with the manifeſt dangers ariſing to your "Majeſty, by the growth and power of the French "King, eſpecially by the acquiſitions already made, "and the farther progreſs like to be made by him "in the Spaniſh Netherlands, in the preſervation "and ſecurity whereof we humbly conceive the in-"tereſt of your Majeſty, and the ſafety of your "people, are highly concerned; and therefore we "humbly beſeech your Majeſty to take the ſame "into your Royal care, and to ſtrengthen yourſelf "with ſuch ſtricter alliances, as may ſecure your "Majeſty's kingdoms, and ſecure and preſerve the "ſaid Spaniſh Netherlands, and thereby quiet the "minds of your Majeſty's people." To which the King anſwered,——"That he was of the opi-"nion of his two houſes of parliament, that the pre-"ſervation of Flanders was of great conſequence; "and that he would uſe all means in his power for "the ſafety of his kingdom."

CHARLES II. AN' 1676.

His anſwer.

This anſwer not being ſatisfactory, the houſe preſented a ſecond addreſs on the ſame ſubject the thirtieth of March. It was much the ſame with the firſt, excepting the addition, that in caſe his Majeſty ſhould happen to be ingaged in a war with France, they ſhould always be ready to aſſiſt him with ſuch ſupplies, as might inable him to proſecute the ſame with ſucceſs.

AN' 1677. A ſecond addreſs.

The King gave no anſwer to this addreſs till twelve days after, when he ſent a meſſage, "That "the only way to prevent the dangers which might "ariſe in theſe kingdoms, would be to put him "timely in a condition to make ſuch fiting prepa-"rations, as might inable him to do what ſhould "be moſt for their ſecurity."

The King's anſwer.

This drew from the commons a third addreſs to the King, in which they informed him, that they were preparing a bill for "the additional duty of "exciſe," on which he might borrow two hundred thouſand pounds, and promiſed to give him ample teſtimony of their affection at their next meeting, after a ſhort receſs during Eaſter. The King not ſatisfied with ſo ſmall a ſum, told them plainly, that without ſix hundred thouſand pounds, it would not be poſſible for him to anſwer the ends of their ſeveral addreſſes.

A third addreſs.

The King's anſwer.

Many members being abſent on account of the expected adjournment at Eaſter, the commons were cautious of proceeding upon other money bills; but deſired his Majeſty's leave to adjourn, promiſing, after the receſs, they would comply with his demands. The ſame day, the ſixteenth of April, the King came to the houſe of peers, and gave his aſſent to ſeveral acts. The chief were, 1. An act for the raiſing of five hundred and eighty-four thouſand pounds ſterling, for building of thirty ſhips. 2. An act for an additional exiſe upon beer, and other liquors, for three years. 3. An act for preventing of frauds and perjuries. 4. An act for taking away the writ 'de Hæretico Comburendo. 5. An act for erecting a judicature to determine differences touching houſes burned by the late dreadful fire in Southwark (3). Then the chancellor acquainted the two houſes, that his Majeſty gave them leave to adjourn to the twenty-firſt of May next.

Acts paſſed. Statute-b. Kennet.

The King, undoubtedly, had no deſire to begin a war with France, his private ingagements with Lewis being too ſtrong for him to harbor ſuch a thought. However he improved the preſent occaſion to draw money from his parliament, on pretenſe of providing for the ſafety of the nation. For that was all he had yet obliged himſelf to, tho' the commons imagined, he was ready to come into their meaſures, as ſoon as he ſhould be aſſured of a ſupply. The vigor with which the commons acted, was owing to the progreſs of Lewis in the Netherlands and on the Rhine, while Charles, plunged in pleaſures, remained unconcerned, and by his con-

After this defeat, the citadel of Cambray and St. Omers, ſurrendered by capitulation, about the twentieth of April. By this means the Spaniſh Netherlands were open on all ſides, and could not be preſerved but by the aſſiſtance of England. This was clearly ſeen by the commons, and excited their indeavors to awaken the King out of his affected lethargy. His Majeſty knew the danger as well, or better than, his parliament. But contrary to his chancellor's maxims, the kingdoms danger was not his. The more powerful the King of France rendered himſelf, the greater was his private advantage, becauſe it was by the aſſiſtance of France, that he intended to inſlave his own kingdom. by the good of his kingdom. But he had a particular intereſt directly contrary to that of England, viz. his own, which he blindly purſued. He would have ſeen the laſt town of the Spaniſh Netherlands loſt without being moved. Nevertheleſs, as it was alſo his intereſt not to diſcover his deſigns before the time, for fear of alarming the Engliſh, and ingaging the parliament in other meaſures, he pretended to approve of their views. But this was only to obtain a ſupply, without promiſing any thing but to make preparations, which properly was obliging himſelf to nothing at all. Such was the King's conduct in this whole affair, as will appear ſtill more plain in the ſequel.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 424.

The parliament meeting the twenty-firſt of May, by the King's proclamation of ſummons, after an adjournment of near five weeks, the commons believed his Majeſty had ſpent this interval in making the alliances they had deſired, and that he would communicate to them what had been done. But meſſage occaſioned warm debates in the houſe. They were inclined to give the King the ſix hundred thouſand pounds he had aſked, but were willing to have ſomething for their money; whereas the King was for being ſure of the ſupply before he proceeded in what was deſired by the commons. Their diſtruſt was not very honorable to him, but it was his fault, becauſe he had given ſo many occaſions for it, and therefore he could not think it ſtrange. He made it however ſubſervient to his deſign, and pretended in his turn to fear, that the commons intended to ingage him in a war with France, and then leave him to extricate himſelf as well as he could, without granting the neceſſary aſſiſtance for its ſupport. On this pretenſe he ſent for the commons to Whitehall, and made then the following ſpeech:

Gentlemen,

Charles II. An' 1677.

The King's ſpeech to the commons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 425.

"I Have ſent for you hither, that I might prevent thoſe miſtakes and diſtruſts, which I find ſome are ready to make, as if I had called you together only to get money from you, for other uſes than you would have it imployed. I do aſſure you, on the word of a King, that you ſhall not repent any truſt you repoſe in me, for the ſafety of my kingdoms, and I deſire you to to believe, I would not break my credit with you; but as I have already told you, 'That it will not be poſſible for me to ſpeak or act thoſe things which ſhould anſwer the ends of your ſeveral addreſſes, without expoſing my kingdoms to much greater dangers,' ſo I declare to you again, I will neither hazard my own ſafety nor yours, until I be in a better condition than I am able to put myſelf, both to defend my ſubjects, and offend my enemies. I do farther aſſure you, I have not loſt one day ſince your laſt meeting, in doing all I could for your defenſe, and I tell you plainly, it ſhall be your fault, and not mine, if your ſecurity be not ſufficiently provided for."

Remarks upon this ſpeech.

As this ſpeech, under general and obſcure terms, perfectly anſwered the King's ſecret intentions, it is abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome remarks, in order to ſhew, diſtinctly and plainly, both the King's intention and character.

Firſt, the commons had deſired the King to provide for the ſafety of his kingdoms, upon the foundation, that their ſafety depended on the preſervation of the Spaniſh Netherlands; but the King ſays not a word which may oblige him to the defenſe of the Netherlands, and contents himſelf with promiſing, upon his Royal word, that he will provide for the ſafety of his kingdom; which general promiſe left him room to ſay afterwards, that whatever he had done was for the kingdom's ſafety.

Secondly, he ſuppoſed, that in providing for this ſafety, his kingdoms would be expoſed to great dangers, unleſs he had the money beforehand, which was a groundleſs ſuppoſition.

Thirdly, he told them, he ought to be put in a better condition to defend his ſubjects, and offend his enemies. By this laſt expreſſion he inſinuated, that he would enter into a league offenſive againſt France, which was not his intention, as will hereafter plainly appear.

Fourthly, he told them, he had not loſt one day in doing all he could for their defenſe, which expreſſion ſignified nothing, ſince he had juſt told them, he could neither ſpeak nor act, before he had the demanded ſupply. In what therefore did his five weeks care conſiſt?

Fifthly, there is but one thing clear in this ſpeech, and that is, he would be ſure of the money before he began to act. By which he intimated to the commons, that he pretended to have as much reaſon to diſtruſt them, as they could have to diſtruſt him, tho' aſſuredly the caſe was very different.

Great debates among the commons. Ibid.

This ſpeech occaſioned very great debates in the houſe of commons. The court party propoſed a ſpeedy grant of the deſired ſupply, to inable the King to make alliances, otherwiſe, the making of them could not be expected, and alleged, that the King had the ſame power of making war and leagues, as the houſe had in giving money; he could not have money without them, nor they alliances without him. The contrary party remarked, that nothing poſitive was promiſed by the King, except that he would provide for the ſafety of the kingdom, which might be explained ſeveral ways, without any aſſurance it ſhould be underſtood in the ſenſe of the commons. As for ſaying that the King would make alliances when he ſhould have the ſupply, ply, the expreſſion was too general to hazard upon it a ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds. But if alliances were made forthwith, and declared to day, the ſix hundred thouſand pounds would be granted to morrow.

This laſt opinion prevailed, ſuch was the diſtruſt conceived of the King. So, the houſe reſolved to preſent an addreſs to his Majeſty, which ſhould oblige him to ſpeak more plainly, that they might know how to proceed. The ſubſtance of this addreſs was:

They addreſs the King. Echard, Vol. III. p. 426. Kennet. Burnet. R. Coke.

"It is a great affliction to us, to find ourſelves "obliged to declare againſt the granting the ſup- "ply you are pleaſed to demand, conceiving it "not agreeable to the uſage of parliaments, to "grant ſupplies for the maintenance of wars "and alliances, before they are ſignified in par- "liament; from which uſage if we depart, the "precedent might be of dangerous conſequence in "future times.——

"We humbly beſeech your Majeſty to enter in- "to a league offenſive and defenſive with the "States-General of the United Provinces, againſt "the growth and power of the French King, and "for the preſervation of the Spaniſh Netherlands, "and to make ſuch other alliances with other ſuch "of the confederates as you ſhall think fit and uſe- "ful to that end.——

"Laſtly, they laid before him ſeveral reaſons "to convince him, that, in this juncture, a war "with France was abſolutely neceſſary, in order "to oblige her to leave the reſt of Chriſtendom in "repoſe, and promiſed to put him in a condition "for a vigorous maintenance of the ſame."

The King continues to feign a diſtruſt of the commons.

Had Charles really intended to ſtop the great progreſs of the French King, this addreſs would have been more than ſufficient to ingage him in a war with that Prince, or at leaſt to have done ſomething to give him apprehenſion of it. But as nothing was farther from his thoughts, he affected a diſtruſt of the commons, which he really had not. He had undertaken the firſt war againſt the States, upon a like aſſurance without the leaſt heſitation. He had ingaged in the ſecond war without even imparting his deſign to the parliament. But when a war with France was deſired, he pretended to fear from the commons, what he had not feared when a war with Holland was in queſtion; tho' it was manifeſt this fear was intirely groundleſs. But any delay was to be uſed rather than retard the progreſs of his good friend, and yet he was unwilling to loſe this opportunity of procuring a ſupply from his parliament.

Complains of the addreſs. Kennet, p. 342. Echard. R. Coke. * Two days after.

By their laſt addreſs the commons pretended to oblige the King to give a clear anſwer. But they found themſelves miſtaken. The King received this addreſs the twenty-ſixth of May, ſent * for the commons to Whitehall, and for anſwer ſharply reproved them for invading his prerogative, in requiring him to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with the States-General, "Should I, ſaid "he, ſuffer this fundamental power of making "war and peace to be ſo far invaded, as to have "the manner and circumſtances of leagues pre- "ſcribed to me by parliament, no Prince or State "would any longer believe, that the ſovereignty "of England reſts in the crown.——Wherefore "you may reſt aſſured, that no condition ſhall "make me depart from ſo eſſential a part of the "Monarchy." At the concluſion of this ſpeech he declared his pleaſure to them, that the houſe be adjourned to the ſixteenth of July (1), telling them, he would give them notice by his proclamation when he intended they ſhould ſit again; which, he ſaid, would not be till winter, unleſs ſome extraordinary occaſion ſhould happen.

Adjourns the parliament.

Nothing is a plainer demonſtration, how different the King's intereſts were from thoſe of his kingdom, than his conduct on this important occaſion. The commons believed it abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, to check the progreſs of the French King, and preſerve the Netherlands, and to that end, make alliances with the States-General and their confederates. This was a very evident truth. The King himſelf did not deny it, while there was hope of geting the ſix hundred thouſand pounds, demanded on pretenſe of puting himſelf in a condition to defend the kingdom, which ſhewed at leaſt that he believed it in danger: but when he ſaw the commons would not be ſatisfied with general promiſes, and required ſomething real, the neceſſity of puting the kingdom in a ſtate of defenſe, vaniſhed at once. He adjourned the parliament for ſeveral months, without any notice of the danger with which the kingdom was threatened, tho' that danger ſubſiſted no leſs than at the begining of the ſeſſion. Thus the danger was preſſing to the kingdom, when it was no longer ſo to the King: a clear evidence that the King and parliament had different views and intereſts. So, on pretenſe of the commons infringing on his prerogative, he took occaſion to order a long adjournment, which broke all the meaſures of that houſe, and almoſt deſtroyed the hopes entertained by the allies of aſſiſtance from England, which could not but be very advantageous to France. I do not think it poſſible to demonſtrate the King's conduct in a manner ſatisfactory to the impartial, without ſuppoſing that he expected aſſiſtance from France to make himſelf abſolute, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. On this ſuppoſition, inſtead of being concerned to ſtop the progreſs of the French, it could not but be for his intereſt that they ſhould ſtill become more powerful. Accordingly this was what he wiſhed, as all his proceedings evidently teſtified.

CHARLES II. AN' 1677.

The King uſes his indeavors for a ſeparate peace. Temple's Mem. p. 448, 450. Lett. p. 457.

From ſir William Temple himſelf we learn, that while he was at Nimeguen as plenipotentiary mediator for a peace, he was ſent for to London by the King, on pretenſe of making him ſecretary of ſtate, but in reality to diſpatch him to the Hague, to indeavor perſuading the Prince of Orange to conſent to a ſeparate peace with France. But Temple declined a commiſſion which he had before tried to execute, without being able to ſucceed. This ſhows with what zeal the King indeavored to ſerve France, which only wanted to divide the allies by ſuch an expedient. It is certain, the French King, tho' till now ſuperior to his enemies, was little able longer to ſuſtain a war with almoſt all Europe united againſt him. It was therefore in the King of England's power to procure a juſt and reaſonable peace, by declaring againſt France, as he was deſired by the parliament: but this could not be obtained of him. On the contrary, fearing to be forced to it at laſt by the clamors of his people, he ſecretly labored to procure France an advantageous peace, by the diviſion of her enemies.

Sir William Temple having refuſed to be imployed on this errand, mr. Laurence Hyde was ſent to the Hague, to try to gain the States and Prince of Orange.

ceſs Mary, eldeſt daughter to the duke of York; and he did not doubt, that to ſucceed in that affair, the Prince would comply to every thing deſired of him concerning the ſeparate peace with France. It was probably for this end, that the King permited the Prince his nephew to come to his court, and ſollicit his affairs in perſon: but without any poſitive aſſurance that his addreſſes would be well received. The Prince could not leave the army before the campain was ended, and therefore arrived not in England till the ninth of October, when he landed at Harwich, and from thence went to court. The King, the duke of York, the lord treaſurer, and ſir William Temple, were the only perſons informed of the motive of the Prince's journey. The court, which was then at Newmarket, being returned to London, the Prince had a ſight of the Princeſs, and then demanded her in form of the King and duke of York, by whom his propoſal was differently received. The duke of York ſeemed very cold, and the King appeared to imbrace it with joy: but it was on condition that he and the Prince ſhould previouſly agree upon the terms of a general pacification. This condition was like to render the Prince's journey intirely fruitleſs. The Prince was abſolutely againſt ſpeaking of a peace till after the marriage, and the King as reſolute to agree upon the plan of a peace before the marriage ſhould be concluded. They continued five or ſix days fixed to their reſolutions. The Prince acquainted the King, by ſir William Temple, "That his allies, who were like to have "hard terms of peace, as things then ſtood, would "be apt to believe, that he had made his match "at their coſt, and for his part he would never ſell "his honor for a wife." All this was not capable to divert the King from his reſolution, and the affair ſeemed upon the point of breaking off. But all was reconciled. Temple paying a viſit to the Prince one night after ſupper, was told by him, "That he repented his coming into England, and "reſolved to be gone in two days, if the King "continued in his mind of treating on the peace "before he was married; but that before he went, "the King muſt chuſe how they ſhould live hereafter; for he was ſure it muſt be either like the "greateſt friends, or the greateſt enemies; and "deſired ſir William to let his Majeſty know ſo "next morning, and give him account of what he "ſhould ſay upon it." Sir William, in diſcharge of his commiſſion, repreſented to the King the ill conſequences of a breach with the Prince, conſidering the ill humors of ſo many of his ſubjects on account of his ingagements with France, and the invitation made the Prince by ſeveral of them during the late war. The King having heard him with great attention, anſwered, "I never yet was deceived in judging a man's honeſty by his looks,--- "and if I am not deceived in the Prince's face, "he is the honeſteſt man in the world; and I will "truſt him, and he ſhall have his wife, and you "ſhall go immediately and tell my brother ſo, "and that it is a thing I am reſolved on." The duke of York appeared at firſt ſomewhat ſurprized, but however anſwered, the King ſhould be obeyed, and he ſhould be glad his ſubjects would learn from him the obedience which they owed to their Sovereign,---adding, "I tell him my opinion very "freely upon any thing, but when that is done, "and I know his pleaſure upon it, I obey him." Immediately after ſir William waited on the Prince with the agreeable news. The ſame day, the marriage articles were drawn and agreed, the Princeſs having forty thouſand pound ſterling aſſigned for her portion, and the day after the King declared the marriage in full council (1). The city of London teſtified an extraordinary joy at the news, and ſir Francis Chaplin the lord-mayor invited the King to a magnificent entertainment the twenty-ninth of October. The marriage was conſummated on the Prince's birth-day the fourth of November (2).

A few days after, the King and the duke of York, the Prince of Orange, the lord treaſurer, and ſir William Temple, entered into conference for ſetling the ſcheme of a general peace, and after ſome debates, agreed on theſe terms: "All ſhould "be reſtored by France to the Emperor, that had "been taken from him in the war, the duchy of "Lorrain, to that duke, and all on both ſides "between France and Holland: And to Spain, "the towns of Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, Tournay, Conde, Valenciennes, St. Guillain, and Binch. That the Prince of Orange "ſhould indeavor to procure the conſent of Spain; "and the King that of France, for which purpoſe he ſhould ſend ſome perſon immediately "over with the propoſition, who was to demand a "poſitive anſwer in two days." The lord Duras, afterwards earl of Feverſham, a creature of the duke of York's, was the perſon fixed on to execute this commiſſion.

Shortly after the Prince and Princeſs of Orange embarked for Holland. The King poſitively aſſured the Prince, he would never depart from the plan agreed on for a general peace, and that if France refuſed its conſent, he would declare war againſt that nation. And yet, the Prince had the mortification before his departure, to ſee the adjournment of the parliament prolonged from the third of December to the fourth of April (3).

(1) The French embaſſador, and lord Arlington, appeared the only two perſons unſatisfied upon it at court; the firſt, not knowing how he ſhould anſwer it to his maſter, that an affair of that importance ſhould paſs without his communication, much leſs advice, in a court where nothing had been done ſo, for many years; and the lord Arlington, that it ſhould paſs without his knowledge, who ſtill indeavored to keep up the court's opinion of his confidence with the Prince. Temple's Mem. p. 455.

(2) Burnet, in his account of this matter, ſays, that the lord treaſurer Danby ſeeing his ruin was inevitable, if he could not bring the King off from a French intereſt, gave the Prince of Orange, by ſir William Temple, great hopes of a marriage with the duke's daughter, and got the Prince to aſk the King's leave to come over to England. When the Prince, after a fruitleſs ſtay for ſome weeks, was going away, the lord Danby preſſed his ſtaying a few days longer, and that the management of the matter might be left to him. So, next morning he came to the King, and told him, he had received letters from all his Majeſty's beſt friends in England, and ſhewed him a bundle of them, which he was ſure the King would not trouble himſelf to read. They all agreed, he ſaid, that the King ſhould make a marriage between the Prince of Orange and the duke's daughter. If not, the parliament would certainly addreſs for it, and ſo the King would loſe the thanks of it. Whereas, if the King did it of his own motion, he would have the honor of it. Having inforced the thing with all the arguments he could, the King was convinced, and ſent for the duke, who obeyed the King's pleaſure. Danby ſo ordered the matter, that the ducheſs of Portſmouth could not ſpeak with the King, before he had declared the matter in council, p. 409, 410.

(3) The Prince and Princeſs were hurried out of town ſo faſt (there being a ſecret deſign to invite them to an entertainment in the city by the country party, which the court did not like) that they had ſcarce time to make proviſion for their journey. Being come to Canterbury, they repaired to an inn, where thro' haſte they came very meanly provided. Upon application to borrow money of the corporation, the mayor and his brethren, on grave deliberation, were really afraid to lend them any. Dr. Tillotſon, then dean of Canterbury, hearing of this, immediately got together what plate and money he could, and went to the inn to mr. Bentinck, with the offer of what he had. This was highly acceptable to the Prince and Princeſs, and the dean was carried to wait upon them. By this lucky accident, he began that acquaintance and correſpondence with the Prince and mr. Bentinck, as advanced him afterwards to the Archbiſhoprick.

The French Court was extremely ſurprized, as well with the ſcheme of the peace, as the manner in which it was pretended to be impoſed on them. But whether the lord Duras had ſecret orders to give hopes, that the ſcheme might be altered, or that gaining the King of England was not looked on as impracticable, the envoy, after ſtaying ſome days beyond his commiſſion, returned without an anſwer, or at leaſt with an anſwer of no ſignification. It contained only, "That the Moſt Chriſtian King hoped, his brother would not break with him upon one or two towns, to which England had no pretenſion, but however, he would ſend orders to his embaſſador at London, to treat with his Majeſty himſelf." It is known, the King of France offered mr. Montague, the Engliſh embaſſador, large ſums for the King and the treaſurer, which were not accepted, at leaſt openly; but on the other hand, the King ſuffered himſelf to be ſo mollified by the offers or articles of France, that the ſcheme of peace agreed on with the Prince of Orange, was at laſt reduced to nothing, and no more heard of.

Secret negociations with France. Danby's Lett.

From the return of the lord Duras to the meeting of the parliament; the King was actally negociating with the King of France, the terms on which he was to reſiſt the ſollicitations of his parliament, and prevent his declaring for the allies. This appeared openly in the parliament itſelf, by the letters of the lord treaſurer Danby, produced before the commons in 1678, by mr. Montague, embaſſador at the French court; and ſince that, a fuller conviction has been given of this by mr. Montague's letters, publiſhed by the earl of Danby, in the reign of William III. I ſhall tranſcribe the extracts of theſe letters, that the reader may be ſatisfied of what I ſay, without relying on my word. But I am to premiſe, that his Majeſty, after prolonging the adjournment to April 1678, thought proper to aſſemble the parliament the fifteenth of January, and as ſoon as they met, to adjourn the commons, by a meſſage to the twenty-eighth of the ſame month. The letters I mentioned were as follows:

Extract of a letter from mr. Montague to the King from Paris, in the year 1677.

"——I Am ſure, the greatneſs of the King of France is ſupported only by your Majeſty's connivance at what he does, and the good will Chriſtendom ſees you have for him. The advantage he has by it even in point of revenue, by his conqueſts, does amount to five times the ſum you have now from him: and tho' after games are hard to play, I think I underſtand this court ſo well, and if you care to have it done, I am confident I could get you, by agreement, a million of livres a year to be paid while the war ſhall laſt, and four millions after the peace ſhall be made, I mean, Sir, over and above what you have from France now.——

Extract of a letter from mr. Montague to the lord treaſurer Danby, writ a little after the former.

"I Expect his Chriſtian Majeſty's anſwer to the demands I made by the King's direction of two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, to be paid till the general peace is concluded, taking for granted that it will be conformable to my orders from the King, to inſiſt upon two millions of livres a year during the war, and four millions after the peace, or elſe two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling during the war. But I am told this morning, that mr. Courtin has agreed this matter with the King my Maſter; and that his Majeſty will be contented with two millions of livres a year only during the war; which I confeſs ſurprized me extremely, conſidering the neceſſity of his Majeſty's condition, and the poſitiveneſs of his commands to me, to inſiſt upon two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, which I had done very effectually, and muſt have ſucceeded in, conſidering the reaſonableneſs of the demand, except the generoſity of the King our Maſter's nature, who values money ſo little, has already condeſcended to the leſſer ſum of two millions of livres. &c, Extract of a letter from the lord treaſurer Danby to mr. Montague, embaſſador in France, the ſeventeenth of January 1677-8.

"——Yeſterday young Ruvigny came to me with mr. Barillon (having given me his father's letters the day before) and diſcourſed much upon the confidence the French King hath of the firmneſs of ours to him: of the good opinion his maſter hath of me; of his King's reſolution to condeſcend to any thing, that is not infamous to him, for the ſatisfaction of our King; how certainly our King may depend upon all aſſiſtances and ſupplies from his Maſter, in caſe the friendſhip be preſerved——The main of their drift was to ingage me to prevail with the Prince of Orange as to the town of Tournay——The King muſt come to ſome declaration of his mind to the parliament when it meets. That which makes the hopes of peace leſs probable, is, that the duke grows every day leſs inclined to it, and has created a greater indifferency in the King than I could have imagined; which being added to the French King's reſolutions, not to part with Tournay, does, I confeſs, make me deſpair of any accommodation. Nevertheleſs, I am aſſured that one principal cauſe of this adjournment for thirteen days, has been to find an expedient for the peace; and the effect hath hitherto been, that no body will now believe other than that the peace is already concluded between us and France.

Extract of another letter from the ſame hand to the ſame perſon, dated the twenty-fifth of March 1678.

"——In caſe the conditions of peace ſhall be accepted, the King expects to have ſix millions of livres a year for three years, from the time that this agreement ſhall be ſigned betwixt his Majeſty and the King of France; becauſe it will probably be two or three years before the parliament will be in humor to give him any ſupplies after the making of any peace with France; and the embaſſador here has always agreed to that ſum, but not for ſo long a time. If you find the peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the money at all; and all poſſible care muſt be taken to have this whole negociation as private as is poſſible, for fear of giving offenſe at home, where for the moſt part we hear in ten days after of any thing that is communicated to the French miniſters."——At the bottom of the letter were theſe words under the King's own hand——

This letter is writ by my order, C. R.

Remark upon the King's conduct.

I ſhall make no obſervations upon theſe letters, which plainly ſhew, with what ſincerity the King diſcharged the office of mediator, and how much he favored France. The beſt excuſe for him is, that theſe ſecret proceedings and negociations were only to get money. But when it is conſidered, that he would have received much more from his parliament, if he had purſued the paths of uprightneſs, and might have had more left of what the parliament ment would have granted him in one ſingle year, than he hoped to draw from France in three, a man can ſcarce forbear thinking, that his blind attachment to the intereſt of France was for hidden deſigns which it was not yet time to diſcover. And if it is ſaid, he took money from France, only to be freed from the trouble of applying to his parliament, this does but confirm that he intended to make himſelf abſolute (1).

The King concludes alliances with the States. Temple.

The King had not prolonged the adjournment of the parliament to the twenty-eighth of January, in order to find expedients for a general peace, as the treaſurer told Montague in his letter of the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month, but to have time to receive the news of a league with Holland, which was indeed ſigned the ſixteenth ditto. This league was very far from anſwering the deſires of the parliament. It was properly but defenſive, to prevent the French King from purſuing his conqueſts in the Netherlands. Nay, it may be eaſily judged, conſidering the King's ſtrict union with France, and the ſecret correſpondences between the two courts, whether Charles had any great deſire to go to war with the King of France in order to oblige him to reſtore what he had taken. He believed nevertheleſs that this league would be capable to impoſe upon the parliament, and therefore had defered their meeting to receive the news of its concluſion. Supported by this league, which, according to him, was to produce wonderful effects, he made the following ſpeech to both houſes, the twenty-eighth of January.

The King's ſpeech. Kennet, p. 346. Echard.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"WHEN we parted laſt, I told you, 'That "before we met again I would do that "which ſhould be to your ſatisfaction.' I have "accordingly made ſuch alliances with Holland, as "are for the preſervation of Flanders, and which "cannot fail of that end, unleſs prevented either "by the want of due aſſiſtances to ſupport thoſe "alliances, or by the ſmall regard the Spaniards "themſelves muſt have to their own preſervation. "The firſt of theſe I cannot ſuſpect, by reaſon of "your repeated ingagements to maintain them; "and I know you are ſo wiſe as to conſider, that "a war, which muſt be the neceſſary conſequence "of them, ought neither to be proſecuted by "halves, nor to want ſuch aſſurances of perſe-"verance as may give me incourgement to pur-"ſue it: beſide, it will not be leſs neceſſary to "let our enemies have ſuch a proſpect of our reſo-"lutions, as may let them ſee certainly that we "ſhall not be weary of our arms, till Chriſten-"dom be reſtored to ſuch a peace, as ſhall not be "in the power of any Prince alone to diſturb.

"I do acknowledge to you, that I have uſed all "the means poſſible by a mediation, to have pro-"cured an honorable and ſafe peace for Chriſten-"dom; knowing how preferable ſuch a peace "would have been to any war, and eſpecially to "this kingdom, which muſt neceſſarily own the "vaſt benefits it has received by peace, while its "neighbors only have yet ſmarted by the war; "but finding it no longer to be hoped for by fair "means, it ſhall not be my fault if that be not "obtained by force which cannot be had any other "ways. For this reaſon, I have recalled my "troops from France, and have conſidered, that "altho' the Dutch ſhall do their parts, we cannot "have leſs on ours than ninety ſail of capital ſhips "conſtantly maintained, nor leſs than thirty or "forty thouſand landmen (with their dependencies) "to be imployed upon our fleets and elſewhere. "And becauſe there ſhall be no fear of miſ-"imploying what you ſhall give to theſe uſes, I "am contented that ſuch money be appropriated "to thoſe ends as ſtrictly as you can deſire. I "have given teſtimony enough of my care in that "kind, by the progreſs I have made in building "the new ſhips; wherein, for the making them "more uſeful, I have directed ſuch larger dimen-"ſions as will coſt me above one hundred thou-"ſand pounds more than the act allows. I have "gone as far as I could in repairing the old fleet, "and in buying neceſſary ſtores for the navy and "ordnance: and in this and other proviſions for "better ſecuring both my foreign plantations and "the iſlands nearer home, I have expended a "great deal more than the two hundred thouſand "pounds you inabled me to borrow upon the ex-"ciſe, altho' I have not found ſuch credit as I "expected upon that ſecurity. I have born the "charge both of a rebellion in Virginia, and a new "war with Algiers: I ſtand ingaged to the Prince "of Orange for my niece's portion, and I ſhall not "be able to maintain my conſtant neceſſary eſta-"bliſhments, unleſs the new impoſts upon wine, "&c. be continued to me, which would other-"ways turn only to their profit to whom we leaſt "intend it.

Charles II. An' 1677.

"I hope theſe things will need little recommen-"dation to you, when you conſider your promiſes "in ſome, and the neceſſity of the reſt; and to "let you ſee, that I have not only imployed my "time and treaſure for your ſafety, but done all I "could to remove all ſorts of jealouſies, I have "married my niece to the Prince of Orange, by "which I hope I have given full aſſurances, that I "ſhall never ſuffer his intereſts to be ruined, if I "can be aſſiſted, as I ought to be, to preſerve "them. Having done all this, I expect from you "a plentiful ſupply, ſuitable to ſuch great occa-"ſions, whereon depends not only the honor, but, "for ought I know, the being of the Engliſh na-"tion, which will not be ſaved by finding fault "afterwards, but may be prevented by avoiding "the chief fault of doing weakly and by halves, "what can only be hoped from a vigorous and "thorough proſecution of what we undertake. "Theſe conſiderations are of the greateſt impor-"tance that ever concerned this kingdom, and "therefore I would have you enter immediately "upon them, without ſuffering any other buſineſs "whatſoever to divert you from bringing them to "good reſolutions."

A remark on this ſpeech.

It is very ſurpriſing, that Charles II, with more extraordinary ſupplies than were ever granted to any King of England; with a revenue much larger than any of his predeceſſors (which, by the calculation of the commons, amounted to ſixteen hundred thouſand pounds) was nevertheleſs always in want, and oppreſſed with debts, and in every ſpeech complained to his parliament, that he had expended for the public, more than was granted him. He had however been ingaged but in two wars, which he might have avoided if he had thought fit, and ſaved his ſubjects ſeveral millions, fruitleſly conſumed in them. But this is not the only reflection which may be made upon this ſpeech; there is another of much greater weight.

The whole ſpeech was grounded upon a ſuppoſition which naturally ought to have been true, but was not, viz. that his alliance with Holland could not fail ingaging him in a war with France, tho' nothing was farther from his intention. His aim therefore was to repreſent his alliance with Holland, and the war againſt France, as one and the ſame thing, or at leaſt the war as the neceſſary conſequence of this alliance, tho' he gave no poſitive hopes of the war. There was indeed a wide diſtance between the one and the other. For, if the parliament had granted the immenſe ſums he demanded, he might certainly have made peace when he pleaſed, without expending any of the money in preparations. He would only have had to declare againſt France, and peace would have inſtantly followed. For France was not in condition to reſiſt, if England had been ſincerely united with the reſt of its enemies. Herein the King threw the parliament into a great dilemma. For, either they were to grant him the large ſums he demanded, without having other hope of a future war, than a conſequence not abſolutely neceſſary; or in refuſing the ſupply, they gave the King a plauſible pretenſe to ſay, it was not his fault, that England did not join with the enemies of France. But in the houſe of commons were men of ſufficient abilities to diſcover his Majeſty's artifices, and inſtruct their fellow members, wherein they ſucceeded the more eaſily, as above two thirds of the houſe were little inclined to credit the King's word.

The commons ingaged in difficulties.

The commons addreſs the King. January 31. Kennet. Echard. Phillips.

After great debates it was therefore reſolved, to preſent an addreſs to the King, the ſubſtance of which was,——"That they beſought him "not to admit of any treaty of peace, whereby "the French King ſhould be left in poſſeſſion of "any greater dominion or power, than was left "him by the Pyrenean treaty: that no trade be "admited with France, or any goods ſuffered to "be imported from thence, on pain of forfeiture. "And when he ſhould be pleaſed to communicate "his alliances to them in parliament, they would "give ſuch ready aſſiſtance, on all occaſions, as "might bring the war to a happy concluſion."

This addreſs threw the King, in his turn, into a great perplexity. He would have it believed, that he intended to make war upon France, tho' he had already reſolved againſt it. He could not therefore anſwer this addreſs without a direct aſſent or diſſent, either of which he was willing to avoid. To extricate himſelf, he had recourſe to the ſame expedient he had formerly uſed. This was, to complain of the great invaſion of his prerogative, in thus preſcribing the meaſures he was to take, which at the ſame time he ſhewed to be ridiculous and impracticable. He ſaid, his ſpeech was to both houſes, and the return ought to be from both. That however, if, by their aſſiſtance, he was put into a condition ſufficient for ſuch a work, he would never be weary, till Chriſtendom was reſtored to ſuch a peace, that it ſhould not be in the power of one Prince to diſturb: that the rights of making and managing war and peace, belonged ſolely to him, and they were miſtaken, if they thought he would ever depart from that right: That if the commons would incourage him to go farther in alliances, they muſt conſider of raiſing ſpeedy ſupplies; for from the conſideration of thoſe he muſt take his meaſures.

The King finds a way to elude it. Febr. 4. Kennet, p. 346. Echard, Vol. III. p. 441. J. Phillips.

Charles II. An' 1677.

The meaning of this anſwer was eaſily underſtood, viz. that the King ſtudiouſly avoided to ſay poſitively, he intended to declare war againſt France, tho' he wiſhed that conſequence to be drawn from his alliance with Holland; an alliance of which the contents were not known, and which was not yet imparted to the parliament. He pretended, however, that on his bare declaration or information of an alliance with Holland, the parliament ſhould inable him to maintain ninety large ſhips, beſide thirty others, and forty thouſand land forces (1). And yet, ſhortly after, when the articles of this treaty appeared, the commons voted, that it was not purſuant to their deſires. It is eaſy to ſee, wherein the difference between the King and the commons conſiſted. The King feared, or feigned to fear, that the parliament, after ingaging him in a war with France, would leave him deſtitute of means to ſupport it. The commons really diſtruſted his ſincerity, and feared, that, after receiving the money, he would think no more of war, but ſuffer an unſafe peace to be concluded. Let the reader determine for one or other. I ſhall only ſay, that, if the reigns of Henry III and Richard II are excepted, England had never ſeen, till within the laſt ſixty years, ſuch mutual diſtruſt between her Kings and parliaments. To this then it muſt be imputed, that James I, Charles I, and Charles II, were no ſlaves to their word, and while they pretended to ſalve their ſincerity by generals, reſtrictions, obſcure or ambigious expreſſions, they intirely loſt the confidence of their ſubjects. Every King of England is in danger of being very unhappy, when, by ſuch artifices, he renders ſuſpected the ſincerity of what he ſays in full parliament.

A reflection.

Nevertheleſs, the commons reſolved to grant the King a ſupply, but with ſtrict limitations. At the begining of this ſeſſion, they had granted him ſeventy thouſand pounds, for the ſolemn funeral of his father, whoſe body could not be found, tho' it was certainly known to be intered in Windſor chapel. I do not know whether it was ever diſcovered, or the intended obſequies performed (2).

(1) In the debates about raiſing the land forces, ſir William Coventry was for hiring bodies of troops from the German Princes, and for aſſiſting the Dutch with money. He thought, that which did more properly belong to England, was to ſet out a great fleet, and to cut off the French trade every where; for they were then very high in their manufactures and trades. Burnet, p. 411.

(2) The truth of the matter ſeems to be this: That the King either had great occaſion for that ſum of money, or thought he could put it to a better uſe, than laying it out on a ſolemn funeral for his father; and ſo never ſent to inquire for the body. For that King Charles I, was actually buried at Windſor (tho' the lord Clarendon ſeems, at the end of his hiſtory, to doubt of it) and that his body might have been found without much difficulty, is plain from the following certificate, given by mr. John Sewell, regiſter at Windſor caſtle.——"Anno 1696, September 21, the "ſame vault in which King Charles I was buried, was opened, to lay in a ſtill born child of the then Princeſs of "Denmark, the late Queen Anne. On the King's coffin, the velvet pall was ſtrong and ſound, and there was about the "coffin a leaden band, with this inſcription cut thro' it, KING CHARLES, 1648.——When the body of King "Charles I, lay in ſtate in the Dean's-hall, the duke of Richmond had the coffin opened, and was ſatisfied that it was the "King's body. This ſeveral people have declared they knew to be true, who were alive, and then preſent, as mr. "Randolph of New-Windſor, and others." Echard, Vol. II. p. 649.

(3) He had, it ſeems, recourſe to the King's Bench, whither he was brought by a Habeas Corpus; but the judges denied him redreſs. This application to an inferior court was ſoon taken notice of by the lords, who voted it a breach of privilege, for which the earl was to anſwer his contempt at the bar of the houſe. He was accordingly brought to the bar, where he offered to acknowlege his aſſerting the diſſolution of the parliament to be an unadviſed action, and to beg their lordſhips pardon for his offenſe in bringing his Habeas Corpus. Which being done in a form preſcribed by the houſe, he was releaſed. Idem. Vol. III. p. 442.

deliberations about war, the King of France taking the field in February, made himſelf maſter of Ghent and Ipres in March, and then put his forces into quarters of refreſhment. Theſe conqueſts ſo alarmed the Dutch, that from this time they reſolved upon a ſeparate peace, tho' they durſt not own it publicly. Lewis XIV, who knew their intentions, and had nothing to fear from England, began to talk like a conqueror, and himſelf to form the plan of the peace he was willing to grant the allies, and which was different from that agreed on between Charles and the Prince of Orange.

Temple's Mem. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 443.

On the contrary, the commons of England ſurpriſed at the progreſs of the French arms, made haſte to finiſh a bill for raiſing money by a poll tax. The fourteenth of March they reſolved upon an addreſs to the King, to pray him to declare war againſt France; to diſmiſs the embaſſador of that crown; and recall his own from Paris, with a promiſe of the neceſſary and plentiful ſupplies. This addreſs was ſent the next day to the lords for their concurrence: but, before an anſwer was given, the King came to the houſe of lords the twentieth of March, and after paſſing the poll bill (1), and ſome others, adjourned the parliament to the eleventh of April.

An addreſs gives the King occaſion to adjourn the parliament. Acts paſſed.

It is remarkable that five days after, the lord treaſurer writ the ſecond of the forementioned letters to embaſſador Montague, concerning the ſecret negociation of which I have ſpoken.

An' 1678.

The parliament meeting the eleventh of April was farther adjourned to the twenty-ninth, when the chancellor acquainted the two houſes, that his Majeſty had diſcovered that the Dutch were thinking of a ſeparate peace without his conſent or privity, and deſired their advice how to proceed. The commons gave their opinion for an actual war with France, and at the ſame time voted, "That the late leagues "made with the States-general of the United Pro"vinces, were not purſuant to the addreſſes of the "houſe, nor conſiſtent with the good and ſafety of "the kingdom." The King returned an anſwer, which teſtified his reſentment of this vote. But the commons not at all diſcouraged, preſented a ſecond addreſs, in which——"They beſought him to "communicate to them his reſolutions upon their "advice."——They added, "That the in"conveniencies and dangers which the kingdom "lay under, might have been totally, or in a great "meaſure prevented, in caſe his Majeſty had ac"cepted of the advice by them given in their ad"dreſs of the twenty-ſixth of May laſt, and the "thirty-firſt of January: they beſought him there"fore, that he would be pleaſed to remove thoſe "counſellors that adviſed him to give thoſe anſwers "which he did to the ſaid addreſſes.——In "fine, that he would be pleaſed to remove the duke "of Lauderdale from his preſenſe and council."——The King immediately anſwered, "That he was "much ſurpriſed at the extravagancy of their "addreſs, and unwilling at preſent to give it ſuch "a due anſwer as it deſerved." Two days after, the thirteenth of May, he prorogued the parliament to the twenty-third of the ſame month. Thus the propoſal for a war with France never failed to produce either an adjournment or a prorogation. It muſt be obſerved, that this was at the very time the ſeparate peace between France and Holland was negociating, which the Dutch would never have reſolved, could they have believed that England would declare for a war. Nevertheleſs, the King would ſtill have it believed, he was diſpoſed to a war, tho' hitherto he had not poſitively ſaid it. To this purpoſe, immediately after the poll bill had paſſed, he raiſed thirty thouſand men, who were compleated in ſix weeks.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 455.

While theſe troops were raiſing, and before the prorogation of the parliament, the States-general ſent Van Lewen to the King, to acquaint him, that they were diſpoſed to a peace, becauſe they ſaw, there was no reliance on the uncertain meaſures of England. That however, if his Majeſty would immediately declare war againſt France, they would break off all negociations, and vigorouſly proſecute the war purſuant to their alliances, and that his declaration was the only thing that could prevent a pacification. This was declared to the King by ſir William Temple, from the States embaſſador. Charles now finding that a poſitive anſwer was to be returned, which he had hitherto avoided, told ſir William Temple, "That ſince the Dutch would "have a peace upon the French terms, and France "offered money for his conſent to what he could "not help, he did not know why he ſhould not "get the money."

An embaſſy from the States, to acquaint the King, that he might yet prevent the peace. Temple's Mem. p. 460, 461.

The King reſolves to accept the money offered by France.

The weakneſs of this evaſion is apparent: for tho' the embaſſadors of the States had declared, there ſhould be no peace, if Charles would really ingage in a war, the King, ſuppreſſing this poſitive declaration, ſuppoſed that the States were for a peace upon any terms. Upon this falſe ſuppoſition, he ordered ſir William Temple to treat with Barillon the French embaſſador; but ſir William wiſely declined ſuch a negociation. What Temple refuſed was undertaken by others, and the ſame author ſays, that among the articles propoſed by the embaſſador of France, for concluding a private treaty with the King, there was one article which was ſo offenſive, that the King aſſured him he would never forget it while he lived. He ſays no more, whether becauſe he was not informed of it, or did not think proper to divulge what he knew. But dr. Swift, who publiſhed ſir William Temple's letters, acquaints us with that remarkable paſſage, viz. "That France "in order to break the force of the confederacy, "and elude all juſt conditions of a general peace, "reſolved by any means to enter into ſeparate "meaſures with Holland, to which end it was ab"ſolute neceſſary to gain the good offices of the "King of England, who was looked upon as the "maſter of the peace whenever he pleaſed. The "bargain was ſtruck for either three or four hundred "thouſand pounds: but when all was agreed, mr. "Barillon, the French embaſſador, told the King, "that he had orders from his maſter, before pay"ment, to add a private article, by which his Ma"jeſty ſhould be ingaged, 'Never to keep above "eight thouſand men of ſtanding troops in his three "kingdoms.' This unexpected propoſal put the "the King in a rage, and made him ſay, "God's "fiſh! Does my brother of France think to ſerve "me thus? Are all his promiſes to make me "abſolute maſter of my realms come to this? Or "does he think that a thing to be done with eight "thouſand men?

A treaty negociated at London between Charles and Lewis.

Temple's Lett. fol. p. 464.

Hence it manifeſtly appears, for what the thirty thouſand men the King was raiſing were intended. They could not be levied for a war againſt France, tho' the King uſed that pretext, ſince he had already made his bargain with that crown for four millions of livres. Nothing elſe therefore can be thought, but that his Majeſty ſeeing the peace on the point of concluſion, which he only could, but would not prevent, imagined, that after its ratification, the King of France would assist him to become absolute master in his kingdoms, and furnish him with money to maintain the thirty thousand men without his applying to the parliament. If this be not so, what account can be given of his conduct in raising an army, at a time when all his proceedings shewed, he had not the least thought of making war upon France?

He is abused by the King of France.

The King was deceived by the promises of Lewis XIV, who artfully took advantage of the eager desire of Charles and the duke his brother to establish a despotic government in England, to ingage them in all the measures they had taken during the whole war, and which were so directly contrary to the nation's interests. But when he found himself secure of a peace with the Dutch, and by a necessary consequence, of a general peace with all Europe, he made a jest of his promise to his friend. He thought doubtless it was not for the interest of France, that the King of England should be absolute, or rather, he feared to ingage, for the sole interest of the King of England, in an undertaking capable of kindling a new war, in which all Europe might be imbroiled.

I know not whether the King consented to Lewis's demands, and am only sure, that he continued his levies, whether with intention to execute his projects without the assistance of France, or in the hope of obtaining better conditions from Lewis, by terrifying him with the apprehension of his joining with the allies, and which might still be practicable. By degrees, he spoke more gently of war, and sufficiently declared his inclination for peace. In all likelihood he had adjusted matters with France.

The parliament sits. Kennet. Echard.

In this situation were affairs when the parliament met the twenty-third of May, after a prorogation of ten days. The King opened the seventeenth session of this long parliament with a speech, the substance of which is as follows:

The King's speech.

——— "I am resolved, as far as I am able, "to save Flanders, either by a war or a peace, "which way soever I shall find most conducing to- "wards it.——If I were able I would keep up "my army and my navy at sea for some time; "but I leave it to you to consider of supplies for "their continuance or disbanding; and in either "case not to discourage so many worthy and brave "gentlemen, who have offered their lives and "service to their country, and in pursuit of your "own advices and resolutions. I must tell you, "that a branch of my revenue is now expiring, "and another part of it is cut off by a clause in "the poll bill; that I have borrowed two hundred "thousand pounds upon the excise at your request, "of all which you are to consider. I never had any "intentions but of good to you and my people, "nor ever shall; therefore I desire you will not "drive me into extremities, which must end ill "both for you and me, and, which is worst, for "the nation. I desire to prevent all disorders or "mischief that may befall by our disagreement; "but in case there do, I leave it to God Almighty "to judge who is the occasion of it. One thing "more I have to add, and that is, that I will "never more suffer the course and method of pas- "sing laws to be changed, by tacking together "several matters in one bill. The rest I leave to "the lord chancellor."

The chancellor's speech, according to custom, tended to excuse the King's measures. As he only inlarged upon what the King had said more succinctly, I think it needless to insert the speech, in which nothing was offered new or material.

The house of commons having adjourned themselves for three days, met again the twenty-seventh of May, and came to the following resolution; "That the house taking into consideration the "state of the kingdom, and the expense occasioned "by the army, were humbly of opinion, that "if his Majesty pleased to think fit to enter into "war against the French King, the house was, "and would be always ready to assist him in that "war; but if otherwise, they would proceed to "the consideration of providing for the speedy dis- "banding of the army."

Charles II. An' 1678.

A resolution of the commons. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 450, 451.

Communicated to the King.

The house farther ordered, That the members of his Majesty's privy-council should acquaint the King with this vote, and pray his speedy answer.

His answer.

His Majesty replied, "That the French King had "made such offers of a cessation till the twenty- "seventh of July, that he believed they would "not only be accepted, but end in a general peace; "yet, as that was uncertain, it would not be pru- "dent to dismiss either fleet or army before that "time."

A vote for disbanding the army.

Upon this answer the house voted, "That all forces raised since the twenty-ninth of "September last (except those transported to foreign "plantations) be forthwith paid off and disbanded, "and that they would consider of a supply for that "purpose." Accordingly the fourth of June the house voted two hundred thousand pounds for disbanding of the army by the end of the month, and the next day they voted a like sum towards defraying the expenses of the fleet.

A message from the King.

Upon these votes the King, by a message, told the house, that his mind was still the same, "That "the army and fleet ought to be kept up till the "expected peace should be concluded," and he farther recommended to their consideration, "Whe- "ther it were not dishonorable for him to recall his "forces in Flanders, from those towns which he "had taken into his protection, before they could "provide themselves of other succors." Upon this consideration the commons extended the time, as to the forces in Flanders, to the twenty-seventh of July.

A vote to grant no more money during the session.

The fifteenth of June, the house resolved, that, "after the Tuesday following, no motions should "be made for any new supplies of money, till after "the next recess." As hitherto the house had experienced, that the King only amused them, and intended to have the money before he positively declared himself, they resolved to put him under a necessity of declaring, within three days, for fear he should still continue to amuse them, till it should be too late. Accordingly, on that very Tuesday the King came to the house of peers, and sending for the commons, told both houses, "That the "peace between France, Spain, and Holland, was "almost concluded, in which his part would be "not only that of a mediator, but also to give his "warrants in it. That Spain writes word, 'That "unless England bears the charge of maintaining "Flanders, even after the peace, they will not be "in a condition to support it long.' Therefore to "that end it was necessary to keep up the navy "at sea; and not only so, but to give the world "some assurance of being well united at home: "that tho' the house of commons might think "such a peace as ill a bargain as a war, because "it would cost them money, yet if they seriously "consider, that Flanders had been lost, and per- "haps by this time, he believed they would give "much greater sums than that would cost, rather "than the single town of Ostend should be in "French hands, and forty of their men of war in "so good a haven, over-against the river's mouth." Then he insinuated to them, "That they could not "but be pleased to understand the reputation Eng- "land had gained abroad, by having, in forty "days, raised an army of thirty thousand men, "and prepared a navy of ninety men of war; there- "fore, if they desired to keep up the honor of "the

"the crown at home, and look to the ſafety of "the balance of affairs abroad; if they deſired he "ſhould paſs any part of his life in quiet, and all "the reſt in confidence and kindneſs with them, "and other future parliaments, they muſt find a "way not only to ſettle for his life his revenue as "at Chriſtmas laſt, but alſo to add a new fund "of three hundred thouſand pounds per annum, "upon which he would paſs an act to ſettle fifty "thouſand pounds upon the navy and ordnance; "and ſhould be likewiſe ready to conſent to all "ſuch laws as they ſhould propoſe for the good "of the nation." He laſtly reminded them, "to "inable him to keep his word with the Prince of "Orange in the payment of his niece's portion, "which was forty thouſand pounds; the firſt pay-"ment being now due, and demanded by him."

And an augmentation of his revenue. Burnet, p. 421.

Would not any one think at reading this ſpeech, that the King had hitherto kept the balance of Europe perfectly even, and was thereby intitled to demand, that he ſhould be inabled to preſerve it? Would not one think, that he had done the nation ſome important ſervice, which deſerved an augmentation of three hundred thouſand pounds a year to his revenue? But the commons were ſo uſed to ſuch ſpeeches, that on them they made no impreſſion. If their diſtruſt of the King had been hitherto great, it may be affirmed, it was conſiderably increaſed, when they ſaw a peace concluded, which diminiſhed not the exorbitant power of France, but left Europe expoſed to its mercy. It was evident, the King might, if he had pleaſed, have procured a peace more advantageous. After this, it is not ſtrange, that his ſtrict union with France was ſuſpected to conceal deſigns which were not for the benefit of the nation. Accordingly, when the commons came to debate on the additional revenue demanded by the King, it was unanimouſly rejected (1). Moreover, the houſe refuſed to give a compenſation for the loſs ſuſtained by the King in the prohibition of French commodities. In fine, the lords having paſſed the bill for diſbanding the army, with an inlargement of the time prefixed for one month longer, the commons abſolutely refuſed their conſent to the amendment.

Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 452.

Charles perceiving by this what he was to expect from the commons, came to the parliament the fifteenth of July, and paſſed ſeveral bills, of which theſe were the principal.

Acts paſſed. Statute b.

1. An act for granting a ſupply of ſix hundred and nineteen thouſand, three hundred and eighty pounds, for diſbanding the army, and other uſes therein mentioned. 2. An act for granting an additional duty to his Majeſty upon wines for three years. 3. An act for burying in woollen. This act, which is ſtill in force, is very ſerviceable to the flannel manufacture, and conſequently makes a great conſumption of wool.

The parliament prorogued. Kennet. Echard.

Theſe acts being paſſed, the chancellor acquainted both houſes, that the King thought proper to prorogue them to the firſt of Auguſt, and ſo to keep them in call, by ſhort prorogations; but that his intention was, they ſhould not meet till winter, unleſs there was occaſion for their aſſembling ſooner. Thus ended the ſeventeenth ſeſſion of this parliament. And thus England found itſelf ingaged in an expenſe of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to pay an army and fleet, which certainly had neither been prepared to make war againſt France, or for the ſecurity of the kingdom.

While the parliament was ſiting, the States-general ſeeing nothing was to be hoped for from England, treated with France, both for themſelves and Spain, with regard to the Netherlands. At length, every thing being ſetled, and the King of France promiſing to reſtore to the Spaniards, Ghent, Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburg, the States ordered their plenipotentiaries at Nimeguen to ſign the peace the laſt day of June. It was univerſally expected, that the peace would be ſigned that day. But as the time for fixing this reſolution had been neglected (the Spaniards and Dutch, not doubting but it was to be immediately after the exchange of the ratifications) the Spaniſh embaſſador happened the day before, to aſk the French plenipotentiaries, when they would reſtore the towns? To this they poſitively anſwered, that it would not be till after the reſtitution of the towns taken from the King of Sweden, by the allies in the North (2). This unexpected pretenſion put a ſtop to the ſigning of the peace; and the Dutch plenipotentiaries received expreſs orders from their maſters not to ſign, unleſs France would ingage to reſtore the ſix places, upon the ratification of the treaty. But the French were immoveable, and appeared reſolute to continue the war, unleſs Sweden was ſatisfied.

Charles II. An' 1678.

A difficulty ſtarted, relating to the evacuation of ſome towns by the French. Temple's Mem. p. 463.

Charles having intelligence of this new difficulty, and moreover was informed by the French embaſſador, that it was his maſter's intention, immediately ſent ſir William Temple to Holland, with full power to ſign a league with the States, by which they ſhould be mutually bound to continue the war, in caſe France ſhould not agree to evacuate the ſix towns within ſuch a time. This league was really concluded and ſigned the twenty-ſixth of July, to the great ſatisfaction of the Prince of Orange, and thoſe who thought the peace very diſadvantageous.

A league between Charles and the States. Id. p. 464.

The readineſs with which this reſolution was taken by the King, much ſurprized thoſe, who, from his former proceedings, had no great opinion of his ſincerity. But when it was ſeen that the league was concluded, and France continued obſtinate, it was hoped, the war would be renewed with more vigor than ever, and that England would incline the balance to the ſide of the allies. It is difficult to diſcover the motive of the King's vigorous reſolution. Some have believed, he was really offended at the contempt France ſeemed to ſhow of his mediation, in ſtarting ſuch an incident. Others have imagined, that foreſeeing Lewis would at laſt comply, notwithſtanding his ſeeming reſolution, he thought, by this proceeding, to redeem his credit with the Engliſh, who till then ſtrongly ſuſpected him of too cloſe a correſpondence with France. Others have fancied, that he took this reſolution in order to obtain a large ſupply from the parliament, not doubting but he ſhould be afterwards able to procure a peace.

However this be, it ſhortly after appeared, that the King repented of what he had done, and feared that his league would rekindle the war. At the time that the Dutch were preparing to improve this happy juncture, to break off the negociation with France, and to riſe in their demands, one Du Cros, an agent of Sweden at London, brought an expreſs order from the King for ſir William Temple to repair immediately to Nimeguen, and uſe his utmoſt indeavors to perſuade the plenipotentiaries potentiaries of Sweden to consent to the evacuation of the six towns within a time limited. His Majesty ordered him likewise to assure them, that after the peace he would use the most effectual indeavors he could, for the restitution of all the territories the Swedes had lost in the war. It was not difficult for sir William Temple to infer from hence, that the King had no inclination to quarrel with France. But he was still more fully convinced, when he was informed from Pensionary Fagel, that Du Cros had been with the States deputies, and acquainted them with the order he had brought; that he had also said, the terms of the peace were absolutely agreed between the Kings of France and England, and from some expressions he had heard the King use, intimated, it would be in vain to pretend to prevent it. As sir William and the Pensionary could not doubt but Du Cros was sent by the King, they concluded, either the King had altered his mind, or had never intended entering into a war with France. Wherefore the States, instead of forming new schemes, were contented with the plan already agreed on, with a resolution however not to sign the treaty till the restitution of the six towns was assured within such a time specified (1).

Temple. Basnage.

Since the league had been concluded at the Hague, the King of France, to whom it was communicated, had used all possible artifices to elude, and bring it to a negociation, with an offer to treat upon it, either at St. Quintin or Ghent. But the States, on the contrary, had expresly ordered their embassadors to break off the negociation, if the peace was not signed by such a day, with the article of the evacuation of the towns in a time limited. Sir William Temple came to Nimeguen but three days before the expiration of the time fixed by the States. On his arrival he found very little disposition on either side towards signing the peace; the French and Dutch appeared equally inflexible, and the latter would not hear either of any negociation or delay.

The peace signed.

At last came the critical day, the eleventh of August, fixed by the treaty at the Hague, in the morning of which the French embassadors desisted from their pretensions, and the peace was signed before twelve that night. This gave France the desired satisfaction of making a separate peace with Holland, which was immediately followed by a peace between France and Spain, and some months after with all the confederate powers, except the duke of Lorrain, who could never obtain his re-establishment. It may be affirmed with great truth, that the King of England might have procured Europe a more advantageous peace, since the parliament would have granted him the necessary supplies, if he had pleased to act agreeably to the interest of Europe in general, and of England in particular. His conduct can only be ascribed to his desire of executing the project of rendering himself despotic, and introducing the Popish religion in England which he thought could not be accomplished without the assistance of France.

Blockade of Mons. Temple. Basnage.

The treaty concluded between England and Holland, the twenty-sixth of July, had, as I said, fixed the eleventh of August for signing the peace. In this interval the French King had, by his general the duke of Luxemburgh, blocked up Mons. All his artifices to draw the affair of the evacuation to be negociated, were only to gain time for Luxembourgh to become master of that place before the peace was signed. But the Dutch being bent not to enter into treaty upon that affair, the French general had not time to make any great progress before the town. Mean while the Prince of Orange having information that peace was upon the point of being signed, and desiring to distinguish himself by some great action, marched directly to the duke of Luxemburgh, surprised him, and gave him a considerable check (2). This battle, called afterwards the battle of St. Denys, being fought the fourteenth of August, three days after the peace was signed, gave occasion to various opinions concerning this action of the Prince of Orange. Some said he knew not the peace was signed. Others pretended, the news was brought him by an express, but not from the States, and therefore he might improve the present advantages. However with this action ended a war, which had lasted six years, and was at first so fatal to Holland, that the republic saw itself on the brink of destruction.

Observations upon the Popish plot.

We are now come to the discovery of that famous conspiracy known in England by the name of the Popish Plot, which makes one of the principal periods of this reign, and has given occasion to many politicians to exercise their talents, some in supporting the reality, others in exposing the falsity of it. What I have been saying is sufficient to demonstrate the impossibility for any historian whatever, to please two sorts of men, whose sentiments are diametrically opposite, and who, thro' prejudice, religion, passion, and party-interest are previously disposed to believe or disbelieve the Popish plot. An historian is in vain impartial if his readers are not so. The course of this history ingages me to speak of this famous conspiracy, on which depend all the events of the remainder of this reign. It may well be judged, that I do not expect to satisfy all the world: this I take to be an impossible thing. What therefore I propose is, to inform the reader of the conspiracy itself, whether true or false, of the reasons and proofs alleged in maintenance of their reality or falsehood, and to have the inward satisfaction of saying nothing but what I believe to be true.

But before I proceed to the particulars, it is absolutely necessary to clear some ambiguities which I have observed in the writers on both sides, that the reader may be the better prepared to be on his guard.

1. The word Plot in English, and Conspiration in French, are always taken in a bad sense. Their general signification is, a design, but an unlawful design to attempt something against the person of the King or his ministers; against the constitution of the government; against the established religion; in short, a design bad in itself, wherein the public is concerned, and for the execution whereof means and instruments are already prepared. But if any one maintains, there is nothing unlawful in a design to change a bad religion established, in order to introduce a better; or if on supposition that a government was established by force and violence, it is affirmed, there is nothing ill or unlawful in a design to restore it to its ancient state, it is plain, this will only be a dispute about words. Thus the fact or design in itself may be allowed, which by some will be termed a Plot, while others will not give it that appellation. This has been the case with some authors who have spoken of the Popish plot. They own there was a design to alter the form of government, and subvert the Protestant religion, and yet deny there was a plot.

(2) The Prince of Orange, in this battle, was in great danger of being lost, had not monsieur Ouwerkerk come to his relief, and killed a French captain that was just going to shoot him in the head. Upon news of peace next day, the duke of Luxemburgh, with a great compliment, desired an interview with the Prince, and they met in the field. Basnage, Vol. II. p. 941.

2. This plot, true or false, contained three particular designs. 1. To kill the King. 2. To subvert the government. 3. To extirpate the Protestant religion, and establish Popery (1). Most of the authors instead of considering these three articles, as branches of one and the same plot, have affected to separate them; some have chiefly insisted upon the design of killing the King, and slightly touched upon the other two. They believed themselves able to prove the falshood of this design, and therefore concluded that there was no real plot. Others meeting with some improbabilities in the depositions of the witnesses concerning the design of killing the King, have chiefly indeavored to prove the two last articles, from whence they have infered, there was a true and real plot. The reader must be on his guard against these artifices which intirely alter the state of the question, and always remember, that the plot did not consist in the single design to kill the King, or in the single design to subvert the government, or in that to change religion, but in all these three designs united together, and making but one and the same conspiracy.

3. Those who assert the reality of the plot, pretend, that the King, the duke of York, and some of the ministers were the heads and contrivers, and give many proofs, some of which have already appeared in the transactions of this reign. The opposite party object, that it is a manifest contradiction to make the King author of a plot to take away his own life: that beside, conspiracies of subjects against their sovereigns have been common, but to accuse a Prince of a plot against his subjects is a thing never heard of. To these objections it is answered, that tho' the plot contained three articles, the two last only were essential, and of these the King was the head and contriver: that the article of killing the King, tho' placed first, was only consequent to, and depending upon, the two others. That this was only the attempt of some of the conspirators, who believed, there was no readier way to execute the plot, than by seting the duke of York upon the throne, who was less timerous, and more active and daring than his brother. That therefore there is no contradiction in the supposition, that the King was the head and author of the two designs, of subverting the government, and changing religion; and that the other was carried on by some persons without his privity, in order to advance the progress of the plot. That therefore the difficulty of this objection proceeds from the prepostrous joining the three articles when they ought to be separated, as on other occasions they are separated where they ought to be joined. As to the second objection, that it is impossible a King should plot against his subjects, it is drawn from the word plot, which is very rarely applicable to a Sovereign. But it is by no means impossible for a King of England, whose power is limited by law, to form a design of establishing an arbitrary and despotic government, as appears in the examples of Edward II, Richard II, James I, and Charles I. Now a man may refuse, if he pleases, to give to such a design the name of a plot. provided he does but own the reality of the thing.

4. Lastly, it will be necessary to premise, that there are three opinions concerning the reality or falsehood of this plot. The first is of those who believe it true in all its branches and circumstances. The second, of those who believe it absolutely false, and invented on purpose to exasperate the people against the King and the duke of York. The third, of those who believe it true with regard to the design of rendering the King absolute, and altering religion, but doubtful with respect to the design of killing the King, and who, after duly weighing the Pro and Con, think they ought to suspend their judgment on this article. I thought it necessary to arm my readers with these few observations against the prejudices they may have received in reading other historians, who scruple not, to disguise and curtail the facts; to pass over in silence such as are disadvantageous to them; to insist and lay great stress upon others; to insert in their relations, many stories admited by their party, but supported with no other authority; to add numberless insinuations founded only on their prejudices; in a word, to suppose continually what they have undertaken to prove. This would evidently appear in a formal disputation, but is very easy to be done in a continued narrative, where the writer inserts whatever he thinks fiting.

Charles II. An' 1678.

The twelfth of August (the day after the signing of the treaty of Nimeguen) dr. Ezrael Tonge, a London divine, applied himself to one Chrittopher Kirby (2), who had some interest at court, to tell the King, there was a plot against his person. Kirby discharging his commission the next day, while the King was walking in St. James's Park, the King ordered him to bring Tonge to him at eight that evening. Tonge came to Whitehall at the appointed time, and delivered to the King a writing or narrative, which, in forty-three articles, contained the particulars of a plot. His Majesty, after looking over it superficially, told Tonge, he was going to Windsor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the lord treasurer Danby, on whom he ordered him to attend next morning.

Tonge discovers the plot to the King. Oates's Narrat. Burnet. Echard. Burnet, p. 425.

Accordingly on the fourteenth of August, Tonge waited on the treasurer, who asked him if the paper left with the King, was an original or a copy. Tonge answered, it was a copy of a writing which had been thrown into his house without his privity: but fancied it was by a certain person who had often entertained him upon subjects of the like nature. Some days after Tonge returned to the treasurer, and told him, he knew the man, who had even put into his hands another narrative larger than the former, which he delivered to the treasurer. After the earl had looked over the paper, he asked Tonge, whether he knew the two men mentioned in the narrative, as the persons designed to kill the King, and went by the name of Honest William, and Pickering. Tonge answered, he knew them; that they frequently walked in the Park, and if a trusty person was appointed to go with him, he doubted not but he should have an opportunity of giving him a sight of them in a very short time. The treasurer asked, if he knew where they lodged, that they might be secured; Tonge answered he did not, but would indeavor to inform himself.

The treasurer having given his Majesty an account of what he had learned from Tonge, and of the contents of the two narratives, desired him at the ſame time, that a warrant might be ſent for apprehending honeſt William (1) and Pickering, and that ſome other members of the council be informed of an affair which concerned his Majeſty's life. But the King would neither ſuffer the two men to be apprehended, nor permit the earl to ſpeak of it to any perſon living, and particularly to the duke of York.

Who forbids the publication of it.

Some days after, Tonge ſent word to the lord treaſurer, that he knew where Honeſt William and Pickering lodged: moreover he ſaid, ſome of the intended aſſaſſins were to go within two days to Windſor; but that he would give notice of the time fixed for their journey, that they might be arreſted at their arrival: however a few days after, he pretended, the journey had been prevented by an accident to one of their horſes. The King from thence concluded the whole to be a fiction, and tho' the truth might eaſily have been diſcovered, by apprehending the two men whoſe lodgings were known, he would never permit, either that they ſhould be apprehended, or the affair communicated to any member of the council, ſaying, "He ſhould alarm "all England, and put thoughts of killing him "into people's heads who had no ſuch thoughts "before."

This reaſon being, as appears, very weak, it can only be infered from the King's conduct, that he believed not the plot, or had ſome intereſt to ſeem as if he did not believe it.

Forged letters directed to Bedingfield a Popiſh prieſt. Burnet, p. 425. Echard.

Three days after, Tonge writ to the earl of Danby, that a packet of letters was to go to the poſt-houſe in Windſor, directed to one Bedingfield a prieſt (2). The pacquet came indeed, and Bedingfield, after reading the letters, carried them to the duke of York, telling him, "He feared ſome "ill was intended him by the ſaid pacquet, be-"cauſe the letters therein ſeemed to be of a dan-"gerous nature, and that he was ſure they were "not the hand-writing of the perſons whoſe names "were ſubſcribed to the letters (3)." The King being more confirmed in the belief that there was nothing real in the pretended plot, ſeemed reſolved not to permit the papers or informations received from Tonge to be produced. But the duke of York was ſo very earneſt to have the letters, directed to Bedingfield, examined by the council, that the King at laſt conſented, and gave the treaſurer leave to declare at the ſame time the intelligence received from Tonge, and ſo the affair became public.

Hitherto I have not mentioned the famous Titus Oates, principal actor in this play, becauſe having reſolved to advance nothing but what I believe exactly true, I did not think proper to adopt whatever has been ſaid concerning him and his ſecret conferences with dr. Tonge, of which not a ſingle voucher is produced. However, I think myſelf obliged briefly to relate, what has been advanced by others, tho' with no other certainty than their own teſtimony.

Account of Titus Oates. Echard, Vol. III. p. 461.

"Titus Oates was the ſon of a ribbon-weaver, "who afterwards turning Anabaptiſt-preacher, and "being chaplain to a regiment of Cromwell's "forces in Scotland, was there clapt up in priſon "upon Overton's plot againſt that uſurper; but "having the fortune to eſcape upon the King's "reſtoration, he conformed to the church, and "got the living of Haſtings in Suſſex; where he "continued till he thought fit to return again "to his former Anabaptiſtical ſtation. This ſon of "his had his firſt education in Merchant-Taylor's "ſchool in London, and next in the univerſity of "Cambridge, where he was ſtudent in two col-"leges, Caius's and St. John's, and where he left "no reputation behind him for his parts or learn-"ing; tho' he ſeemed diſtinguiſhed for a tena-"cious memory, a plodding induſtry, and an un-"paralled aſſurance, beſide a particular canting "way that appeared in his academical exerciſes. "Removing from thence he ſlipt into orders, and "for a while officiated as curate to his father; after "which he injoyed a ſmall vicarage in Kent (4), "from whence he removed to another in Suſſex, "after that for ſome time got into the duke of "Norfolk's family, when he particularly ſided "with the Socinians at London; ſo that he be-"came very uncertain as to his principles and re-"ligion, and infamous as to his morals (5). In the "laſt year, 1667, being abandoned and deſtitute "of common neceſſaries, he fell into the acquain-"tance of dr. Ezrael Tonge, a city divine, a man "of letters, and a prolific head, filled with all the "Romiſh plots and conſpiracies ſince the reforma-"tion (6). This man was remarkable for his "parts and great reading, but of a reſtleſs and hu-"morous temper, full of variety of projects, and "ſcarce ever without a pen in his hand, and a plot "in his head. At firſt he ſeemed to entertain "Oates out of charity, who then went by the "name of Ambroſe; and complaining that he "knew not where to get bread, the doctor took "him to his houſe, and gave him cloaths, lodg-"ing and diet, and told him, "he would put "him in a way." After which, finding him a "bold undertaker, he perſuaded him to inſinuate "himſelf among the Papiſts, and get particular "acquaintance with them: which being effected, "he let him underſtand, that there had been "ſeveral plots in England to bring in Popery, "and if he would go beyond ſea among the je-"ſuits, and ſtrictly obſerve their ways, it was "poſſible there might be one at preſent; and if "he could make that out, it would be his pre-"ferment for ever: but however, if he could get "their names, and ſome informations from the "Papiſts, it would be eaſy to rouze people with "the fears of Popery."

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

Agreeably to this advice, Oates reconciled himſelf to the church of Rome, and moreover, according to ſome, entered into the jeſuits Society. In April 1677, he was ſent to Valladolid in Spain, where, after a ſtay of ſix months, he returned to England. A month after he went to St. Omers, the Engliſh ſeminary, for farther diſcoveries. In ſhort, the latter end of June, the ſame year, he returned to England, and repaired to his friend Tonge, furniſhed with materials picked up at St. Omers. Out of theſe materials Tonge and Oates, at ſeveral conferences together either at London, or in a hired houſe at Lambeth (1), framed the papers or narratives delivered by Tonge to the King and lord treaſurer Danby, as copies of what Oates had writen with his own hand.

I omit many circumſtances of what is ſaid to paſs between Tonge and Oates, which ſeem to ſuppoſe, either there was ſome third perſon who related all theſe particulars, or elſe, that one of the two diſcovered them before his death. The intent of this retical is, as may eaſily be ſeen, to ſhew, that Tonge and Oates were the inventors of this plot, which made ſo much noiſe afterwards, and never exiſted but in their heads. It muſt be owned, that if this was well proved, it would be a ſufficient evidence, that the plot diſcovered by Oates was a fiction. In the recital, appears Tonge a divine, who (having a prolific head filled with all the Romiſh plots and conſpiracies ſince the reformation) fancies it poſſible there may be one now on foot. He perſuades Oates to inſinuate himſelf among the Papiſts, turn Catholic, and be entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits, in order to have opportunity to make diſcoveries. Oates complies, returns from St. Omers, freighted with materials, out of which theſe two men draw up a narrative of a horrid plot againſt the King's perſon, the government, and the Proteſtant religion, and Tonge undertakes to deliver it to his Majeſty. If all this be true, there is need of no other proofs: this alone is ſufficient to demonſtrate that the plot was a fiction, and a chimera. Wherefore, if ever there is reaſon to give the readers ſome aſſurance of what is advanced, with ſo many circumſtances, it is in ſuch a caſe as this which alone decides the queſtion. But I muſt caution the reader, that thoſe who have advanced theſe facts, have not vouchſafed to give the leaſt proof. They have not ſaid, that they were received from ſuch or ſuch perſons then living. They have cited no authors before them, nor in ſhort produced one voucher of what they have advanced concerning facts, which naturally could come to their knowlege, but by ſome extraordinary means. It is a deſign managed between Tonge and Oates alone, without the intervention of any third perſon. It is certain, neither Oates nor Tonge revealed theſe pretended particulars before their deaths, or ever retracted their informations. It is therefore juſtly wiſhed, that thoſe who have reported their ſecret conferences with ſuch particular circumſtances, had produced ſome authority for what they have advanced.

What follows is the ſubſtance of the writing delivered by Tonge to the King, in form of a depoſition. Titus Oates was the ſpeaker, tho' he had not ſigned it, and tho' his name did not appear in it.

The Subſtance of T. Oates's Narrative.

"That in April 1677, the ſaid deponent was "imployed by Strange, the then provincial, Keins, "Fenwick, Harcourt, and other jeſuits in London, "to carry their letters to one father Suiman, an "Iriſh jeſuit, at Madrid in Spain: that in his jour-"ney he broke open the ſaid letters, and found "therein an account given of what jeſuits they had "ſent into Scotland, to incourage the Preſbyterians "to rebel; and that they feared not ſucceſs in "their deſigns, by reaſon of the King's being ſo "addicted to his pleaſures, and their intereſt in "the duke of York, &c. That he ſaw ſeveral "ſtudents ſent out of England to Valladolid, who "were obliged by the jeſuits of the college to re-"nounce their allegiance to his Majeſty of Great-"Britain; and that one Armſtrong, in a ſermon "to the ſtudents there, did affirm, that Charles "Stuart, the King of England, is no lawful King, "but comes of a ſpurious race, and that his father "was a black Scotſman, and not King Charles "the Firſt; with ſeveral other traiterous words "and correſpondences which he there diſcovered. "Being returned to England, where he made far-"ther diſcoveries, about the begining of Decem-"ber, the ſaid deponent was ſent with another trea-"ſonable letter, writen by Strange, and ſeveral "other jeſuits, to St. Omers, wherein was ex-"preſly mentioned their deſign to ſtab or poiſon "the King; and that they had received ten thou-"ſand pounds from la Chaiſe, which was in the "hands of one Worſly a goldſmith in London. "There was likewiſe incloſed a letter of thanks to "father la Chaiſe, which the deponent carried to "him from St. Omers to Paris. During this his "journey, and being abroad, he ſaw and read "many other letters, all tending to the ſame end "of cuting off the King, ſubverting the preſent "government of England, and reſtoring the Ro-"miſh religion; and they were ſo confident as in "ſome of them to ſay, 'That his Majeſty of Eng- p. 11. "land was brought to that paſs (that is ſo poſſeſſed "of their fidelity) that if any male-contents among "them ſhould not prove true, but offer to diſcover, "he would never believe them."

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

But one of the principal things he tells us in this narrative, was, "That in April 1678, he came over "from St. Omers with more jeſuits, to the grand "conſult which was held in May, by about fifty "jeſuits, at the White-horſe tavern in the Strand, "where they met and ploted their deſigns for their "ſociety: from whence they diſperſed into ſeveral "clubs, five or ſix in a company, where they "ſigned a' 'Reſolve for the death of the King,' "with the manner how it was to be done, which "the deponent, as a meſſenger, carried from one "company to another to be ſigned. Very ſhortly "after he returned to St. Omers, and towards the "end of June came back to England; where he "ſoon became privy to the treaty with Wakeman "to poiſon, and Honeſt William and Pickering "to ſhoot the King; and that he heard Keins a "jeſuit preach a ſermon to twelve perſons of qua-"lity in diſguiſe; wherein he aſſerted, 'That "Proteſtant and other heretical Princes were ipſo "facto depoſed, becauſe ſuch, and that it was as "lawful to deſtroy them, as an Oliver Cromwell, "or any other uſurper,' &c."

Beſide theſe new diſcoveries, he tells us, that he learned ſeveral other remarkable particulars from them, as, "That the late wars, and many other p. 23, 24. "miſchiefs were brought about by them; but "more particularly the dreadful fire in 1666, which "was principally managed by Strange the provin-"cial; in which their ſociety imployed eighty, or "eighty-ſix men, he could not tell which, and "ſpent ſeven hundred fire balls, and over and "above all their vaſt expenſe, they were fourteen "thouſand pounds gainers by the plunder, among "which was a box of jewels, conſiſting of a thou-"ſand caracts of diamonds. He farther learned "that the fire in Southwark, in the year 1676, was "brought about by the like means; and tho' in "that they were at the expenſe of a thouſand "pounds, they made a ſhift to get two thouſand "clear into their own pockets."

The council pays no regard to this diſcovery.

This depoſition as I before ſaid, was at length communicated to the council by the King's permiſſion. Probably, the King ſo managed, that the council took no great notice of this affair, and looked on the diſcovery as a forgery. After that, the lord treaſurer ſeeing he was clear of the buſineſs, ſince it was imparted to the council, would no longer hearken to Tonge, but when he came, diſmiſſed him, either unheard, or with obrobrious language. This made Tonge and Oates reſolve to bring the affair before the parliament. But as they had cauſe to fear, that the court would find means to ſuppreſs this depoſition, or repreſent it as a writing without name and authority, they applied to ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, a juſtice of peace in St. Martin's pariſh, and Oates requeſted him to receive his oath, that the paper which he put into his hands, contained matters of treaſon, and other high crimes. Godfrey was unwilling to grant their requeſt, and the rather, becauſe he was not ſuffered to read the particulars. But at laſt, Tonge depoſing on oath, that the ſame had been communicated to the King, Oates was ſworn, and a certificate given him. This was the ſixth of September.

The council examines the affair of the plot. Hiſt. of the plot. Echard. Burnet.

Sometime after, the King being returned to Whitehall, whether the council had been informed of the reſolution of Tonge and Oates, or feared to be accuſed of negligence, in an affair which concerned the King and the public, or from ſome other motive, they reſolved to examine into the bottom of this matter. To this end, the twenty-ſeventh of September, ſix weeks after the King received the firſt information, Tonge was ſent for by the council, but not appearing till the council was riſen, he was ordered to attend the next day. In this interval, Tonge took another copy of Oates's depoſition, and, it is pretended, inſerted ſeveral articles which were not in the firſt, but theſe new informations are not ſpecified. However, this was the copy which was afterwards publiſhed under the title of Oates's Narrative. This copy being finiſhed, Tonge and Kirkby carried it to ſir Edmundbury Godfrey the juſtice, and left it in his hands (1).

Next day, the council examined Tonge and Kirkby, and then ordered Oates to be called in. After their examination, Tonge and Oates had lodgings aſſigned them in Whitehall, by order of the council, with a guard for their ſecurity, and a weekly ſalary for their ſubſiſtence. At this time the privy-council for above a week, ſat twice a day on this affair, and imployed Oates, as he was the firſt diſcoverer of the plot, three days and nights to ſearch after and ſeize the perſons of the conſpirators, and ſecure their papers. By his means, and on his depoſitions, were arreſted, ſir George Wakeman, the Queen's phyſician; mr. Edward Colman, the duke of York's ſecretary; mr. Richard Langhorn, Thomas Whitebread, John Gawen, Anthony Turner, William Ireland, William Marſhal, William Rumley, James Corker, Thomas Pickering, and many others. The eight laſt were Romiſh prieſts or jeſuits. In Coleman's houſe letters were found which greatly confirmed Oates's teſtimony, and will be hereafter remembered (2).

Conſternation of the people.

Tho' no particulars of the plot had yet been publiſhed, the people were informed in general, that the deſign of it was to kill the King, ſubvert the government, and change the eſtabliſhed religion. The impriſonment of ſo great a number of Roman Catholics, ſuggeſted that they were at leaſt ſuſpected of being concerned. This was ſufficient to make them believed the ſole authors of the plot; and an accident, a few days after, ſo confirmed this belief, that nothing was able to ſhake it. This was, that ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, who had ſworn Oates to his narrative, after having being miſſed four days, was found dead in a ditch about a mile out of London (3), with his ſword thro' his body, his cane and gloves by him, rings upon his fingers, and money in his pocket (4). The coroners inqueſt ſat upon the body, but meeting with ſome difficulties adjourned to the day following, when upon the declaration of the ſurgeons, they gave up their verdict, "That he was murdered by certain perſons unknown to the jurors, and that his death proceeded from ſuffocation and ſtrangling (5); and that his ſword had been thruſt thro' his body ſome time after his death, and when he was quite cold, becauſe not the leaſt ſign of blood was ſeen upon his ſhirt, or his clothes, or the place where he was found." Tho' it was poſſible, this murder might not have been commited by the Papiſts, they were ſo readily and publicly accuſed, that it was not ſafe to deny it, and that the people drew from it an invincible proof of the plot, and the aſſurance of the Papiſts being the authors. It was not conceived, what intereſt the Proteſtants could have to murder this juſtice, but it was obvious that the Papiſts might do it in revenge for his ſwearing Oates to his narrative. The Catholics in their then ſituation dared not vindicate themſelves. The people were univerſally incenſed againſt them, and the court would not openly protect them. It paſſed therefore for certain, that the Papiſts were Godfrey's murderers. Of this will hereafter appear poſitive evidence. A few years after, the face of affairs being changed, the Papiſts, and friends of the court, found means to give another turn to this murder. Firſt, they raiſed ſtrong objections to invalidate the depoſitions of the witneſſes. Secondly, they obſerved, that the death of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey could be of no great advantage to them, ſince he only ſwore Oates to his narrative, and from that time to his death meddled no more. Thirdly, they inſinuated, that Godfrey had murdered himſelf, out of fear of being hanged for not diſcovering ſooner what he knew. Fourthly, and on this they chiefly inſiſted, they pretended that Godfrey had been murdered by the Proteſtants, in order to throw the odium of his death upon the Papiſts. Now as the Papiſts had no intereſt to publiſh this murder, it is pretended, that his death was concealed till the body was found, and then publiſhed by thoſe who commited the deed, in order to charge the Catholics with it. But tho' it were true, that the whole city was filled with the rumor of Godfrey's murder the day after he diſappeared, it ſeems to me, that the conſequence drawn from thence would not be neceſſary. Thus much is certain, Godfrey was murdered, and the Papiſts were charged with the deed, as long as the Proteſtant party prevailed; but when the face of affairs was altered, the court party did, and ſtill do, accuſe the Proteſtants of it (6).

Octob. 20. H. Care. Echard.

However this be, the King, who was then at Newmarket, returning to London to hold the parliament, publiſhed a proclamation, with the promiſe of five hundred pounds reward to the diſcoverer of the murderers of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey. But as this proclamation had but little effect, it being ſuggeſted that the diſcoverers would be in danger of an aſſaſſination; the King publiſhed a ſecond, with an aſſurance of his protection to thoſe who ſhould bring this matter to light (1).

The treaſurer communicates the plot to the council. Echard.

Mean while the King was extremely perplexed. He had at firſt indeavored to ſtifle the noiſe of this conſpiracy, by concealing it from his very council; but was forced at laſt to conſent it ſhould be communicated to them: and the ſteps taken by Tonge and Oates, in puting the depoſition into the hands of a juſtice, had obliged the council to take precautions alſo for their own ſakes, in cauſing many perſons to be arreſted. The murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey happening upon this, and the whole kingdom being alarmed at it, there was no poſſibility of ſtifling the noiſe of the plot, which had now reached the moſt diſtant parts. The King therefore reſolved to take the only courſe left, which was to prevent, if poſſible, this affair from coming before the parliament. He was not ignorant of the diſaffection of the commons. The tranſactions of the laſt ſummer ſhewed, that he was ſuſpected of deſigns detrimental to church and ſtate, and all his proceedings had given but too juſt cauſe for this ſuſpicion. He therefore very juſtly feared, that the parliament would examine into the bottom of this plot; and, under a pretenſe of taking care of his perſon, diſcover many things which were not yet to be revealed. For, as I have remarked, this plot contained three articles, viz. the three deſigns of killing the King; ſubverting the government; and changing the eſtabliſhed religion. In all likelihood, the King believed not the firſt, but could not be ignorant of the two laſt. Nay, his whole deportment had made this ſo clear, that all the kingdom was in a manner convinced of it. Therefore to avoid ſo dangerous a diſcuſſion; he reſolved to take from the parliament the examination of the plot. To this end he expreſly commanded the earl of Danby, his prime miniſter, not to acquaint the two houſes with what had paſſed thro' his hands, and reſolved ſo to order it, that every thing concerning the plot ſhould be left to the law, believing it would be much eaſier for him to manage the judges than the parliament.

The King indeavors to conceal it from the parliament.

Echard, Vol III. p. 472.

The twenty-firſt of October the King opened the eighteenth ſeſſion of this parliament with the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's ſpeech to both houſes. Kennet.

"I Have thought the time very long ſince we parted laſt, and would not have defered your meeting by ſo many prorogations, if I could well have met you ſooner. The part which I had this ſummer in the preſervation of our neighbors, and the well ſecuring what was left of Flanders, is ſufficiently known, and acknowleged by all that are abroad. And tho' for this cauſe I have been obliged to keep up my troops, without which our neighbors had abſolutely deſpaired; yet both the honor and the intereſt of the nation have been ſo far improved by it, that I am confident no man here would repine at it, or think the money raiſed for their diſbanding, to have been ill imployed in their continuance; and I do aſſure you, I am ſo much more out of purſe for that ſervice, that I expect you ſhould ſupply it. How far it may be neceſſary, conſidering the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom, to reduce the land and ſea forces, or to what degree, is worthy of all our ſerious conſiderations.

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

"I now intend to acquaint you (as I ſhall always do with any thing that concerns me) that I have been informed of a deſign againſt my perſon by the jeſuits, of which I ſhall forbear any opinion, leaſt I may ſeem to ſay too much or too little: but I will leave the matter to the law, and in the mean time will take as much care as I can, to prevent all manner of practiſes by that ſort of men, and of others too, who have been tampering in a high degree by foreigners, and contriving how to introduce Popery among us. I ſhall conclude with recommending to you my other concerns. I have been under great diſappointments by the defect of the poll bill. My revenue is under great anticipations, and at beſt was never equal to the conſtant and neceſſary expenſe of the government, whereof I intend to have the whole ſtate laid before you, and require you to look into it, and conſider of it, with that duty and affection which I am ſure I ſhall ever find from you. The reſt I leave to the lord chancellor."

The earl of Danby communicates the plot to the commons, Echard, Vol. III. p. 472.

The King by his precautions had hoped to prevent the parliament from taking cognizance of the plot. But the earl of Danby broke all his meaſures, by communicating to the commons, the very firſt day, Oates's narrative. It was believed, he was either afraid of being called to an account, if he concealed from the parliament an affair of ſuch importance, which had paſſed thro' his hands, or was willing to ingratiate himſelf with that houſe, in which he had many powerful enemies. The King was highly provoked with a procedure ſo contrary to his orders and deſigns, and gave him a ſevere reprimand; but the thing was without remedy.

The commons, having communicated theſe informations to the lords, labored inceſſantly upon the affair of the plot. For ſome days they ſat from morning till late at night, and took extreme care to keep the minutes and votes of the houſe from being divulged. The lords were no leſs vigilant; ſo that in two or three days, both houſes preſented three addreſſes to the King, The firſt was, to pray him to appoint a faſt. The ſecond, to require the removal of all Popiſh recuſants out of London. The third, to pray the King's order to the lord chamberlain, that no unknown perſon might have acceſs to his Majeſty.

Three addreſſes from the houſe to the King. Kennet. Echard.

Theſe three addreſſes it muſt be obſerved, were all founded upon the diſcovery of the plot, and that both houſes did not confine it to the ſingle deſign of killing the King, but expreſly added the two others, of ſubverting the government, and changing the religion eſtabliſhed. This is a remark which is to ſerve for the whole proceſs of this affair. For the two houſes did never ſeparate theſe three articles, a clear evidence that they believed the plot was not confined as ſome would inſinuate to the deſign of killing the King.

Oates examined by the commons. H. Care. Echard, Vol. III. p. 474.

The ſame day that the third addreſs was preſented,

(1) Sir Edmundbury's corpſe being embalmed, was kept till October 31, when it was carried, in a very ſolemn manner, from Bridewel hoſpital, of which he was one of the governors, to the church of St. Martin's in the Fields, where he was buried. The pall was ſupported by eight knights, all juſtices of peace. All the aldermen of the city attended the funeral. Seventy-two London miniſters marched two and two before the body. And great multitudes followed after, in the ſame order. An excellent ſermon, ſuitable to the occaſion, was preached, on 2 Samuel iii, 34, by dr. William Lloyd, vicar of St. Martin's. Kennet, p. 352. Relat. &c.

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

viz. the twenty-fourth of October, three days after the opening of the ſeſſion, Oates was examined in the houſe of commons ſix or ſeven hours. After his examination, he was ſeveral times interrogated, according to cuſtom, "Whether he knew any thing "more of the plot, or any other perſon concerned "in it, than what he had already mentioned;" to which he ſolemnly anſwered, "He did not." And yet, he afterwards added ſeveral things to this depoſition. As this is one of the objections againſt Oates's evidence, it will not be improper to inform the reader of what has been ſaid for and againſt it.

An objection againſt Oates remarked upon.

It is ſaid firſt, that Oates having been examined upon oath by the houſe of commons, and having affirmed, he knew no more of the plot, could not afterwards add new depoſitions againſt other perſons, without perjury. To improve this objection, it is likewiſe ſaid, he was ſolemnly interrogated, whether he knew any thing more; and that he anſwered as ſolemnly he did not. But this word ſolemnly is only uſed to aggravate the imputation of perjury. For it will be readily granted, that a witneſs, at his firſt hearing, is not aſked, whether he knows any thing more, with greater ſolemnity than the other queſtions, upon which he has depoſed. Beſide to this objection it is replied, that the oath taken by Oates, before he was interrogated, properly reached only to the facts which he was to depoſe, and not to the queſtion after his depoſition, whether he knew any thing more of the plot? So the charge of perjury vaniſhes, unleſs it be proved, that he was again ſworn upon the laſt interrogation.

Burnet, p. 430.

It is in the ſecond place anſwered, that this objection being made to Oates on another occaſion, he ſaid, that having been three days and three nights without ſleep when he was examined by the commons, and the examination laſting above ſix hours, it was not ſtrange, that at the firſt hearing he ſhould not recollect all he knew. I leave the reader to conſider the objection and anſwer.

Echard refuted in relation to Oates, Vol. III. p. 474.

And here I cannot forbear obſerving a fallacy put on his readers by a celebrated hiſtorian, in ſaying, "That he began ſo much to abound with "new diſcoveries, that ſome began to ſuſpect his "veracity. Therefore (adds the hiſtorian) to put "an end to all ſuch doubtings, on the thirty-firſt "of October, the commons reſolved, 'Nemine "contradicente.' That upon the evidence that has "already appeared to this houſe, this houſe is of "opinion, 'That there is, and hath been a dam-"nable and helliſh plot contrived and carried on "by Popiſh recuſants, for aſſaſſinating and mur-"dering the King, for ſubverting the government, "and rooting out and deſtroying the Proteſtant "religion."

A vote of the commons. Kennet. p. 352.

Beſide that this author in deſcribing for ſole motive to the commons the deſire of terminating all doubts concerning Oates's veracity, boldly accuſes them of not acting uprightly, it may be demonſtratively proved, that this could not be their motive, ſince the witneſs added nothing to his firſt depoſition in the ſix days between his examination and the vote of that houſe. I was willing to make this remark, to ſhew, with how great caution the hiſtorians who have writ of the affairs of that time, ſhould be read.

Ibid.

The commons having paſſed this vote, 'Nemine contradicente,' they ordered, "That this vote be "communicated to the lords at a conference, and "that the lords be deſired to join with this houſe, "in providing remedies for the preſervation of his "Majeſty's perſon and government, and the Pro-"teſtant religion." Two days after, in a conference between the two houſes, upon the ſubject of the laſt vote of the commons, this report was made,

The lords concur with it.

"The lords have conſidered the vote of the houſe "of commons communicated to them at the con-"ference, and have moſt readily and unanimouſly "concurred with them in it, 'Nemine contradi-"cente;' and their lordſhips are very glad to ſee "that zeal which the commons have ſhewed upon "this occaſion, and do fully concur with them, "'That the moſt ſpeedy and ſerious conſiderations "of both houſes are neceſſary for prevention of "the imminent dangers.' In order whereunto "their lordſhips have reſolved to ſit 'de die in "diem,' forenoon and afternoon, and deſire that "the houſe of commons will do the ſame."

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

A preſumption for the reality of the plot.

If this does not prove the plot to be real, it proves at leaſt, that both houſes believed it ſo, ſince there was not the leaſt diviſion upon this article. Therefore to deny that the plot was real, it muſt be allowed, either that all the members of both houſes were groſsly miſtaken, or that they acted in a ſpirit of prejudice and party, to fatigue the court. But why ſhould they be thought to trouble the court, if the King was not ſuſpected to have been the principal author of the plot, tho', doubtleſs, he was not concerned in the firſt article relating to the attempt on his life, which, as I have ſaid, was only an appendix of the plot, or at leaſt conſidered as ſuch.

Several conſpirators apprehended, of which five were Popiſh lords. Octob. 14. Hiſt. of the plot. Echard.

The ſame day the commons examined Oates, they ſent for the lord chief juſtice Scrogs, who took his examination upon oath, and in the houſe ſealed twenty-ſix warrants for apprehending ſo many perſons whom he had ſworn againſt, among whom were the lords Powis, Strafford, Arundel of Wardour, Petre, Bellaſis, and ſir Henry Tichbourn baronet, all Papiſts, who were ſent to the Tower, and the reſt to ſeveral priſons.

Proclamation againſt Papiſts.

The King was ſo perſuaded of his being ſuſpected, that he thought himſelf obliged to ſeem equally convinced with the parliament of the danger. To remove therefore this ſuſpicion, he publiſhed a proclamation in theſe word: "The lords and commons "having taken into their ſerious conſideration, the "bloody and traiterous deſigns of Popiſh recuſants, "againſt his Majeſty's ſacred perſon and govern-"ment, and the Proteſtant religion; therefore he "commanded them all, except ſetled houſe-keepers, "that would take the oaths of allegiance and ſu-"premacy, to depart the cities of London and "Weſtminſter, and all places within ten miles diſ-"tant from the ſame."

The Papiſts accordingly departed out of London; tho' for ſo ſhort a ſpace, that in leſs than a fortnight they returned again; whether they had leave from their leaders to take the oaths, or knew ſuch proclamations were never ſtrictly executed.

Another relating to the King's guards. Novemb. 2. Kennet, p. 352.

Beſide this, the King being ſenſible, that among his foot and horſe guards, there were many Papiſts, and new converts to the Romiſh religion, declared in council, and publiſhed an order, with a promiſe of twenty pounds ſterling, to whoever ſhould make diſcovery of any officer or ſoldier, in his horſe or foot guards, who having taken the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and the late teſt, had ſince been converted to the Romiſh religion.

Not ſatisfied with theſe ſlight precautions, the commons prepared a bill to prevent the danger from ſo many Papiſts ſiting in parliament, and particularly in the houſe of lords.

Id. p. 353. Echard.

But this was only a preparative for the more eaſy prevention of the danger with which religion was threatened, from the hopes conceived by the Papiſts of ſeeing the duke of York on the throne after his brother, who neither had, nor expected to have, any legitimate iſſue. This danger cauſed ſeveral members of the commons, to form the project of a bill for excluding the duke of York from the ſucceſſion to the crown: but this was done by degrees. On the fourth of November, a debate was ſuffered to ariſe in the houſe for an addreſs to his Majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to remove the duke of

of York from his perſon and counſels. But this debate was adjourned to the eighth, and afterwards to the twelfth of the month.

The King perceiving the intent of the commons, came to the parliament the ninth of November, and ſending for the commons, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Kennet, p. 353. Echard.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Am ſo very ſenſible of the great and extraordinary care you have already taken, and ſtill continue to ſhow, for the ſafety and preſervation of my perſon in theſe times of danger, that I could not ſatisfy myſelf without coming hither on purpoſe to give you all my moſt hearty thanks for it. Nor do I think it enough to give you my thanks only, but I hold myſelf obliged to let you ſee withal, that I do as much ſtudy your preſervation too, as I can poſſibly; and that I am as ready to join with you, in all the ways and means that may eſtabliſh a firm ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, as your own hearts can wiſh: and this not only during my time (of which I am ſure you have no fear) but in future ages, even to the end of the world. And therefore I am come to aſſure you, that whatever reaſonable bills you ſhall preſent to be paſſed into laws, to make you ſafe in the reign of any ſucceſſor (ſo as they tend not to impeach the right of ſucceſſion, nor the deſcent of the crown in the true line, and ſo as they reſtrain not my power, nor the juſt rights of any Proteſtant ſucceſſor) ſhall find from me a ready concurrence. And I deſire you withal, to think of ſome more effectual means for the conviction of Popiſh recuſants, and to expedite your counſels as faſt as you can, that the world may ſee our unanimity, and that I may have the opportunity of ſhewing you, how ready I am to do any thing that may give comfort and ſatisfaction to ſuch dutiful and loyal ſubjects."

Bedloe a ſecond witneſs in the plot. Hiſt. of the Plot. Burnet, p. 431. Echard. R. Coke.

During theſe tranſactions, one William Bedloe, who took upon him the title of captain Bedloe, becauſe he had ſerved in the Low-Countries (1), going from London to Briſtol, wrote to ſecretary Coventry from Newbury, that he had many ſecrets to diſcover, and therefore deſired that he might be arreſted on his arrival at Briſtol, and ſent to London. If I do not inſert all that has been ſaid againſt Bedloe by certain hiſtorians, it is their fault, becauſe they have given no authority for what they advanced, nor do I think myſelf obliged to copy implicitly from authors who wrote forty years after the events, and have not thought proper to allege the leaſt proof of what they aſſert. I ſhall however briefly ſay, that they ſpeak of Bedloe as of the greateſt villain that ever lived.

Bedloe was apprehended at Briſtol, according to his deſire, and brought to London the ſixth of November, when the parliament was very buſy upon the affair of the plot. A guard was immediately aſſigned him for his ſecurity, and a penſion for his ſubſiſtence, with a lodging at Whitehall. The King was preſent at his examination before the two ſecretaries of ſtate. He declared he had been bred a Proteſtant of the church of England, but within two years perſuaded by the jeſuits to turn Catholic. He ſaid, "He knew that ſir Edmundbury Godfrey "was murdered in Somerſet-Houſe," but it is pretended, he ſolemnly declared upon oath his ignorance of the plot then in queſtion. But as I ſaid, facts ſupported by no authority deſerve little credit (2). It is added, that the very next day, being examined by the houſe of lords, "He thought "fit, upon new incouragement, to be more open, "and launch out into the depths of the plot, with "a new and ſupplemental evidence." It is eaſy to perceive the tendency of ſuch inſinuations deſtitute of authority. Charles II. An' 1678. Echard.

His depoſitions.

However this be, Bedloe declared to the lords, that Walſh and le Phaire, two jeſuits concerned in the murder of Godfrey, informed him, "That "the lord Bellaſis had a commiſſion to command "forces in the North, the earl of Powis in "South-Wales, and the lord Arundel of Wardour had a commiſſion from the Pope to grant "commiſſions to whom he pleaſed: That Coleman had been a great agitator in the deſign "againſt the King." He was aſked, if he knew Oates, and he poſitively denied it; but afterwards pretended, he knew him by the name of Ambroſe.

The next day, the two houſes obtained from the King a proclamation againſt Walſh, le Phaire, Conyers, Simonds, Pritchard, and Caſtaway, but none of them could be apprehended.

His ſecond depoſition.

The twelfth of November, Bedloe was examined a ſecond time in the houſe of lords. The ſubſtance of what he ſaid was, "That the monks of Douay "firſt told him the deſign; and, after four ſacra"ments of ſecreſy, they ſent him to Harcourt a "jeſuit in Duke-ſtreet, London, who provided "for him, and ſent him to Paris, &c. That "le Phaire, Walſh, Pritchard and Lewis, told "him what lords were to govern, what men were "to be raiſed; particularly forty thouſand to be "ready in London: what ſuccors were to be ex"pected, viz. ten thouſand from Flanders, twenty "or thirty thouſand religious men and pilgrims "from St. Jago in Spain; that Hull was to be "ſurprized; and that, juſt in the critical time the "plot was to be diſcovered; that le Phaire gave "him a ſacrament of ſecreſy; and they told him, "who and who were to be killed, and the men "that were to do the work. Le Phaire ſaid further, that Conyers was my lord Bellaſis's con"feſſor, and communicated his orders; and that "they were reſolved, 'If any plotters were taken, "to diſpatch them before they could be brought "to trial, or to burn the priſon.' That le Phaire, "Pritchard, Lewis, Keins, and Walſh, and others, "had often told him, that there was not a Roman "Catholic in England of any quality or credit, "but was acquainted with this deſign of the Papiſts, and had received the ſacrament from their "father confeſſors, to be ſecret and aſſiſtant in the "carrying it on: that the part aſſigned him, was "to bring and carry orders and counſels, and all "other intelligences from one army to another, upon all occaſions, he knowing every part and "road of England and Wales."

After this depoſition, the lords having conjured Bedloe to ſpeak nothing but the truth, he did "In Hiſt. of the Plot. p. 127.——Burnet ſays, Bedloe had led a very vicious life. He had gone by many falſe names, by which he had cheated many perſons. A prolamation againſt the Papiſts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 478.

Bedloe's depoſition, which was communicated to the commons, greatly alarmed the parliament and people. Accordingly the effect of it was ſuch, that the King, to avoid being ſuſpected of having any concern in the plot, publiſhed a proclamation the twelfth of November, " Whereby all Romiſh re- " cuſants, and ſuch reputed, were injoined, under " the penalty of the laws, to repair to their own " houſes, and not remove more than five miles " from thence without licenſe." But the commons did not think this proclamation ſufficient to free them from their apprehenſions. The ſame day they preſented an addreſs to the King, praying,

The commons addreſs the King. Kennet, p. 353.

" That a ſpecial commiſſion may be iſſued forth, for " tendering the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy " to all the ſervants of his Majeſty, and his Royal " Highneſs, and to all other perſons (except her " Majeſty's Portugal ſervants) reſiding within the " palaces of Whitehall, St. James's, and Somerſet- " houſe, and all other his Majeſty's houſes; and " that there may be likewiſe ſpecial commiſſions " iſſued forth, for tendering the ſaid oaths to all " perſons reſiding within the two Serjeants-inns, " all the inns of court, and inns of chancery."

His anſwer.

The King returned an anſwer in writing, that he granted their requeſt, with exception of the menial ſervants of the Queen and ducheſs, who were ſo very inconſiderable in their number, and within the articles of marriage. He added, " That he could " not but take notice, that in a late addreſs from " the houſe of peers, the menial ſervants of the " Queen and ducheſs were excepted, and that he " hoped the commons would proceed with the ſame " moderation as to that particular." This anſwer was not ſatisfactory, and therefore they inſiſted in a ſecond addreſs, " That the perſons excepted in " his Majeſty's meſſage, might be comprehended " in the ſame commiſſion, for which they gave " ſome reaſons." But before his Majeſty had anſwered this addreſs, there happened an accident which put the commons much out of humor.

The commons ſend ſecretary Williamſon to the Tower. Ibid.

The eighteenth of November, they were informed, that ſeveral commiſſions had been granted to Popiſh recuſants, and warrants alſo that they ſhould be muſtered, notwithſtanding they had not taken the oaths, nor ſubſcribed the declaration according to the act of parliament; and that they were counter-ſigned by ſir Joſeph Williamſon, ſecretary of ſtate. Upon this information, Williamſon * was immediately ſent to the Tower. This highly offended the King, who the next day ſent for the commons to attend him in the Banqueting-houſe in Whitehall, where in a ſpeech he told them plainly, " That tho' they had commited his ſer- " vant, without acquainting him; yet he intended " to deal more freely with them, and acquaint " them with his intention to releaſe his ſecretary;" which accordingly he did that very day. Upon this the commons preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty, with the reaſons of their proceedings in the commitment of the ſecretary. They ſaid, " 1. And we do further moſt humbly deſire " your Majeſty, to recall all commiſſions granted " to all Papiſts within the kingdom of England " and Ireland, or any other of your Majeſty's do- " minions and territories."

To this the King anſwered, " That he had " releaſed mr. ſecretary Williamſon before their " addreſs came, and promiſed to recall all his com- " miſſions whatſoever given to Papiſts, or reputed " Papiſts."

If the King had not ſome ſecret deſign, it muſt be confeſſed, he ill-timed theſe commiſſions while the Popiſh plot made ſo much a noiſe, and the parliament was imployed in examining into it. But this is a myſtery which is not yet cleared. However, the affair was carried no farther.

A proclamation againſt Romiſh prieſts or Jeſuits. Kennet. Echard.

About this time, the bill to diſable Papiſts from ſiting in parliament, paſſed the commons, and afterwards the lords, tho' with more difficulty (1). The King likewiſe publiſhed a proclamation, offering a reward " to any one who ſhould diſcover " or apprehend a Romiſh prieſt or jeſuit."

The King demands money. Nov. 25. Kennet, p. 354.

Mean time, the King finding the commons delayed to grant him money, came to the parliament, and, after a repetition of ſome things mentioned in his firſt ſpeech, he deſired them, either to grant him money to continue his forces in Flanders, or to diſband them. Whereupon, the commons, who ſaw with uneaſineſs ſo formidable an army on foot in ſuch a juncture, reſolved, nemine contradicente, " That all the forces raiſed ſince the twenty-ninth " of September 1677, ſhould be diſbanded:"

The commons reſolve to diſband the forces. Echard, Vol. III. p. 481.

(1) Kennet ſays, The commons were ſo zealous for this bill, that they voted it to be a bill, " Upon which the ſafety of " King and kingdom, and the Proteſtant religion, did intirely depend." And when it was like to ſtick in the houſe of lords, the commons deſired them, by a meſſage, to proceed ſpeedily on it; elſe, they would think themſelves unable to prepare any effectual remedies, to prevent the evils that hung over them, p. 357. Echard on the other hand, ſays, the bill paſſed the houſe of lords with ſome little amendments, and a particular clauſe in favor of the duke of York. But the greateſt ſtruggle about it was chiefly in the houſe of commons when it was ſent back, tho' it was paſſed there alſo with the ſaid alterations. In the debate, ſir Jonathan Trelawny and mr. Aſh being violently heated, and opprobrious words paſſing between them, ſir Jonathan gave Aſh a box on the ear, which being returned by Aſh with a ſlap on the face, they both began to draw. Whereupon ſir Jonathan was ſent to the Tower, and Aſh publicly reprimanded by the ſpeaker. Vol. III. p. 480. This bill conſiſted of a teſt againſt Popery, in which tranſubſtantiation was not only renounced, but the worſhip of the Virgin Mary and the Saints, as practiſed in the church of Rome, was declared to be idolatrous. Gunning, biſhop of Ely, maintained the church of Rome was not idolatrous. He was anſwered by Barlow, biſhop of Lincoln. However, Gunning took the teſt. The duke ſpoke on the clauſe for excepting himſelf, with tears in his eyes, proteſting, that whatever his religion might be, it ſhould only be a private thing between God and his own ſoul, and no effect of it ſhould ever appear in the government. Burnet, p. 435.

Charles II. An' 1678.

To which purpoſe they preſented an addreſs to his Majeſty.

At the ſame time, the commons had before them a bill, "For raiſing a third part of the militia to "be in conſtant arms for a time," which with amendments was ſent up to the lords, and there paſſed.

The thirtieth of November the King gave the Royal aſſent to the bill, "For diſabling Papiſts "from ſiting in either houſe of parliament," and ſhowed himſelf very willing to recal his forces from Flanders. But the militia bill he abſolutely rejected, alleging, "That it was to put the militia out of "his power, which thing he would not do, no "not for one hour; but if the commons would "aſſiſt him with money for that purpoſe, he would "take care to raiſe ſuch a part of the militia as "ſhould ſecure the peace of the government and "his own perſon." But the parliament thought not fit to accept his propoſal.

The militia bill rejected.

As the King was convinced of the unanimity of the two houſes concerning the reality of the plot, he had thought proper to feign a no leſs fear of the danger the church and ſtate were in. And this is what father Orleans can hardly forgive in him, ſaying, "his diſſimulation was made uſe of to the "commiting of much injuſtice." But the King found himſelf in no condition to oppoſe the torrent, which run ſo violently againſt the Papiſts. As he knew himſelf ſuſpected of being concerned in the plot, his whole policy was ingaged to remove that jealouſy, the which he ſaw both houſes were too apt to believe. So, without unſeaſonably affecting an indiſcreet zeal for a religion which he publicly diſowned, he calmly left the Papiſts expoſed to the reſentment of the parliament, for fear of his own ruin by an oppoſite conduct. For this reaſon it was, that he ſuffered the conſpirators to be brought to their trials (1).

Coleman's trial. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 656.

Edward Coleman, ſecretary to the duke of York was firſt tried, the twenty-ſeventh of November, at the King's-bench bar, before the lord chief-juſtice Scroggs. The witneſſes produced againſt him were Oates and Bedloe. The firſt depoſed,

The ſubſtance of Oates's evidence againſt Coleman.

"1. That in November 1677, being brought "acquainted with the priſoner by father John "Keins, then the deponent's confeſſor, who "lodged at mr. Coleman's houſe, he carried ſome "letters from him to St. Omers, which he ſaw "opened when he came there. In them were trea-"ſonable expreſſions againſt the King, calling him "tyrant, &c. And a letter in Latin incloſed to "father la Chaiſe, to whom Oates carried it from "St. Omers to Paris, in which there were thanks "returned for the ten thouſand pounds by him re-"mited to England, for the propagation of the "Catholic religion, and promiſing it ſhould be "imployed for no other purpoſe, but that for "which it was ſent, viz. To cut off the King "of England, as appeared by the letter of la Chaiſe, "to which all this was an anſwer, and which "Oates ſaw and read.

"2. That Coleman was concerned in the deſign "of killing the King; for when, at the jeſuits "great conſult, on the twenty-fourth of April, "which afterwards divided into ſeveral clubs, it "was reſolved that Pickering and Grove ſhould "take off his Majeſty by ſhooting, or other means; "this reſolve was communicated to Coleman, in "Oates's hearing, at Wild-houſe, who did approve "thereof, and ſaid, 'It is well contrived.'

"3. That in Auguſt 1678, Coleman was pre-"ſent at a conſult with the Jeſuits and Benedictine "monks at the Savoy, for raiſing a rebellion in "Ireland, for which forty thouſand black bills "as arms were provided; and was very forward to "have dr. Fogarthy ſent over to poiſon the duke "of Ormond: and at another time, being in Fen-"wick's chamber, in Drury-lane, Coleman ſaid "to him, in Oates's hearing, 'That he had found "a way to tranſmit two hundred thouſand pounds "to carry on the rebellion in Ireland.'

Charles II. An' 1678.

"4. That in the month of Auguſt, Coleman "knew of the four Iriſh ruffians ſent to kill the "King at Windſor; and in Oates's hearing, aſked "father Harcourt at Wild-houſe, 'What care was "taken for thoſe gentlemen that went laſt night to "Windſor?' Who replied, 'That eighty pounds "was ordered them,' which he ſaw there on the "table, moſt of it in guineas; and that Coleman "was ſo zealous that he gave a guinea to the meſ-"ſenger who was to carry the money to expedite "the buſineſs.

"5. That in July 1678, Coleman was privy "to the inſtructions brought by Aſhley, rector of "St. Omers, from father Whitebread, to impower "the conſultors to propoſe ten thouſands pounds to "ſir George Wakeman to poiſon the King, pro-"vided Pickering and Grove failed to do the work: "that Coleman had read and copied thoſe inſtruc-"tions, and tranſmited them to ſeveral others of "the conſpirators, who were gathering contribu-"tions about the kingdom, who would be more "incouraged to give largely, both becauſe they "were aſſured the buſineſs would ſoon be diſpatched, "and that they might ſee they had aſſiſtance from "beyond ſeas; and that Coleman was ſo far from "diſappointing this treaſon, that he ſaid, 'It was "too little, and thought it neceſſary to give five "thouſand pounds more, to make the buſineſs "ſure.'

"6. That in April 1678, Oates ſaw Coleman's "patent or commiſſion to be ſecretary of ſtate, "from Paulus de Oliva, general of the ſociety of "Jeſuits, by virtue of a brief from the Pope, "and he knew the hand perfectly well; and in "Fenwick's chamber he ſaw Coleman open it, and "heard him ſay, 'It was a good exchange.' Laſt "of all, Oates being aſked how many came over "in April to the grand conſult, and how many "prieſts and jeſuits had been in England at one "time? He ſaid, He could not exactly remember "their numbers, but, to his knowledge, there had "been in England, at the ſame time, a hundred and "ſixty ſecular prieſts, eighty jeſuits, and by name "in the catalogue above three hundred.

Bedloe depoſed,

Bedloe's evidence.

"1. That he knew not of any commiſſion to "mr. Coleman; but that ſir Henry Tichbourn had "told him, That he brought a commiſſion for him "to be principal ſecretary of ſtate, when he brought "over the reſt of the commiſſions for the lords and "others, from the principal jeſuits at Rome, by "order of the Pope.

"2. That in April 1675, he carried over a large "packet of letters from Coleman to father la "Chaiſe, about carrying on the plot, and brought "back an anſwer: and on May the twenty-fourth "or twenty-fifth, 1677, he received another packet "of Coleman's, to carry to Paris to the Engliſh "monks; and that he had received money to carry "on the deſign to ſubvert the government of Eng-"land, 'to free England from damnation and ig-"norance, and to free all Catholics from the hard "tyranny and oppreſſion of heretics.'

(1) On the twenty firſt of November, William Stayley, a goldſmith, was tried for treaſonable words againſt the King, and executed November the twenty-ſixth. State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 652.

"3. That

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

" 3. That upon Bedloe's return with anſwers to " the laſt letters, which were delivered to Coleman " by Harcourt, he heard the priſoner, at his " houſe behind Weſtminſter-Abbey, at the foot of " the ſtair-caſe, ſay, 'If he had a hundred lives, " and a ſea of blood to carry on the cauſe, he " would ſpend it all to eſtabliſh the church of Rome " in England; and if there was an hundred here- " tical Kings to be depoſed, he would ſee them all " deſtroyed.' Upon this ſaying, mr. Coleman " aſked him this queſtion, 'Did I ever ſee you in " my life?' Yes, ſaid the other, in the ſtone gal- " lery in Somerſet-houſe, when you came from a " conſult, where were great perſons, which I am " not to name here; that would make the bottom " of your plot tremble: you ſaw me then."

The third evidence againſt Coleman was his own letters, found in his lodgings when he was arreſted. But it muſt be obſerved that only thoſe of the years 1674 and 1675, were found in a drawer under the table. The general opinion was, that he had received notice of his being accuſed by Oates in the council, and ſo had time to burn or convey away thoſe of the two laſt years, with the book in which they were entered. Nevertheleſs, the following extracts are taken from ſome of his letters writ with his own hand, and allowed to be authentic.

Extract of a letter of mr. Coleman to father la Chaiſe June, 29, 1674.

" I Am commanded to tell you, that his Royal " Highneſs, my maſter, is very ſenſible of the " friendſhip of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, which " he will indeavor to cultivate very carefully, " and to give him all poſſible aſſurances of it, to " take away all jealouſies that his enemies would " raiſe to the contrary. That his Royal Highneſs " has done nothing in any manner whatſoever, nor " in any place, againſt the intereſt of his moſt Chriſ- " tian Majeſty, but hath rendered him all good " offices he hath been capable of. That as for re- " calling the parliament, and touching my lord " Arlington, his Highneſs is altogether of opinion " of his Majeſty, that neither one or other is uſeful, " but quite contrary, very dangerous as well for " England as France; and that his moſt Chriſtian " Majeſty is in great danger of loſing the neu- " trality of England, at the next ſeſſion (if the " parliament meet) as he loſt its alliance by the " peace of Holland at laſt; becauſe the lower- " houſe, and their friends (as the furious Proteſtants, " and the male-contents in the houſe of lords) have " a deſign to leſſen his Royal Highneſs, and root " out the Catholic religion; and they think they " cannot make uſe of any other fitter means to at- " tain their ends, than to raiſe the Dutch, and to " perplex his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, as much as " lies in their power. That his Highneſs doubts " not, but it is abſolutely neceſſary for the intereſt " of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, and his Royal " Highneſs, to uſe all indeavors to hinder the " meeting of the parliament, by perſuading his " Britannic Majeſty, that his greatneſs, his honor, " and his quiet, are no leſs concerned therein than " theirs: ſo that if his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty would " write freely his thoughts thereupon to his Bri- " tannic Majeſty, to forewarn him of the danger " he apprehends from thence, and would withal " think fit to make him the ſame generous offers " of his purſe, to perſuade him to diſſolve the " preſent parliament, as he hath done to his High- " neſs for the election of another, perhaps he " would ſucceed therein by the aſſiſtance we would " give him here. As for another parliament, it " would be eaſy enough to get ſuch a one as we " wiſh for; the conſtitutions of our parliaments " being of ſuch a nature, that as there is nothing " to be hoped for by the King from an old one, " ſo there is nothing to be feared from a new one; " becauſe ſuch a one, at their firſt meeting, muſt " needs aſſiſt his Majeſty, ſo far as to inable him " to acknowlege his obligations both to his moſt " Chriſtian Majeſty and to all the world."——— CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

In the year 1674, there was a prorogation of the parliament, which laſted fourteen months: it appears in this letter, that the intereſts of the King of France and the Popiſh religion were the true cauſe of this long prorogation.

Extract from a letter of mr. Coleman to father la Chaiſe, September, 25, 1674.

Id. p. 5.

" FOR the firſt point of your letter, his Royal " Highneſs has commanded me to tell you, " that he will govern himſelf according to your ad- " vice, and treat of nothing concerning the Catho- " lic religion with monſieur Rouvigny, nor with " any other perſon than yourſelf; but that he will " communicate to you all things he ſhall find ne- " ceſſary for the good of the Catholics, and ſhall " be very well pleaſed to receive advices from you " thereupon. For the reſt, his Royal Highneſs " does a little wonder, that he hears nothing from " monſieur Rouvigny touching the ſecond point " of your letter, ſince you have written ſo poſi- " tively that he had order to confirm, and procure " execution of what his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty " propoſed to him the ſecond of June laſt, by your " mediation.——His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty made " a very generous offer to his Royal Highneſs of " the aſſiſtance of his purſe, to inable him to de- " fend them both from the evils that threatened " them, and by good luck his Royal Highneſs has " labored with ſo much diligence and ſucceſs, that " the dangers which they apprehended are a little " put off: but one thing more is neceſſary for the " perfect ſecuring their affairs; and without making " one ſtep more, all that he has already done will " ſignify nothing. For that the aſſiſtance of his " moſt Chriſtian Majeſty is no leſs neceſſary at " preſent than heretofore, to ſubdue intirely thoſe, " who being exaſperated againſt his moſt Chriſtian " Majeſty, as much as againſt his Royal Highneſs, " and are angry with his Royal Highneſs, only " becauſe he is ſo unalterably addicted to the in- " tereſt of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, will exerciſe " their malice and their rage with more brutality " than ever, if they find occaſion for it hereafter. " If you can therefore, by your credit, obtain " from his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty the accompliſh- " ment of the offer of his purſe, for raiſing the re- " putation of his Royal Highneſs in the opinion of " his Britannic Majeſty, and for puting him in con- " dition to reſiſt the ſharpeſt bateries of the adver- " ſaries of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, and Royal " Highneſs, to wit, the poſſibility they pretend to " get money from the parliament, and the impoſ- " ſibility of having any elſewhere, by which they " often keep the mind of his Britannic Majeſty in " ſuſpenſe, and wherein they place the hope they " have to conquer him at laſt: there will nothing " more remain, to be feared by his moſt Chriſtian " Majeſty, or his Royal Highneſs, but his Royal " Highneſs will be able to diſſolve the parliament " with eaſe, and afterwards, in recompenſe of the " ſaid aſſiſtance, will perform on his part, all that " his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall aſk of him, and " will proceed with ſincerity, upon the word of a " Prince (that no man can reproach him for viola- " tion of) for the intereſt of his moſt Chriſtian " Majeſty."

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

Extract from a letter of mr. Coleman to the Pope's Nuncio at Bruſſels, September 4, 1674.

Treby's Collect. p. 9.

" ——THAT the duke's principal deſign
" is, to uſe the Pope's interpoſition,
" and by that means to eſtabliſh himſelf in the " poſſeſſion of his eſtate, thro' the aſſiſtance of " France and Spain, and to turn all their cares for
" the eaſe of the Pope's friends, and particularly " for the Catholics of the church, againſt their " enemies; and aſſures him he will find, that the " Pope never had an occaſion ſo favorable as at " this hour, to inrich thoſe of his family, and to " augment the number of his friends; and if he " lets it ſlip, he never will find the like: ſo that " if ever they propoſe to make uſe of the treaſure
" of the church, it is now they ought to do it;
" for they can demand nothing that the duke will " not be capable to do for the Pope's friends:-----
" On the other ſide, without their aid, he will run
" great hazard of being loſt, both himſelf and his " aſſociates."

Extract of a letter from mr. Coleman to the ſame Nuncio, written October 23, 1674.

Id. p. 12.

" YOU agree with me, that money is the only " means of bringing the King into the duke's
" intereſt, and of diſingaging him from the parlia" ment; and you muſt alſo agree with me, that " nothing can more promote the intereſts of the " Catholic party, which is the principal object of " the duke's care and affection, and of the hatred
" of the parliament, and which muſt hope, or fear,
" according as the one or the other of them in" creaſe in power.——Nothing in the world is " more certain, than that the King has a good in" clination towards the duke, and the Catholics,
" and would join himſelf willingly and inſeparably
" to their intereſts, if he did not apprehend ſome
" danger from ſuch a union; which, however, he " would not have cauſe to fear, if he found their " intereſt, and conſequently their power, ſo far " advanced above that of their adverſaries, that " they ſhould neither have the power nor the bold-
" neſs to conteſt any thing with them; which the " King could ſee in a very little time, if we could " perſuade him to do two or three things:——And " I am certain money could not fail of perſuading
" him to it; for there is nothing it cannot make " him do, tho' it were as much to his prejudice, as " this we indeavor to perſuade him to will be to
" his advantage."——

In another letter, Coleman poſitively ſaid, " That " it was by the credit of the Catholics, that the " parliament was prorogued till the thirteenth day
" of April 1675.

Extract from a letter of mr. Coleman to father la Chaiſe.

" ——OUR prevailing in theſe things " will give the greateſt blow to the " Proteſtant religion here, that ever it received
" ſince its birth."

In another.

Id. p. 17.

" WE have here a mighty work upon our " hands, no leſs than the converſion of
" of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the ſub-
" duing of a peſtilent hereſy, which has domi-
" neered over great part of this northern world a " long time; there never was ſuch hopes of " ſucceſs ſince the death of Queen Mary, as now
" in our days."

In the ſame letter.

" ——THE oppoſition we are ſure to meet
" with is alſo like to be great; ſo that
" it imports us to get all the aid and aſſiſtance we CHARLES II.
" can, for the harveſt is great, and the laborers AN' 1678.
" but few."——

After the reading of theſe letters, Coleman alleged in his defenſe.

State-Trials.

" 1. That Oates, who now pretended ſuch ac" quaintance with him, declared before the King
" and council, 'That he never ſaw him before, or
" did not know him."

To which the other anſwered, " That it being " candle-light, and his ſight weak, and Coleman
" altered in habit and wig, he did at firſt ſay, he " could not ſwear that was the man, or that he " had ever ſeen him before; but as ſoon as he " heard him ſpeak, he knew him well, and could " have then ſworn it, had it been demanded.

" 2. That had the things now alleged by Oates
" been true, he would have charged the ſame be" fore the council: but then he only charged him
" with ſending of one letter, and ſuch ſlender mat" ters that the council was ready to let him go at " large; and therefore all the reſt muſt be invented
" ſince."

To this Oates replied, " That he was then ſo
" weak and weary, he could not well tell what he " had ſaid; beſide, his deſign was then to lay no
" more to his charge, than might ſerve for in" formation, &c.

" 3. Whereas Oates charged him with conſent-
" ing to Wakeman's poiſoning of the King, and " that it was conſulted by him in Auguſt, and,
" as he remembered, about the twenty-firſt day,
" Coleman alleged, that he was then in Warwick-
" ſhire, and one of his men and he were there all
" Auguſt, as he thought, but was not ſure of it;
" and after conviction, he offered a book that " would ſhew he was out of town from the eighteenth
" to the thirty-firſt of Auguſt;" but this was no evidence in itſelf, and offered too late, ſo it did not contradict Oates, who was not poſitive to a day, but only to the month. As to what was ſworn by Bedloe, he made no other anſwer than a ſolemn aſſeveration, " That he never ſaw the man in his life." But as to his papers, which he did not deny, he alleged, " There was no treaſon in them, tho' very " extravagant expreſſions; and that it would plainly
" appear from them, that his deſign was ſo far " from killing the King, that it was only 'to make
" the King and duke as great as could be."

1. It is neceſſary to obſerve upon this laſt anſwer, that according to Oates's depoſition, the reſolution to kill the King was not taken till the twenty-fourth of April 1678, and theſe letters were of the years 1674 and 1675; conſequently they could not mention the deſign of killing the King, neither were they produced in proof of that article.

2. Oates had accuſed Coleman of being concerned in the plot, before his letters were found. How then, if he did not know Coleman, could he gueſs ſo right, as to lay things to his charge, which were found in letters under his own hand?

3. Coleman confeſſed, that his intention was to make the King and duke of York as great as was poſſible. This was a neceſſary conſequence of the projected change of religion. For it was not poſſible to ſubvert religion, without a ſubverſion of the government; nor to render the King abſolute, without a deſign of altering religion, ſince the King and duke were both Catholics. One of theſe articles proved, neceſſarily proves the other.

In the concluſion of his defenſe, he uſed theſe words; " Poſitively I ſay, and upon my ſalvation, " I never ſaw theſe witneſſes, Oates but once, and " Bedloe never before." Coleman condemned,

The jurors, who were all gentlemen of the county of Middleſex, againſt whom Coleman had made no exceptions, and executed without any confeſſion of his crime.

Charles II. An' 1678.

exceptions, withdrawing, in a little time brought him in guilty of high treaſon. The next day he received ſentenſe of death, and the third of December was hanged and quartered according to cuſtom. He perſiſted to the laſt moment in denying the crimes for which he was condemned. But as his letters ſeemed at leaſt to prove a deſign of extirpating the Proteſtant religion, he declared his ſole intention was to procure liberty of conſcience for the Papiſts. Probably it will not be univerſally agreed, that this is the natural ſenſe of the expreſſions in his letters. It is true, a report was ſpread in London, that he was promiſed a pardon, in caſe he made no confeſſion; but ſuch rumors are not much to be credited (1).

A proclamation to incourage farther diſcoveries. Echard, Vol. III. p. 487.

The ſame day Coleman was tried, the King, at the requeſt of the lords, publiſhed a proclamation, promiſing, "That if any perſon or perſons ſhall, "before the twenty-fifth day of December next, "make any farther diſcovery of the late horrid "deſign againſt his Majeſty's perſon and govern-"ment, he or they——ſhall not only receive from "his Majeſty for every ſuch diſcovery, the reward "of two hundred pounds; but if he or they were "a principal or principals in the ſaid deſign, they "ſhall have his Majeſty's gracious pardon."

Oates and Bedloe accuſe the Queen. Burnet, p. 435. Echard, Vol. III. p. 487.

Whether thro' a deſire of having this reward, or whether they believed to have a good foundation, Oates and Bedloe had the boldneſs, before the King and council, to accuſe the Queen herſelf, of conſenting to the death of the King, and of being in the deſign to poiſon him by means of Wakeman. But, beſide that, their depoſitions contained only certain ſigns which were far from proofs, the King ſtoped this affair by his authority: yet he could not prevent an addreſs from the commons, to deſire the immediate removal of the Queen and her family from the court at Whitehall. His Majeſty was ſo offended at Oates's inſolence, that he ordered a ſtricter guard upon him than ever. But the day after, the commons addreſſed him, "That Oates "be freed from his reſtraint, attended by his own "ſervants, and that a competent allowance be ap-"pointed for his maintenance." At the ſame time they reſolved, that an addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, that all Papiſts, and ſuſpected Papiſts, within the ſeveral counties of England, may be ſecured.

The commons, the ſixth of December, impeached the five lords in the Tower, at the bar of the houſe of peers. But they had not time to exhibit the articles againſt them, and the affair was reſumed by another houſe.

State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 692. Burnet, p. 443.

December the ſeventeenth, five of thoſe arreſted for the plot, were arraigned at the Old Bailey, viz. William Ireland and Thomas Pickering, both prieſts; John Grove a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread provincial of the jeſuits, and John Fenwick a jeſuit alſo. But in the courſe of the evidence, there not appearing ſufficient proof againſt the two laſt, they were reſerved for another time. So the three firſt only were tried that day. The ſum of Oates's teſtimony againſt them was:

The trials of Ireland, Pickering, and Grove. Ibid.

"1. That at the grand conſults of April the "twenty-fourth, at the White-horſe in the Strand, "whereof Ireland was one; it was reſolved, that "Pickering and Grove, as having been formerly "ingaged, ſhould go on in their deſign and at-"tempt to aſſaſſinate the King; and that Grove "being a layman, ſhould have fifteen hundred "pounds for his reward; and Pickering being a "prieſt, thirty thouſand maſſes, which at twelve-"pence a maſs, amounted to that ſum.

Charles II. An' 1678.

"2. That this reſolve was the ſame day drawn "up in writing by one Mico, who was ſecretary "to the ſociety, and companion to provincial "Whitebread, at the ſaid Whitebread's chamber, "who having ſigned it, it was carried by the de-"ponent Oates, as being a meſſenger to the con-"ſult, to be ſigned by the reſt of the conſpirators; "and that Ireland in his own chamber did ſign it "in his preſenſe.

"3. That Pickering and Grove conſented to "ſuch reſolve, accepted the terms, and alſo ſigned "it the ſame day in Whitebread's chamber, at "mrs. Sander's at Wild-houſe, where, in a little "chapel, they, and about forty or fifty of the conſul-"ters heard maſs, and received the ſacrament, ad-"miniſtered by one Barton, a jeſuit, and thereupon "took an oath of ſecreſy upon a maſs-book, which "Mico held, while Whitebread pronounced the "words.

4. That in purſuance of this reſolve, the depo-"nent did ſeveral times ſee Pickering and Grove "walk in the Park together, with ſcrewed piſtols, "longer than ordinary piſtols, and ſhorter than ſome "cabines: that they had ſilver bullets champed, "to render the wound incurable, and that he ſaw "Grove's bullets in May, and Pickering's in "Auguſt. Bedloe's depoſition.

Bedloe the ſecond witneſs ſwore,

"1. That he was imployed for the ſpace of five "years as a meſſenger, by the conſpirators, for "carrying their letters to the confederates beyond "ſeas, and bringing others back, all, or moſt of "them relating to the plot; for he had a way to "open and read them, by which he fully informed "himſelf of thoſe matters: and for the nature of "the plot; he heard ſome of the conſpirators ſay, "'That they would not leave any member of any "heretic in England, that ſhould ſurvive to tell "hereafter, That there ever was any ſuch religion "in England as the Proteſtant.' And to confirm "his intimacy with them, he ſwore the manner of "his firſt coming to be imployed by them; by "means of a lady abbeſs of the Engliſh nunnery of "Dunkirk, who having kept him ſix weeks in her "convent, recommended him to ſir John Warner, "as a proper inſtrument, who afterwards ſent "him to father Harcourt to be inſtructed." And as a further confirmation, he brought his brother James Bedloe, who ſwore he knew nothing of the plot, but did teſtify, "That he had heard the priſoners often named as being of his brother's acquaintance; and that he had, on his brother's behalf, received ſeveral ſums of money from prieſts and jeſuits, as fifty or ſixty pounds at a time.

(1) He declared before the commitee, that he acted by order in all he had done. And he believed the King knew of his imployment, particularly that at Bruſſels. But tho' he ſeemed willing to be queſtioned about the King, the commitee did not think fit to do it, nor to report what he ſaid concerning it: only in general they reported that, he ſpoke of another matter, about which they did not think fit to interrogate him, nor to mention it. Littleton, one of the commitee, gave dr. Burnet an account of all that paſſed that very night. And he found his behavior made great impreſſions on them all: it was given out, to make the duke more odious, that Coleman was kept up from making confeſſion, by the hopes the duke ſent of a pardon at Tyburn. But he could not be ſo ignorant, as not to know, that at that time it was not in the King's power to pardon him, while the tide ran ſo high. Burnet, p. 437.

"2. That about the latter end of Auguſt, this year, at mr. Harcourt's chamber, he met the priſoners, Ireland, Pickering, and Grove, with ſome others, where he heard them diſcourſe, That ſince the four Iriſh ruffians had miſſed killing the King at Windſor, Pickering and Grove ſhould go on with their deſign, and that one Conyers, a Benedictine monk, was to be joined with them; and that they ſhould indeavor to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty in his morning walks at Newmarket; that they were very eager upon it; and mr. Grove, more forward than the reſt, ſaid, 'Since it could not be done clandeſtinely, it ſhould be attempted openly; and that thoſe who ſhould fall in the attempt, had the glory to die in a good cauſe; but if they were diſcovered, the diſcovery could never come to that height, but their party would be ſtrong enough to bring it to paſs.

"3. He ſwore that Harcourt told him, Grove was to have fifteen hundred pounds, and Pickering as many maſſes, at twelve pence a maſs, as came to the like ſum.

"4. That at the ſame time, when the diſcourſe about killing the King was held at Harcourt's chamber, there was likewiſe a deſign concerted among them of killing ſeveral noble perſons, and the particular parts aſſigned to every one; as Knight, to kill the earl of Shaftſbury; Pritchard, the duke of Buckingham; Oneil, the earl of Oſſory; Obrian, the duke of Ormond, &c.

The defenſe made by the priſoners conſiſted in:

The priſoner's defenſe. State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 715. p. 701.

"1. A peremptory denial of the whole. Grove particularly ſaid, 'As I have a ſoul to ſave, I know nothing of this matter charged upon me.' Pickering affirmed, 'that he never ſhot off a piſtol in his life.' And Whitebread, who was there during the trial, declared 'before Almighty God, that Oates had not ſpoken three words of truth.'

p. 706.

"2. A particular denial of their knowledge of, or acquaintance with the witneſſes. Ireland denied that he ever ſaw Bedloe, before that time in the court; and challenged him to produce one witneſs that he had ever ſpoken to him. Pickering affirmed, that he never ſaw Oates before; and offered to ſwear that he never was in Bedloe's company. And Grove affirmed, that he had ſcarce any acquaintance with Oates. Whereupon Oates gave him a remarkable token, viz. that in December laſt, when he was with him, he owned, that 'he and three Iriſhmen had fired Southwark; and that they had a thouſand pounds given them for it; whereof he had four hundred pounds, and the others two hundred pounds a piece.'

p. 711, &c.

"3. Ireland, againſt Bedloe's evidence, affirmed, he was not in London the whole month of Auguſt, and part of September; and offered to prove it by twenty witneſſes, that he was in Staffordſhire and Cheſhire all that time: and urged Bedloe to name the place, and the company wherever they met together. But not only Bedloe ſwore the contrary, but likewiſe Oates himſelf; but what ſeemed more important, one Sarah Pain, formerly a ſervant to Grove, ſwore that ſhe ſaw mr. Ireland at a ſcrivener's door in Fetter-Lane, about the twelfth or thirteenth of Auguſt.

Charles II. An' 1678.

"4. Ireland, as well as Whitebread, objected againſt the grand conſult of April the twenty-fourth, that hundreds could prove that Oates was at St. Omers all the months of April and May; and offered to produce a certificate from thence, under the ſeal of the college." But ſuch certificate was not allowed as evidence by the law of England. Laſtly, they indeavored to blaſt the reputation of doctor Oates, and prove him perjured, ſince he had ſaid before the council, that he knew no more than what he had already depoſed, and yet had ſince added other teſtimonies. As I have ſpoken of this objection, I ſhall not repeat here what has been ſaid. p. 703.

They are condemned,

In fine, all three were found guilty, and ſentenſed to be drawn, hanged and quartered. But the execution of Ireland and Grove, was defered till the twenty-fourth of January following, and that of Pickering to the ninth of May. They all three perſiſted to their laſt breath, in proteſting they were as innocent of the crimes for which they were condemned, as the child unborn. As all the Papiſts that ſuffered for this conſpiracy made uſe of the ſame manner of expreſſion, to declare their innocence, it was believed, there was ſome equivocation in theſe words, tho' it could not be ſaid wherein it conſiſted.

A reflection upon this trial.

If it be conſidered, that the evidence of Oates and Bedloe upon oath was poſitive, and that the priſoners alleged in their defenſe only bare negations, the jury will be eaſily juſtified in their verdict. For why ſhould they credit the aſſeverations and oaths of the accuſed, more than the depoſitions of the two witneſſes? And yet it was afterwards, and ſtill is, pretended by many, that the condemned perſons were innocent. 1. Becauſe they aſſerted their innocence with their dying breath. 2. Becauſe it is taken for granted that Oates and Bedloe were great villains. 3. But the ſtrongeſt proof, according to thoſe who are of this opinion is, that it was on the trial of theſe three men that Oates, in the reign of King James the Second, was convicted of perjury upon the depoſitions of twenty-two witneſſes from St. Omers, who ſwore that Oates was at St. Omers, in the jeſuits college, the whole months of April and May, without ever ſtiring from thence. Moreover, above forty witneſſes from the counties of Stafford and Cheſter, depoſed upon oath, that father Ireland was in thoſe counties all Auguſt, and part of September. State-Trials, Vol. III.

To aſſiſt the reader's judgment on this affair, I think it neceſſary to make ſome obſervations, and the rather, as the diſpute upon this ſubject is not yet terminated.

1. The defenſe by the Alibi (1) is ſubject to great inconveniences, ſince, there being two contradictory evidences, it leaves the judges doubtful what to reſolve. Generally if they come to a determination, it is not becauſe there is reaſon to believe one of the evidences more than the other, but becauſe equity requires that they incline rather to clemency than rigor. In the preſent trial, there were no depoſitions in favor of the Alibi, but only a bare allegation of the priſoners, and an offer of proof by abſent witneſſes. So even ſuppoſing the innocence of the three accuſed perſons, the jury could not but find them guilty, unleſs they pretered the bare aſſeveration of the priſoners to the oaths of the witneſſes, which is never practiſed. But in the trial of Oates, the proof of the Alibi was made uſe of to convict him of perjury, and ſentenſe him for it to a very rigorous punishment. It belongs to the lawyers to decide, whether this be exactly regular.

2. If the circumstances of the times of these two trials are considered, it will be found, there is as much reason to believe, in respect of one as of the other, that prejudice and passion bore a great sway. When the three jesuits were condemned, the whole kingdom was alarmed with the noise of a plot, formed by that society against the King, the government, and the Protestant religion. The two houses of parliament had supported the reality of this plot, by the unanimity of their votes, and the King himself supposed it in all his proclamations. It should not therefore seem strange, that the judges and jury were prejudiced, and thereby inclined blindly to believe what Oates and Bedloe deposed. But on the contrary, when Oates was convicted of perjury, the face of things was intirely changed. A very zealous Catholic King was on the throne, and it was now dangerous to affirm, there was a Popish plot in 1678. The Papists had now the same superiority over the Protestants as the Protestants had in 1678 over the Catholics, and the judges were intirely devoted to the King. It suffices to say in a word, that Jefferies was his judge, who forgot nothing which he thought capable to prejudice the jury against the prisoner. In short, Oates was condemned upon the evidence of twenty-two witnesses from St. Omers, all scholars or dependents of the jesuits, and upon that of forty other witnesses from the counties of Chester and Stafford, among whom it is only said there were several Protestants. Moreover, the question was not only, whether Ireland was in those counties during the months of August and September, but whether he had never stired from thence in that time (1). Now it is difficult to conceive that such a negative proposition can be proved by forty witnesses.

Having thus represented what is urged on both sides, I leave the reader to his own judgment. The affair of the conspiracy must now be interrupted for some time, in order to proceed to another which made a great noise at this time. But it is necessary to look back a little on the situation of the English court.

The earl of Danby's affair. Temple. Burnet, p. 439, &c. Kennet, p. 355. Echard. Danby's Let.

The earl of Danby lord treasurer, was considered as the King's prime minister. He had a great genius and a solid judgment, and as he disapproved of the principles of the cabal, indeavored to disingage the King from the measures he had been led into by their counsels. This drew on him the enmity of the duke of York, and all the French faction, with whom joined the lord Russel, and other male-contents in the house of commons; and among the peers, the earl of Essex and Shaftsbury, while the duke of Monmouth, and the duchess of Portsmouth did their utmost to lessen his credit with the King. In short, a strong party was formed against him, who were bent to ruin him at all events. These adversaries were also joined by another, who had been his most intimate friend. This was mr. Montague, embassador in France, who aspiring to the office of secretary of state, took it heinously that the treasurer had ingaged to bring in sir William Temple. Mr. Montague was the treasurer's most dangerous enemy, because he had private letters in his hands from that minister, and tho' he could not divulge them without great injury to the King, this gave him no uneasiness, because, resolving to throw himself into the party against the court, which was most prevalent in the parliament, he knew he should be protected, even against the King himself. To this purpose, he got himself elected member for Northampton, and suddenly leaving Paris, without the King's consent or knowledge, came to London, and took his seat in the house. His Majesty, offended at so strange a proceeding, and being also informed by the Swedish embassador of the design of the treasurer's enemies, and their intention to make use of his letters, sent the nineteenth of December the following message to the house of commons, ——— "That upon information that mr. Mon- Kennet, "tague, a member of that house, and late embas- p. 355. "sador in France, had held several conferences with Burnet, "the Pope's nuncio there, without any directions p. 440. "or instructions from his Majesty; his Majesty to R. Coke. "the end that he might know the truth of that "matter, had given orders for the seizing of mr. "Montague's papers (2)." The chiefs of the opposite party to the King made great objections to this message, pretending it ought to be first known, whether the information had been given upon oath, and what was the nature of mr. Montague's crime, before they could consent to the seizure of his papers. Upon this mr. Montague acquainted the house, "That he had in his custody some papers, which, Kennet, "as he conceived, might tend very much to the p. 355. "safety of the King's person, and the preservation of "the government." A commitee was immediately appointed to bring the writings to the house, which being accordingly done, and mr. Montague ordered to select such of them as he thought for the service of the house, and dispose of the rest as he pleased, he produced two letters out of many others, both subscribed, Danby, and sent to him at Paris, on the Danby's Let. negociation of the money which his Majesty expected from the King of France, at the bottom of one of which were these words, "This letter is "writ by my order, C. R. (3). These letters discovering to the house, from whence had proceeded the King's delays with regard to the war against France, they immediately resolved, "That there Dec. 21. Montague, the articles of impeachment were drawn up, and sent to the house of lords. But this impeachment was rather against the King himself, than the earl of Danby, who had only acted by his express orders. For tho' in the impeachment were inserted several articles which only concerned the earl, it was not in those that the strength of the impeachment consisted, but in those relating to the negociation with France, concerning the King's

(1) A woman swore she saw Ireland in London, about the middle of August. Burnet, p. 443.

(2) Burnet says, the earl of Danby having broke with Montague, was apprehensive Montague might accuse him, so resolved to prevent him. Jenkins, then at Nimeguen, writ over, according to a direction sent him, as was believed, that he understood Montague had been in a secret correspondence with the Pope's nuncio at Paris (Montague, it seems, had made use of him, and given him money, which he loved, for such secrets as he could draw from him.) Upon Jenkins's letter, the King sent the above message to the commons. This was a device of the lord Danby's, to find his own letters and destroy them, and then to let the prosecution drop. But Montague had put a box, in which the letters were, in sure hands out of the way. While the debate about the message was in hand, the box was brought to him, which he opened, and took out two of the lord Danby's letters, that contained instructions to him to treat with the King of France for three hundred thousand pounds a year, for three years, if a peace succeeded; since it would not be convenient for the King to meet a parliament in all that time, and he was charged to mention no part of this to the secretary of state. These last words made very much for secretary Coventry, since now it appeared, that he was not trusted with these ill practises, p. 440, 442.

penſion, on pretenſe that the lord treaſurer had acted without order, tho' the contrary was not doubted (1). But the deſign was to oblige the earl, for his own ſafety, to plead the King's orders for what he had done. This extremely perplexed him, for he could not juſtify himſelf, without accuſing the King, and he could not accuſe the King, without intirely forfeiting his favor: eſpecially as the King had earneſtly deſired him not to divulge his ſecrets, offering him letters of pardon to ſcreen him from the parliament. He therefore reſolved to conceal the King's private orders on this affair, but however could not help ſending two of Montague's letters to the commons, which diſcovered him to be the principal author of this negociation. Theſe letters alſo ſhewed, that the court of France conſidered the lord treaſurer as their great enemy, whoſe ruin was to be effected, in order to have the King of England at their diſpoſal. But the commons were ſo inraged againſt the earl, that they would not ſuffer theſe letters to be read. On the contrary when the articles of his impeachment were read in the houſe of lords, he in a ſpeech frequently inſinuated, that he could make ſuch a defenſe, as would admit of no reply (2). Every one knew what he meaned, but it is certain, he was not ſo much aimed at as the King himſelf, and that it was intended by this means, more than by the plot itſelf, to ſhew the public, that the King and the duke of York, were the real authors of all the evils of the kingdom, and in a word, the chiefs of the conſpiracy to ſubvert the government and Proteſtant religion.

The King prorogues the parliament. Kennet, P. 356.

His Majeſty readily perceived the deſign of the earl of Danby's impeachment, and therefore, before the lords could reſolve, whether the earl of Danby ſhould be ſent to the Tower, came to the parliament the thirtieth of December, and prorogued it to the fourth of February, after paſſing one ſingle act againſt the Papiſts.

The earl of Sunderland made ſecretary of ſtate. Febr. 9. Temple's Mem. Kennet, p. 356.

As ſoon as the parliament was prorogued, ſir Joſeph Williamſon ſecretary of ſtate, reſigned the ſeals into the hands of the King, who appointed the earl of Sunderland * in his room, tho' he had given hopes of that poſt to ſir William Temple, then embaſſador in Holland, and had called him over for that purpoſe. But Temple at his arrival found the poſt filled, the earl of Sunderland having paid Williamſon ſix thouſand pounds, and five hundred guineas, which Temple was not able or willing to give. Shortly after, the King diſmiſſed the earl of Danby, and put the treaſury into commiſſion (3).

* Robert Spencer.

The earl of Danby reſigns. Id. p. 357.

The King was extremely imbaraſſed, after the prorogation, not only by reaſon of the earl of Danby's impeachment, which properly fell upon him, but alſo by freſh diſcoveries, both of the plot and Godfrey's murder. The twenty-firſt of December, Miles Prance, a goldſmith of London, a Papiſt, who had ſometimes worked for the Queen in her chapel of Somerſet-houſe, was taken up by a warrant from the council, upon the information of one Wren, a lodger in his houſe, that he was concerned in Godfrey's murder. Tho' it was very poſſible for Godfrey to have been murdered by perſons not in the plot, yet it was generally believed, the murder was commited by Papiſts, and that if the authors could be diſcovered, it would be a great means to unravel the conſpiracy. Wherefore the two houſes had appointed a commitee, of which the earl of Shaftſbury was chairman, to inquire after the authors of this murder.

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

In this affair, as in that of the plot, there are, among the hiſtorians, two parties directly oppoſite, one aſſerting this murder was commited by Papiſts, and the other maintaining the contrary. The latter, in ſupport of their opinion, relate numberleſs facts, with ſo many circumſtances, that they would be more than capable of proving what they advance, could their faithfulneſs and alſo the certainty of the facts be intirely relied on. But it is very aſtoniſhing to ſee the truth of their opinion continually ſuppoſed, without any other proof than a great many unwarranted facts. This may paſs when we write only for one of the parties, ever ready to believe what is advanced by an hiſtorian of their own ſide; but as I write for foreigners, to whom the actors and the authors are equally unknown, I am not to ſuppoſe true, facts of which I ſee no proof. I do not hereby pretend to inſinuate to my readers, that all theſe facts are falſe; but only that I have not ſufficient reaſons to believe them true, and conſequently ought not to form any ſuppoſition from them.

Leſtrange. Echard, Vol. III. P. 504.

As for Prance the goldſmith, it is readily ſuppoſed, he was maliciouſly accuſed by Wren, becauſe Prance had forced him to pay fourteen months rent, due to him for lodging, and that having at firſt with execrations denied the murder, he was at laſt compelled by threats and ill treatment to confeſs that he knew the whole matter, and to give a particular account of all the circumſtances. If this ſuppoſition was well proved, or at leaſt ſupported by the teſtimony of any cotemporary perſon of reputation known in London, there would be no occaſion to ſeek for other proofs. But, as I have ſaid, theſe facts are declared as undeniable, without any warrant. For my part, who ſeek not to impoſe on my readers, I ſhall only inform them of the facts univerſally acknowleged, adding alſo ſuch as are doubtful and advanced without proof, that the reader may know what he is to adhere to.

Dec. 21.

Prance being arreſted, as I ſaid, was carried to Weſtminſter to be examined before a commitee of the lords.

Ibid.

Here a deciſive fact is begun to be advanced without any authors, viz. that Prance was firſt carried into a little room, where ſeveral perſons went to ſee him, and among others Bedloe, who knowing him not, privately inquired which was the priſoner? When he was informed, he withdrew to an eating-houſe in the neighborhood, where Prance was brought ſome time after, till he ſhould be called to his examination. As ſoon as Bedloe, who was purpoſely planted in the ſame room, had caſt his eyes on him, he cried out, "This is one of the rogues "that I ſaw with a dark lanthorn about the body "of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey; but he was then "in a perriwig."

If any care had been taken to prove that Bedloe had aſked which was Prance, and that he purpoſely waited for him in the eating houſe, where he knew he was to be brought, there would be no need

(1) The ſubſtance of the articles againſt him, was, 1. That he had treated with foreign Princes and embaſſadors, without the privity of the ſecretaries of ſtate. 2. Indeavored to ſubvert the ancient form of government; and deſigned to raiſe and keep up a ſtanding army. 3 Attempted to hinder the meeting of parliaments. 4. Concealed and ſuppreſſed the evidence for the Popiſh plot. 5. Had waſted the King's treaſure, and iſſued out great ſums of money for unneceſſary penſions, and ſecret ſervices, to the value of two hundred and thirty one thouſand, ſix hundred and two pounds in two years. 6. of other proof, and the caſe would be decided. But this fact intirely reſts upon the authority of the hiſtorian who relates it (1).

He denies all. Dec. 22.

Prance being carried to the commitee of lords, Bedloe directly charged him with the murder of Godfrey, and Wren with being out of the houſe while the body was miſſing. Prance denied all with imprecations on himſelf. But as the bare denial of a priſoner ought not to carry it againſt the teſtimony of two witneſſes, the lords thought fit to ſend him to Newgate, where he was put in the condemned hole, loaded with heavy Irons, and, ſays my author, left all night to conſider what farther anſwers to make, and whether he would venture his ſoul or body.

Is ſent to Newgate.

Leſtrange. Echard, Vol. III. p. 505.

Herein evidently appears the prejudice of the hiſtorian, who cannot have known, that the intention of the lords was to leave Prance to conſider, whether he would venture his ſoul or his body. He could ſay this but by the virtue of his ſyſtem, which ſuppoſes, that the commitee was reſolved, at any rate, to make Prance an evidence to the murder of Godfrey.

But here is ſtill another more important fact, advanced with the ſame aſſurance, without any authority.

Ibid.

Next morning early, a man entered the condemned hole, where Prance was; and laying down a paper upon a form juſt by him, retired; ſoon after came in another with a candle, who ſet it down and left him. By that light he read the paper, wherein he found brief hints of what he was to ſwear when he ſhould be called to his ſecond examination, with a menace of being hanged if he did not confeſs what was expected of him. Prance, ſays the author, preſently imagined this to be a contrivance of the lord Shaftſbury.

Ibid.

A fact of this nature (which paſſed in a dungeon where there was but one man, and where two others, at ſeveral times, only go in and out, without ſaying a word, one to bring a paper, the other a candle) can only be known by Prance's confeſſion. Now it is certain, Prance never owned any ſuch thing; if he had, it would aſſuredly have been ſaid, how and upon what occaſion. But if this be ſo, how can it be ſaid that Prance imagined this to be a contrivance of the earl of Shaftſbury? Is it a thing ſo common, to know what paſſes in a man's private thoughts, that it is not worth the while to ſay how this knowlege was attained?

I proceed to other facts which are not conteſted. Prance after he had continued all night in priſon, and part of the next day, told captain Richardſon, maſter of Newgate, that he had matters of great moment to communicate to the earl of Shaftſbury, chairman of the commitee. He was, according to his deſire, carried the ſame night to the earl, who, in preſenſe of three other perſons, examined him five or ſix hours. It is pretended that the earl abuſed and menaced him, telling him, "That "there were great ones concerned, and he muſt "diſcover them too; for the little ones ſhould "not ſerve his turn, bidding him, not ſpare the "King himſelf." It does not however appear that theſe menaces made great impreſſions upon Prance, ſince his depoſition reached only perſons of low condition. However, he diſcovered part of what he ſaid he knew, with a promiſe of a more ample confeſſion if he might be aſſured of his pardon. He ſigned his depoſition, and was remanded to priſon. Upon this the lords obtained from his Majeſty a full and general pardon for him. Then a commitee of the lords was ſent to Newgate to acquaint him with it, and to examine him. The commons likewiſe ordered him to be examined by a commitee of ſecreſy. Theſe two examinations being made with great ſtrictneſs, Prance was carried the next day to Whitehall, to be examined before the King and council.

Prance confeſſes. Dec. 22. Ibid

CHARLES II. AN' 1678.

In this examination he accuſed five perſons, as actually preſent at the murder; viz. Girald and Kelley, two Iriſh prieſts; Robert Green, cuſhionman to the Queen's chapel; Laurence Hill ſervant to dr. Godden, treaſurer of the chapel; and Henry Berry porter of Somerſet-houſe. Being aſked, "Why he gave ſo different a relation to the com-"mitee of lords from what he now ſo freely con-"feſſed?" He anſwered, "That he was not "then ſure of his pardon." Being farther aſked, "Why he came not in upon the proclamation and "reward thereof?" He ſaid, "He was afraid "to truſt it." As he had been very particular concerning the circumſtances of the time, place, and manner of the murder, the King, to be aſſured of the truth, appointed the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Oſſory, and the vice chamberlain, to go with Prance to Somerſet-houſe, and make him ſhew them the places where the things were acted.

Ibid.

Leſtrange. Echard, Vol. III. p. 506.

The author ſo often mentioned, adds what deſerves to be remembered. Prance, ſays he, was very punctual in naming and ſhewing ſome of the rooms, but ſo uncertain and dubious in ſome particulars, eſpecially about the chief room, that when the duke of Monmouth privately aſked the earl of Oſſory, "what he thought on it?" The earl anſwered, "It was all a cheat (2)." I purpoſely take notice of this particular, becauſe it is directly contrary to the report made to the council, as will preſently appear.

In the afternoon, Prance, in the preſenſe of the council, was confronted with Green, Berry, and Hill, who denied every ſyllable of the charge, and Prance ſtood as ſtoutly to every point of the accuſation. After which he was ſent back to Newgate for four or five days.

Id. p. 507.

The ſame author ſays here, that his irons were ſometimes off and ſometimes on, according as he was in a diſcovering temper. That is to ſay, the jailor, by the ſecret orders of the commitee, treated him well or ill, as he was diſpoſed to retract or adhere to his depoſition. There is likewiſe added another particular, that he was often viſited by members of both houſes, who ſometimes ſeverely threatened him when his evidence did not agree with Bedloe's, and particularly becauſe he would not own the periwig which Bedloe had firſt mentioned. But theſe particulars tending to ſhew that Prance was forced to depoſe what he knew not, are ſupported by no author, no evidence, no authority. There are no other vouchers but the hiſtorians who report theſe particulars, without condeſcending to inform their readers from whence they received them.

He retracts before the King. Dec. 29. Burnet, p. 446. Echard, Vol. III. p. 507.

After Prance had remained four or five days in Newgate, he was once more carried to be examined before the King in council. But he requeſted that he might firſt wait upon his Majeſty himſelf. Upon this Richardſon had orders to carry him to

(1) Our author means Echard. Burnet ſays, Prance being taken up on Wren's information, was carried to Weſtminſter. Bedloe accidentally paſſed by, not knowing any thing concerning him: and at firſt ſight, he charged ſomebody to ſeize on him; for he was one of thoſe, whom he ſaw about Godfrey's body, p. 445.

(2) In an account of the plot printed in 1680, it is ſaid, That Prance gave ſuch an exact account of the very ſpot upon which the murder was commited; where he himſelf, where Berry ſtood; as alſo the door, ſtairs, dark entry, &c. mentioned in his narrative, that his Majeſty's commiſſioners returned very well ſatisfied with the truth of his relation and confeſſion, p. 68.

mr. Chiffinch's lodgings, where the King came. The King taking Prance into a room by himſelf, after ſome time, opened the door, and bad Chiffinch and Richardſon take notice of what Prance ſaid; who being called to ſpeak out plainly, he declared, "That the men he had ſworn againſt were inno-"cent, and that all he had ſworn againſt them was "falſe," which he affirmed, ſays one, with great paſſion and aſſeveration. Upon which the King aſked him, "Upon your ſalvation is it ſo?" He replied, "Upon my ſalvation the whole accu-"ſation is falſe." He was then carried before the council, where he declared to the ſame effect, and was aſked, "What inducement he had to his for-"mer ſtory———who put him upon it?" He ſays, "No body prompted him; he only knew "the men he ſwore againſt; he never ſaw Bedloe "before he was taken up; he knew nothing of "the plot nor of the murder;———and could not "reſt for the ſtory he had told. But Wren owed "him money, and threatened him becauſe he "dunned him for it, and ſo haired him into it." He was then remanded to priſon.

After ſo ſerious an aſſeveration, no man of ſenſe can imagine that Catholics or Courtiers had gained Prance to retract his firſt depoſition. For this would be only to allege a bare ſuſpicion without proof. But to have it believed, that the commitee, and ſeveral members of both houſes, had threatened Prance in caſe his depoſition did not agree with Bedloe's, there is no need of proof, and the bare relation of an hiſtorian who wrote above thirty years after, is more than ſufficient for that.

Unhappily Prance retracted once more. But this ſignifies nothing, becauſe he denied what he had lately ſaid before the King and council, by reaſon of the exceſſive torments he was to made ſuffer, till he had promiſed to depoſe whatever was deſired. Let us hear what a famous hiſtorian (1) ſays on this occaſion (2).

Leſtrange. Echard, Vol. III. p. 507.

"Prance, excepting juſt after his return, ſtood "firm and immoveable in his denial, againſt all "terrors and temptations for about twelve days, "from the twenty-ninth of December to the "eleventh of this preſent January. During which "ſpace of time, his uſage was barbarous, and more "like the Romiſh inquiſition, than the methods "of a free nation. For nine days at leaſt his caſe "was deplorable; and what with the deadly cold "and naſtineſs of the place; the diſtreſs of his con-"dition; the agony of his thoughts, under the "horror of bringing new guilt upon his conſcience; "and the galling weight of his irons, he lay in ſuch "torments both of body and mind, that he ſpent "his hours in roaring and groaning, frequently "and pitifully crying out, 'Not guilty, not guilty! "No murder, no murder!' He uſed the ſame out-"cries, or clamors, at leaſt, to that effect, ſo "often, that the impoſers had no way to cover "the ſcandal, and the inhumanity of their treat-"ment, but either by imputing the anguiſh of a "wounded conſcience to the ravings of a diſtem-"pered brain; or by converting the marks of a "true repentance into the ſtory of a counterfeit "madneſs. But when things were at the worſt, "Prance was now and then, as the good humor "prevailed, eaſed of his irons, comforted with "good words and promiſes, and no artifice "omited to bring him to a proper underſtanding. "The keepers were then under the ſole direction of "a certain ambulatory commitee, when and in what "degree to ſqueeze, to pinch, to eaſe, to ſhackle, "to comfort or to torment their priſoners; and "moſt things were done according to the particular "order of that cabal. It would be too tedious to "recite all the ſufferings of this unfortunate man, "who being unable to hold out as Corral had done, "and finding his life in the ſame danger with thoſe "he had accuſed, he at length ſubmited to the "temptation, and upon a new aſſurance of pardon, "he promiſed to ſtay by his former evidence. Im-"mediately upon this, on the eleventh of January, "his irons were knocked off, and he was removed "from hard boards, and a diſmal cold room, to "a fine lodging and a curious bed, with variety "of the beſt meats and drinks. Here having pen, "ink and paper, and the aſſiſtance of his friend "one mr. Boyce, he finiſhed his ſtory, and pre-"pared for being a complete evidence againſt "Green, Berry and Hill, who where ſhortly after "to come upon their trials."

Charles II. An' 1678.

As the author of this paſſage is not content with inſinuating, that Prance was compelled by torments to ſupport his ſecond depoſition, but openly undertakes to prove it by facts which are intirely deciſive, it is abſolutely neceſſary for the reader's inſtruction to make ſome obſervations on this ſubject.

1. When in a controverted matter, an hiſtorian reports facts to which he was not an eye witneſs, and which however are capable of deciding for or againſt, the reader has a right to expect from him ſome teſtimony, or ſome author; in a word to be informed, how he came to the knowlege of ſuch facts. But here we ſee neither teſtimony nor author, in the text or margin.

2. From this very relation it appears, that all the ill uſage of Prance conſiſted in keeping him nine days in irons. If this is like a Romiſh inquiſition, it may be affirmed, England has a conſtant inquiſition, ſince priſoners commited for murder, or other great crimes are never treated otherwiſe. Beſide, it will be ſeen hereafter, that Prance denied his ever receiving any ill uſage in priſon, or his wanting any thing. As to the torments of his mind, and his roarings and groanings, ſuppoſing them to be true, only Prance could know the motives, and it muſt be ſurpriſing to ſee an author talk of what paſſed in Prance's mind, as if he had been his confident.

3. He ought to have explained what was this ambulatory commitee, from whom the keepers received directions; for it is well known, that during the prorogation of the parliament (and all this paſſed at the time of the prorogation) the keeper of Newgate could obey no orders but thoſe of the King, or at leaſt of the courts of juſtice.

4. Laſtly, in proof of a fact ſo remarkable and deciſive, we have only the bare aſſeveration of the author, whoſe exaggeration is kept up with expreſſions the ſtrongeſt and moſt capable to give the readers terrible ideas of the torments indured by Prance, which, however, amount to a nine days impriſonment in irons. Beſide, the author poſitively ſays, that Prance was gained without telling us

(1) Echard; who has borrowed the following paragraph, as well as ſeveral others, from Roger Leſtrange, without naming his author.

(2) Burnet ſays, after Prance had declared before the King and council, that his firſt confeſſion was all a fiction, he was carried back to priſon, but immediately ſent the keeper of Newgate to the King, to tell him, that all he had ſworn was true, but that the horror and confuſion he was in, put him on denying it. Yet he went off from this again, and denied every thing. Dr. Lloyd was upon this ſent to talk with him. At firſt he denied every thing to him. But dr. Lloyd told me, that he was almoſt dead thro' the diſorder of his mind, and with cold in his body. But after that dr. Lloyd had made a fire, and cauſed him to be put in a bed, and began to diſcourſe the matter with him, he returned to his confeſſion; which he did in ſuch a manner, that dr. Lloyd ſaid to me, it was not poſſible for him to doubt of his ſincerity in it, p. 446.

by whom, or how, or giving the leaſt warrant for what he advances. I do not ſay that all this is falſe, for I know nothing of it. But as it is not forbid to rely on the faithfulneſs of the author, or of thoſe from whom he has received his informations; ſo neither is it forbid to doubt of it, and to believe that he might be prejudiced by party ſtories, which are implicitly ſwallowed or rejected, according as they are advantageous or prejudicial to the ſide eſpouſed by thoſe who hear them.

Bedloe had given but a very imperfect information of the murder of Godfrey. He ſaid indeed, it was commited in Somerſet-houſe, and that he had ſeen the dead body. But as to other circumſtances, he only ſpoke of them as received from perſons who had abſented themſelves; whereas Prance delivered in writing a more regular and full account, which contained preciſely his depoſition before the King in council, and was to the following effect:

The ſubſtance of Prance's depoſition concerning ſir Edmundbury Godfrey's murder. Jan 2. Prance's Examin. Burnet, p. 445. Echard, Vol. III. p. 508.

"Girald, Kelly, Green, Berry, Hill and Prance, "with the approbation of ſome others, after ſe- "veral conſultations (1), had reſolved to murder "ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, as being a bitter per- "ſecutor of the Catholics, an active diſcoverer of "their deſigns, and a particular enemy to the "Queen's ſervants. Thus determined, on Satur- "day the twelfth of October, Hill went to ſir "Edmundbury Godfrey's houſe in the morning, "and talked with him in private (2). Then "taking his leave, he went to Girald and Green, "and with them ſtaid hard by, waiting for the "gentleman's coming out, which he did about ten "or eleven, all alone as uſually. They dogged "him to ſeveral places, till about ſix or ſeven in "the evening, when Green went to Prance's houſe, "and told him, They had ſet him near St. Cle- "ment's; and that Prance muſt make all haſte to "the Water-gate at Somerſet-houſe, where he "ſhould find Kelly and Berry, which he did; and "they three waited there till about nine o'clock: "when of a ſudden Hill came running and ſaid, "'He was coming, and they muſt pretend a quar- "rel, and he would fetch him in.' While Kelly "and Berry were in a ſeeming ſcuffle, Hill, at the "gate, ſtoped ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, and in- "treated him for God's ſake to come in, for two "men were a 'quarrelling, and he was afraid "there would be bloodſhed.' The gentleman be- "ing a magiſtrate, did at laſt conſent, and Hill "entered the gate firſt, to ſhew him the perſons; "and after them followed Girald and Green; "while Prance watched the Water-gate, and Berry "was to ſecure the paſſage by the chapel. But "firſt, he and Kelly, the pretended combatants, "ſtood about the end of the rail by the Queen's "ſtables; and as ſir Edmundbury went down to- "wards them, Green ſuddenly threw a twiſted "handkerchief about his neck, and immediately "all four pulled him down and ſtrangled him, "ſo as he could make no noiſe; after which "they threw him behind the rail, and gave "him ſome violent punches on the breaſt with "their knees, and Green with all his force rung "his neck almoſt round. Prance and Berry being "come to them, when he was quite dead, they all "helped to carry the body into dr. Godden's lodg- "ings, where Hill lived, and where they brought "him up five or ſix ſteps, into a little room on the "right-hand, and there left him that night, and Sun- "day all day and night. On Monday night, Hill "and ſome others removed him into a room in "the upper court, where Prance was ſhewn the "body by the light of a dark-lanthorn, and where "Bedloe ſwore he ſaw Prance. On Tueſday "Night, they carried him to another room in the "long entry over-againſt dr. Godden's lodgings; "and on Wedneſday night they removed it to "the little room where it was firſt laid. Having "kept the body above four days and nights, "Girald and Kelly adviſed to have it carried into "the fields, and leave him run thro' with his own "ſword, that he might be ſuppoſed to have mur- "dered himſelf; and therefore his money, rings, &c. "were all to be left with him. This being agreed, "they reſolved to carry him out that night; and "accordingly Hill procured a ſedan, or chair, into "which they put the body about twelve o'clock. "Berry the Porter, having invited the centinels in- "to his houſe, opened the gate, and Prance and "Girald carried out the ſedan (3). Thus ſome- "times they two, and ſometimes Kelly and Green, "carried it up towards Soho-fields, hard by the "Grecians church; and there Hill attending with "a horſe, they ſet the body up before him, and "left the ſedan in ſome unfiniſhed builings in that "place; whereupon Girald ſaid, "I wiſh we had "a hundred ſuch rogues as ſecure as this." Then "Prance being a houſe-keeper, returned home; "and the other four went on, one leading the "horſe, Hill holding the body (4), and the other "two walking by. They carried him to a place "called Primroſe-hill, about two miles out of "town, where they left him in a ditch, with his "own ſword run thro' his body by Girald himſelf, "in the exact poſture of one that had murdered "himſelf."

This depoſition, which was immediately pub- liſhed, met with univerſal credit from the people. But afterwards, when the Popiſh party prevailed, ſeveral authors indeavored to find many miſtakes and inconſiſtencies in it, and even maintained, that it was not pened by Prance, but by ſome abler hand. As at firſt it was dangerous to ſay, that Prance was a falſe witneſs, it was afterwards no leſs dangerous to maintain, he had ſpoke the truth. Hence ſome adhere to this depoſition, and others to the writings afterwards publiſhed againſt it, to demonſtrate its falſhood.

Proclamation againſt the Papiſts. Echard, Vol. III. p. 509.

During theſe tranſactions, the King was by no means at eaſe. The plot (of which he was ſuſpected to be the author, at leaſt in what concerned the government and religion) and the impeachment againſt the earl of Danby, which intirely reflected upon him, could not but greatly perplex him. To divert a little theſe ſuſpicions, he publiſhed, the be- gining of January, ſeveral proclamations againſt the Papiſts, who, immediately after the prorogation of the parliament, were returned to London and Weſtminſter. By another proclamation, he recalled all his ſubjects from the foreign ſeminaries; but theſe were remedies little capable of curing the peoples fears and jealouſies.

over, a freſh witneſs appeared, one Stephen Dugdale, who pretended to make new diſcoveries in the plot, and accuſed five jeſuits, and one prieſt (1). This obliged the King to publiſh a new proclamation againſt Evers, Gawen, Vavaſor alias Gifford, Leviſon, jeſuits, and Broadſtreet a prieſt, with a promiſe of a hundred pounds to any that ſhould apprehend Evers, and fifty pounds each for the reſt (2).

The King diſſolves the parliament. Kennet, p. 356. Burnet.

Mean time, as the meeting of the parliament approached, the King perceiving, that in the preſent diſpoſition of the commons, he ſhould receive no advantage from them, but rather new mortifications, on the twenty-fourth of January diſſolved this parliament by proclamation (3), promiſing withal, to iſſue out writs for the calling of a new parliament the ſixth of March following. Thus ended the Long Parliament, which had continued almoſt eighteen years, and for twelve years been ſo favorable to his Majeſty. Never parliament had been ſo liberal to any King, or carried the prerogative higher. If Charles II had not purſued methods ſo contrary to the intereſts of the kingdom, he would never have loſt the affection of this parliament, which ſtudied only to pleaſe him, and give him the moſt effectual proofs of their loyalty. But when, in proceſs of time, they diſcovered, that the King had ill deſigns againſt the government, and the eſtabliſhed religion, which he had ſufficiently ſhewn by his two wars againſt Holland, and his intimate union with France, they began to conſider him as an enemy to the nation, whoſe deſigns and meaſures were broken. The letters, produced by mr. Montague in the parliament, fully convinced the moſt incredulous, that the King was a penſioner of France, and ſacrificed to that crown the intereſt of England. It is therefore no wonder, that the parliament credited the diſcovery of a plot, which was ſo natural a conſequence of the King's deſigns, now intirely believed. Indeed, the firſt article of this plot, concerning the killing of the King, might be doubtful and uncertain; wherefore the parliament willingly left it to the deciſion of the courts of juſtice. But the two laſt, relating to render the King abſolute, and ſubverting the eſtabliſhed religion, needed no other proofs than thoſe his Majeſty had given. Beſide, the duke of York being a declared Papiſt, and having great influence in the King's counſels, it was not difficult to conceive, that he being ſuch a zealot for his religion, would loſe any opportunity to promote it: and this his ſecretary's letter plainly demonſtrated. Indeed, this parliament was compoſed chiefly of rigid Epiſcopalians, who perhaps cannot be vindicated in their perſecution of the Preſbyterians. But however, they were not willing to ſacrifice the Proteſtant religion, and the liberties of the nation, to their paſſion againſt Preſbyterianiſm. From thence flowed the quarrels between the King and the parliament; the mortifications ſo frequently given him, and his diſſolution of it at laſt, tho' he had in it ſo many creatures, purchaſed either with ready money or penſions. At firſt, this trade was ſecretly carried on, but after Clifford's advancement to the treaſury, it was practiſed ſo openly, that every man's name and price were publicly known. Notwithſtanding all this, when once the conduct of the King and court was conſidered, it was not poſſible for his Majeſty to obtain a majority in the houſe of commons, becauſe thoſe who were ready to ſacrifice the nation's money to the King, would not ſacrifice to him their liberties and religion. There was another cauſe alſo which ſtoped the King in his career, viz. that as ſoon as the people were diſſatisfied with the court, vacancies in the parliament were filled with men of quite contrary principles to the King and duke of York, ſo that, in time, the parliament became very different from what it was at the begining. It is not therefore ſtrange, that the King ſhould deſire to be rid of a parliament, from which he could expect no farther benefit: but he flattered himſelf in vain, with having another more favorable, as hereafter will appear.

Elections for a new parliament. Id. p. 512.

On the twenty-fifth of January, the King iſſued out writs for the new election, which put the whole nation into a ferment. It happened to the King, on this occaſion, as it had done to his father. The people being diſcontented with the court, and full of fears and jealouſies; affected to chuſe for repreſentatives thoſe moſt averſe to Popery and arbitrary government. And as the high-church-men had been for ſeveral years a little too ſtrongly attached to the King; and had, in the laſt parliament, paſſed acts to raiſe the Royal prerogative higher than ever, the people in general were not for truſting their intereſts in ſuch hands. On the contrary, the Preſbyterians, tho' long oppreſſed, were ſtill numerous in the corporations, ſo that by the ſuperiority of their votes, they commonly carried the elections in favor of their own party, or at leaſt of men, who had only outwardly conformed to the church of England. In ſhort, when the returns were made, it appeared, that moſt of the repreſentatives were men very oppoſite to the court's principles and deſigns. The King, to prevent theſe impreſſions, affected an extraordinary ſeverity againſt the Papiſts, and by proclamation, on complaint of the neglects of the proſecution of recuſants, ordered the chancellor to put out of commiſſion all juſtices of peace, who were remiſs in their duty. But this artifice was too common to be capable of perſuading the people, that the King was truly zealous for the Proteſtant religion.

Robinſon's depoſition.

One Robinſon teſtified, That he heard him

(1) Burnet gives the following account of this Dugdale and his evidence. He had been the lord Aſton's bailif, and was a man of ſenſe and temper. He behaved himſelf decently, and had ſomewhat in his air and deportment that diſpoſed the people to believe him: ſo that the King himſelf began to think there was ſomewhat in the plot, tho' he had little regard to Oates or Bedloe. He made a diſcovery of a correſpondence that Evers held with the jeſuits in London, who had writ to Evers of the deſign of killing the King, and deſired him to find out proper men for executing it. Three other jeſuits preſſed Dugdale to undertake it, promiſing he ſhould be canonized for it, and the lord Stafford offered him five hundred pounds, if he would ſet about it. Dugdale's evidence was confirmed by one circumſtance. He had talked in the country of a juſtice of peace in Weſtminſter who was killed, on the Tueſday after Godfrey was miſſed; ſo that the news of this muſt have been writ from London by the Saturday night's poſt. He did not think it a ſecret, and ſo talked of it as news at an alehouſe. The two perſons, he ſaid he ſpoke to, remembered nothing of it, but ſeveral others ſwore they had heard it. He ſaid moreover, that the duke had ſent to Coleman when in Newgate, to perſuade him to diſcover nothing, and deſired to know whether he had ever diſcovered their deſigns to any other perſon; and that Coleman ſent anſwer, that he had ſpoke of them to Godfrey, but to no other man, upon which the duke gave order to kill him, p. 444.

say, " That he believed he ſhould be the firſt " martyr."

Prance's depoſition.

Prance's evidence was the ſame with what he had before depoſed. The priſoners objected to him, that he had recanted, and denied all before the King and council. The court made for him the anſwer which he had before given to the council, That " all that was nothing but an unuſual " fear, and a want of a full aſſurance of his par- " don" (1). Some repreſent this as a great partiality in the judge. But it muſt be obſerved, that judges ſit upon the trial of criminals, not to condemn or acquit: the jury decide the caſe, and find the priſoners guilty or not guilty. When therefore any material difficulty offers, it is the office of the judge to direct the jury, and ſhow them what they are, and what they are not to mind, with the reaſons of their opinion. So I hope, that on this occaſion the court did not exceed the bounds of their duty, tho' I will affirm nothing.

Hill's wife aſked Prance, Whether he had not been tortured in Newgate, ſince ſeveral had heard him cry out in that place? He anſwered, " That " he had not ——— That captain Richardſon had " uſed him as civilly as any man in England; and " that all the time he was there, he wanted for " nothing." This anſwer, as we ſee, is very contradictory to the aggravated recital of his torments, tho' even in that recital, nothing is ſaid which tends to ſhew, that he was put to the torture. However, the author of the recital, better informed than Prance himſelf, ſcruples not to ſay, " That the " poor man, to ſupport the credit of his evidence, " was forced to diſown all his barbarous uſage."

State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 780.

L'Eſtrange.

Bedloe's evidence.

" Bedloe had already depoſed before the lords, " that le Phaire, Walſh, Pritchard, Keins, &c. had " wheedled ſir Edmundbury Godfrey into Somer- " ſet-houſe court, under pretenſe of taking ſome " ploters, and after a turn or two, and the excuſe " of ſending for a conſtable, they ſhoved him into " a room, preſented a piſtol to him, threatening to " kill him if he made any noiſe, but would do him " no hurt, if he would ſend for his examinations; " which he refuſing to do, they ſtifled him be- " tween two pillows, and after that, upon finding " ſome life in him, they ſtrangled him with a long " cravat."

Some have obſerved, that this firſt evidence of Bedloe, was directly contrary to Prance's. Others have remarked, that Bedloe never ſaid he was preſent at the murder, but only depoſed what he heard from others; conſequently, that there was no real contradiction between the two witneſſes.

In the trial before us, Bedloe depoſed, " That " about a fortnight before the murder, le Phaire, " Pritchard, Keins, and ſome other Romiſh prieſts, " all unknown to Prance, diſcourſed Bedloe about " killing a certain gentleman, not named; and " then ſet him to inſinuate himſelf into ſir Ed- " mundbury Godfrey's acquaintance, which he did " under ſeveral pretenſes. That on the very day " of the murder, le Phaire told him, There was " a gentleman to be put out of the way that night, " and would have him to aſſiſt, and that there " would be four thouſand pounds reward from the " lord Bellaſis, &c. and therefore deſired him to " meet in the cloiſter at Somerſet-houſe that even- " ing, for thereabouts it was to be done; which " he promiſed to do, but wilfully failed them, be- " cauſe he would not have his hands in blood. On " Monday after, le Phaire meeting him, charged " him with breach of promiſe, and appointed him " to come to Somerſet-houſe at nine that night, " where he told the witneſs, ' That he had done " ill, that he did not help in the buſineſs; but if " he would help to carry him off, he ſhould ſtill " have half the reward;' and told him he was " actually murdered. The witneſs aſked, if he " might ſee him; upon which le Phaire led him " thro' a dark entry, into a room where were ſeveral " people, and Prance among them, and only by " the light of a dark-lanthorn he ſaw the face of " the murdered perſon, and knew him to be ſir " Edmundbury Godfrey. The witneſs adviſed to " tie weights about him, and throw him into the " Thames; but they did not approve of that, " but ſaid, they would put it upon himſelf, and " carry him out in a chair, by the help of the " porter Berry, at twelve that night. The wit- " neſs promiſed, upon the ſacrament, which he " had taken the Thurſday before, to come again " and help them; but being got from them, his " conſcience would not permit him to go any far- " ther, tho' he had been promiſed two thouſand " pounds for his labor, but he rather choſe to diſ- " cover the villainy to the King and council, and " accept of a quarter of the ſum in an honeſt way."

Charles II. An' 1678.

What appears moſt ſurpriſing in this depoſition is, not its contrariety to the firſt, in which he only ſpoke by hearſay; but that Bedloe did not relate theſe circumſtances to the lords, having only ſaid, that he had ſeen Godfrey's body in Somerſet-houſe, and Prance in the ſame room.

The conſtable that viewed the body in the ditch, gave an account, " That the ſword was ſticking " thro' him, but no blood appeared upon the " ground, and he found gold and ſilver in his " pockets." Two ſurgeons ſwore, " That they " verily believed the ſword was run thro' him after " he was dead and cold; but that he died by rea- " ſon of the ſuffocation, and breaking of his neck, " and bruiſes, on his breaſt."

The conſtable's depoſition.

Sir Robert Southwell depoſed, " That Prance " having related the matter to the council; and " being ſent with the duke of Monmouth and the earl " of Offory to ſhew the place he mentioned, did " readily go to them all, and they appeared all to " be ſuch as he had deſcribed them; only as to " the room in the upper court, where the body " was laid one night, having never been there but " once, he ſaid he could not poſitively aſſign it, " but pointing to ſome rooms, ſaid, he was ſure " it was thereabouts."

Sir Robert Southwell's depoſition.

As to the priſoners defenſe, Hill brought ſeveral witneſſes to prove, " That he was never out of his " lodgings after eight o'clock at night, during the " whole time of this tranſaction."

Some have pretended, that theſe depoſitions were not regarded, becauſe the witneſſes were Papiſts. But there is no mention of any ſuch thing in the printed trial, and it is difficult to know the thoughts of the jury, who were the ſole judges of theſe evidences.

Beſide Hill ſhewed, " That when he heard of " Prance's being taken up for the murder, he had " full leiſure to make his eſcape, which he never " indeavoring, was a great preſumption of his in- " nocence." It is to be preſumed, the jury took but little notice of this proof.

Green proved by two witneſſes, James Warrier

(5) To this Richardſon, keeper of Newgate, anſwered, " That Prance had told him, it was fear that made him recant; " and he [Prance] gave a full ſatisfaction, that it was only out of an apprehenſion that his life was not ſecure; that his " trade would be loſt among the Roman Catholics; and in caſe he had his pardon, and was ſaved, he ſhould have been in " danger of being murdered by them." He ſaid himſelf afterwards, That it was for fear of loſing his imployment from the Queen, and the Catholics, which was the moſt of his buſineſs, and becauſe he had not his pardon. and his wife, "That he was at their houſe in the "Strand from between ſeven and eight, till after "ten, on that very night and time that ſir Ed- "mundbury Godfrey was ſaid to be murdered in "Somerſet-houſe" But unhappily, Warrier willing to corroborate his evidence, added, "That "Green's being apprehended a month after the "murder of Godfrey, recalled to his mind, that "the ſaid Green had been with him on Saturday "the twelfth of October, from eight to ten in "in the evening." But, beſide that Green was not arreſted till the twenty-fourth of December, that is to ſay, two months and twelve days after Godfrey's murder, he was not taken up for this murder, but for refuſing the oaths, which could not cauſe Warrier to remember, that Green had been with him the day Godfrey was murdered. Green added, "That when Prance was taken up, he ſhewed "ſuch a deteſtation of the fact, that he ſaid, "Rather than he ſhould eſcape, if he were guilty, "he would be the executioner himſelf." In all likelihood, this proof had no great weight with the jury. In behalf of Berry the porter, the ſoldiers that were placed centinels at the gate, teſtified, "That no ſedan went out of the gate that night "the body was ſaid to be carried off, tho' one did "come in, and that they could not be miſtaken in "ſo plain a matter." And Berry's maid declared, "That her maſter was in bed by twelve o'clock "that night, and never ſtired out, which made it "impoſſible for him to be upon the whole ex- "pedition."

Burnet, p. 447.

They all indeavored likewiſe to invalidate Prance's evidence; but the court obſerved, "That "it was impoſſible that mr. Prance, a man of that "mean capacity, ſhould invent a ſtory with ſo "many conſiſting circumſtances, if there was no "truth in the bottom of it" But adds the hiſtorian whom I have often quoted, "others obſerved, "That the ſtory was invented by ſome body elſe "of a greater capacity." This inſinuation is ſupported only upon this ſyſtem. But beſide, had the pener of this narrative been ſo able as is ſuppoſed, it would not have been difficult to make it perfectly agree with Bedloe's firſt depoſition, whereas it was different in many reſpects. For when a man is only to invent, and has falſe witneſſes ready to ſupport the invention, he need not be much fatigued about the facts.

They are condemned. State-Trials, Vol. II. p. 785.

In fine, the jury brought them in all guilty of the murder. Whereupon, the lord chief juſtice Scroggs ſaid, "They had found the ſame verdict "that he would have found, if he had been one "with them."

And executed without making any confeſſion. Echard, Vol. III. p. 516. Burnet, p. 447.

They all three inſiſted on their innocence to the laſt moment of their lives. Berry owned, "That "he was a Proteſtant in his heart, but had for "ſome time diſſembled his religion for his private "advantage."

Hill, to perſuade the ordinary of Newgate of his innocence, gave him this notable proof of it; "That he had wronged one in a twelve- "penny matter, which had ſo troubled his con- "ſcience, that he had made reſtitution ſince his "condemnation, tho' he was in extreme want of "preſent neceſſaries:" And therefore he thus argued with him, "If I have taken ſhame upon my "ſelf, in confeſſing my crime in the caſe of a trifle; "can you think I would deny the murder to main- "tain my reputation?"

Green and Hill were executed the twenty-firſt of February; but Berry was reprieved till the twenty-eighth of May.

Mean while the King being apprehenſive that the new parliament would impeach the earl of Danby, and that the earl, to prevent his own deſtruction, would be obliged to reveal ſecrets which he wiſhed to be kept private, granted him, under the great ſeal, as full and compleat a pardon as could be drawn.

The King's ſpeech to the parliament. Kennet, p. 306.

The ſixth of March the new parliament meeting, the King made a ſpeech, tending to ſhew how well affected he was to the laws of the land, and the Proteſtant religion. He ſpoke of his care in puniſhing, as well thoſe concerned in the plot, as the murderers of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, and did not forget mentioning the removal of the duke of York. Laſtly, he demanded money for diſbanding the army, and for paying the fleet. The chancellor inlarged on all theſe points with great exaggerations, according to his cuſtom.

A difference between the King and commons about the choice of a ſpeaker. Ibid. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 522, &c.

At the opening the parliament there was a warm conteſt between the King and commons, about the choice of a ſpeaker. The commons having choſen mr. Edward Seymour (2), the King who knew Seymour was a particular enemy of the earl of Danby, refuſed his approbation, and ordered the commons to proceed to a new election. The houſe was extremely diſpleaſed with this refuſal, alleging, "That it was never known that a perſon ſhould "be excepted againſt, and no reaſon at all given, "and that the thing itſelf, of preſenting a ſpeaker "to the King, was but a bare compliment." The King, on his ſide, inſiſted on the approbation or refuſal of a ſpeaker when preſented to him, as a branch of his prerogative (3). During a ſix days diſpute, the commons made ſeveral repreſentations to the King, to which he returned very ſhort anſwers. At length, as the commons would not deſiſt from what they thought their right, the King went to parliament, and prorogued it from the thirteenth to the fifteenth; that is, for one days interval between the two ſeſſions. The parliament meeting the fifteenth, the King ordered the commons to proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker: who, to avoid a revival of the diſpute, choſe

mr. William Gregory ſerjeant at law, who was approved by the King (1).

The commons began with appointing a commitee to examine controverted elections, there having been ſixty petitions already preſented.

This affair being put into a way of determination, the commons appeared reſolved to purſue thoſe matters which the late parliament had left undecided. To this end, the twentieth of March, they appointed a ſecret commitee, to take informations, prepare evidence, and draw up articles againſt the lords who were impeached, and to take ſuch farther informations as ſhould be given, relating to the plot againſt his Majeſty and the government, and the murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey. At the ſame time, they deſired the lords, by an expreſs meſſage, to remember the impeachment of high-treaſon exhibited againſt Thomas earl of Danby, in the name of the commons of England, and to commit him to ſafe cuſtody. They reſolved alſo, that it ſhould be refered to the commitee of ſecreſy, to draw up farther articles againſt him. The earl of Danby was greatly imbaraſſed; for he could make no defenſe, without producing the letters writ by his Majeſty's particular order, and other papers which the King was willing to conceal. Wherefore he reſolved to adhere to the benefit of his pardon.

The affair of the earl of Danby reſumed.

Next day, the twenty-firſt of March, dr. Tonge, Oates, Bedloe, and a Scotſman, one Edmund Everard, a new diſcoverer, were called before the commons, to give in their informations concerning the plot. Bedloe having delivered in his information, the houſe reſolved, "That an humble addreſs be "preſented to his Majeſty, that the five hundred "pounds promiſed by his proclamation for the "diſcovery of the murder of ſir Edmunbury "Godfrey, may be paid to mr. Bedloe, and that "he would farther be pleaſed to order, that the "twenty pounds reward for the diſcovery of every "prieſt, may be effectually paid to the diſcoverers."

By another addreſs they deſired, "That the care "of mr. Bedloe's ſafety might be recommended "to the duke of Monmouth." The King anſwered, "That he would take immediate care for "the payment of the five hundred pounds, and "the twenty pounds they deſired: that he had "hitherto taken all the care he could of mr. Bedloe: "that he knew how conſiderable his evidence was: "that he would ſee hereafter, that he ſhould want "for nothing; but that he could not be anſwerable "for him when he went abroad."

The King's anſwer.

Upon the whole, the commons came to a vote ſomething like that in the laſt parliament, viz. "That the houſe doth declare, that they are "fully ſatisfied that there now is, and for diverſe "years laſt paſt hath been, a horrid and treaſonable "plot and conſpiracy, contrived and carried on by "thoſe of the Popiſh religion, for the murdering "his Majeſty's ſacred perſon, and for ſubverting "the Proteſtant religion, and the ancient and well "eſtabliſhed government of this kingdom." The lords concurred to this vote without heſitation; as alſo to an addreſs to be preſented jointly by both houſes to the King, praying him to appoint a ſolemn day of humiliation and faſting throughout the whole kingdom. The King granted their requeſt, and the eleventh day of April was appointed to be kept as a public faſt.

A faſt appointed. Kennet. p. 361. Echard.

The twenty-ſecond of March, the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to ſecure the King and kingdom againſt the danger and growth of Popery.

The King going to the parliament the ſame day, ſpoke to both houſes in favor of the earl of Danby. But the commons, unmoved with his ſpeech, were no ſooner returned to their houſe, than they ſent a meſſage to the lords, demanding that the earl might be forthwith commited to ſafe cuſtody. The lords ſeeing the warmth of the commons, offered them, in a conference, the draught of a bill, by which the earl of Danby ſhould be for ever incapable of coming into his Majeſty's preſenſe; and of all offices and imployments; and of receiving any gifts or grants from the crown; and of ſiting in the houſe of peers. But the commons were not ſatisfied with ſuch a bill, probably, for two reaſons. Firſt, that the earl of Danby had among the leading commons implacable enemies. Second, that purpoſing to diſcover the King's ſecrets, by a ſtrict examination of the earl of Danby's affairs, they ſaw that this bill was only an artifice to conceal what they wiſhed to have known and divulged.

Mean while, the commons hearing that the King had ſigned a pardon for the earl of Danby, appointed a commitee to repair to the chancellor, and inquire how this pardon was ſealed, and at whoſe ſuit. The chancellor anſwered, "That it was done "very privately, the King having ordered him to "bring the ſeal into his cloſet, and lay it upon "the table; that his Majeſty commanded the ſeal "to be taken out of the bag, and ordered the "perſon who uſually carried the purſe, to affix it "to the pardon." The chancellor added in his juſtification, "That at the very time of affixing "the ſeal to the parchment, he did not look upon "himſelf to have the cuſtody of the ſeal: that the "pardon was paſſed with the utmoſt privacy, at "the deſire of the earl, who gave this reaſon for "it, 'That he did not intend to make uſe of it, "but to ſtand upon his innocence, except falſe wit-"neſſes ſhould be produced againſt him; and then "he would make uſe of it at the laſt extremity:' "That notwithſtanding this reaſon, he adviſed the "earl to let the pardon paſs in the regular courſe; "but after conſulting with the King, his Majeſty "declared, 'He was reſolved to let it paſs with "all privacy (2).

(2) The King, in his ſpeech for the earl, ſaid, he had done nothing but by his order, and therefore he had pardoned him; and if there was any defect in his pardon, he would paſs it over and over again, until it ſhould be legal. Upon this a great debate was raiſed; ſome queſtioned whether the King's pardon, eſpecially when paſſed in bar to an impeachment, was good in law: this would incourage ill miniſters, who would be always ſure of a pardon. The King's pardon did indeed ſecure one againſt all proſecution at his ſuit: but, as in caſe of murder an appeal lay, from which the King's pardon did not cover the perſon, ſince the King could no more pardon the injuries done his people, than he could forgive the debts that were owing to them; ſo from a parity of reaſon it was infered, that ſince the offenſe of miniſters of ſtate were injuries done the public, the King's pardon could not hinder a proſecution of parliament, which ſeemed to be one of the chief ſecurities, and moſt eſſential parts of our conſtitution.——When the bill of baniſhment, which paſſed in the houſe of lords, was ſent down to the commons, Winnington fell on it in a moſt furious manner, and inflamed the houſe ſo, that tho' it was offered that the earl ſhould be degraded of his peerage as well as baniſhed, and that no pardon for the future ſhould be pleaded in bar to an impeachment; the bill was thrown out by the commons, and a bill of attainder brought in, as will be ſeen hereafter. A remark upon the plot.

I have several times said, That the people in general were persuaded, not only of the reality of the plot, at least with regard to the government and religion, but that even the King and duke of York were the real authors of it. This speech plainly shews, it was at least the opinion of the speaker, and when a member of the commons advances such propositions, without a reprimand, one may be sure he speaks the general sense of that house. Beside, the removal of the duke of York was a demonstration, that the King was not ignorant of his being suspected to submit too much to the counsels of his brother. It is therefore difficult to conceive, why so many sensible men obstinately labor to shew, there was no real plot, because the article concerning the design of killing the King, may be doubtful. For, the truth of the two other branches, concerning the government and religion, flows from so many circumstances, that a man must be wilfully blind not to see it. Perhaps the word Plot offends some persons, who cannot comprehend how a King can plot against his subjects. But if this is all, there is a way to be soon agreed. Instead of saying there was a plot to subvert the government and Protestant religion, let it be said, there was a project or design on foot, headed by the King and the duke of York, to render his Majesty absolute, and introduce Popery. But this is precisely what is meaned by the plot. For the design of killing the King was only an appendix to the plot, supposing it real, and an effect of the furious zeal of some private persons, who thought they could better accomplish it by placing the duke of York on the throne.

An' 1679. March 25. Echard, Vol. III. p. 528.

I shall not here insert the earl of Shaftsbury's speech in the house of lords, because so much pains has been taken to represent him as the King's greatest enemy, and the first mover of the whole party, that whatever came from him must be suspected. I shall produce, however, one passage of this speech: " Popery, says he, and slavery, like " two sisters, go hand in hand; sometimes one " goes first, sometimes the other; but wheresoever " the one enters, the other is always following close " at hand. In England, Popery was to have " brought in Slavery; in Scotland, Slavery went " before, and Popery was to follow." Thus much is certain, that his observation on the slavery of Scotland was exactly true, and that the duke of Lauderdale, supported by the court, exercised among the Scots a tyranny unknown to their fore-fathers. What therefore could the English imagine, when they saw a neighboring kingdom, invested with no less privileges than England, governed in so absolute a manner, under the same King and the same ministry? Could they expect that the same principles would not be followed in England, if it could be done with the same facility?

The earl of Danby withdraws.

The same day, the lords sent a message to acquaint the house of commons, that the earl of Danby had withdrawn, and could not be found. Whereupon the commons ordered, " That a bill be " brought in to summon Thomas earl of Danby, " to render himself to justice by a day to be therein " limited, or in default thereof, to attaint him." The third of April articles of impeachment against the five lords in the Tower were drawn up by the commons, and carried to the house of lords, as well as the bill to fix a day for the earl of Danby to render himself to justice. The lords having sent back this last bill with some amendments, the commons were dissatisfied, because the lords were not of opinion, in case the earl refused to surrender himself, to proceed against him by bill of attainder, but to content themselves with inflicting other penalties. The two houses had several conferences upon this subject, in which the commons continued immoveable, without any diminution of their rigor against the earl. At last the lords passed the bill, and appointed the twenty-third of April for the earl's surrendering himself to trial. The earl seeing that his absense could not hinder the bill of attainder from passing against him, resolved at last to surrender himself to the usher of the black-rod, and the same day he was sent to the Tower. The King then found himself plunged in greater difficulties than he had ever struggled with before, as he saw the earl of Danby could not make his defense without divulging his secrets.

The King forms a new council. Temple's Mem. Kennet. Echard. Burnet.

If King Charles would have altered his maxims and principles, he might easily have extricated himself out of these troubles. He had only to break his union with France; dismiss those of his ministers who were disagreeable to the parliament; and act with sincerity for the interest of the kingdom and of the Protestant religion; abandoning all the projects he had hitherto formed. But he could not resolve to make this sacrifice, both because he believed his honor concerned; and his design being only to gain time, and amuse the parliament. It was with this view, that by the advice of sir William Temple, he resolved to establish a new council, into which were admited some lords most opposite to him, as the earls of Shaftsbury and Essex. This council consisted of thirty members, fifteen of whom were ever to be the present chief officers of his crown and household. Ten were to be taken out of the nobility, and five out of the commons. But he so managed in the modeling this council, as to have a majority of such as were devoted to him. The earl of Shaftsbury was made president, tho' no man was more hated by the King. His aim was to persuade the public and the parliament, that he was resolved intirely to change his manner of governing, and be guided in all affairs whatsoever, by the advice of the new council. But this was only an amusement. For as it was not possible for the King to depart from his principles, concerning religion or government, so most of his new counsellors were not for sacrificing the Royal authority to the will of the parliament. The earl of Shaftsbury would have been highly pleased with being president of the council, if his authority had been proportionable to his office. But he quickly perceived, he was there only for shew, and to be subservient to the King's designs, while others had his confidence. There were chiefly four who had the direction of affairs commited to them, viz. the earls of Sunderland and Essex, the lord Hallifax, and sir William Temple. These digested and prepared what was to be offered to the council or the parliament.

Acquaints the parliament with it. Kennet, p. 362. Echard, Vol. III. p. 536.

No sooner had the King made this alteration, than he came to the parliament to acquaint them with it. But tho' the city of London, and the rest of the kingdom resounded with joyful acclamations, and were persuaded that things were going to change for

for the better, the houſe of commons received the news with great coldneſs. They had not ſufficient confidence in his Majeſty, to believe he really intended to govern otherwiſe than he had hitherto done, but thought this was ſome new artifice which would ſoon produce its effects: therefore, by this change, the King gained but little ground in the houſe of commons. I am ſenſible the diſtruſt of the commons is aſcribed to Shaftſbury's intrigues, and ſir William Temple even inſinuates it in ſeveral places. But it is not eaſy to comprehend how a ſingle man ſhould have had credit enough in the country party, to direct them as he pleaſed, if that party had not otherwiſe known what Shaftſbury labored to make them believe. For inſtance, this earl inſinuated that the nation could not be ſecured againſt the duke of York, and that when he ſhould once poſſeſs the crown, all proviſions againſt him would vaniſh. Was he in the wrong? And was there need of ſo great a credit to convince the country party of a thing they were but too well convinced of before? It is therefore a mere artifice ſolely to impute the animoſity of the commons to the earl of Shaftſbury, as if it had no other foundation than his credit and intrigues, in order to remove thereby the juſt and real occaſions of complaint againſt the King's government. The meaſures purſued by the court in the foregoing years, both againſt the eſtabliſhed government and religion, had been ſeen. What had the King done to cauſe them to be forgot? He had iſſued out proclamations againſt the Papiſts, but they were ſo ill executed, that they were not apt to inſpire the parliament with confidence. The King under color that he might be ingaged in a war againſt France, had levied thirty thouſand men, and at the ſame time was negociating a yearly penſion with that crown of ſix millions of livres for their maintenance, as plainly appeared from the letters produced in parliament. What had the King done to remove the fears occaſioned by this army? He had applied to their maintenance the money granted by the parliament for their diſbanding; and if he had conſented to their being diſmiſſed, it was becauſe he applied to another uſe the money received from France. In fine, was it poſſible to forget the tranſactions of the Cabal; the King's indolence with regard to the intereſts of England and of all Europe; the frequent prorogations of parliament at critical times, when vigorous reſolutions were taking againſt the growing power of France; his deſign, in conjunction with that crown, of utterly deſtroying the commonwealth of Holland; a deſign ſo directly oppoſite to the intereſts of England? Could it not be perceived, that the King was without legitimate children, and the duke of York his brother and preſumptive heir, not only a Papiſt, but alſo a bigot to his religion? Could the tranſactions in Scotland be concealed, where arbitrary power was compleatly eſtabliſhed? I do but juſt mention ſome of the principal points, for it would be too tedious to relate all the cauſes of the nation's ſuſpicions and fears. After this, how is it poſſible to believe that Shaftſbury's intrigues and artifices were the ſole cauſe of the commons diſtruſt? I do not doubt but he contributed to them, and that being ſo well informed, as he was, of the King's ſecret deſigns, he opened the eyes of many people, who perhaps would have been deceived by the artifices of the court. But this is not what is meaned by aſcribing the peoples fears and jealouſies to the intrigues of this earl. That he was actuated by a ſpirit of revenge, is no concern of mine, but the event too plainly ſhewed, how agreeable were his advices to the kingdom's intereſt.

An obſervation upon the earl of Shaftſbury. Temple's Mem. Part III. p. 335, &c.

While the alterations the new council was to make in the government's affairs were impatiently expected, the commons were ſuddenly alarmed by an information of a freſh deſign of the Papiſts to burn London a ſecond time. The houſe of one Bird in Fetter-Lane being ſet on fire, his ſervant, Elizabeth Oxley, was ſuſpected of firing it on purpoſe, and ſent to priſon. She confeſſed the fact, and declared, ſhe had been imployed to do it by one Stubbs a Papiſt, who had promiſed her five pounds. Stubbs being taken up, confeſſed, he perſuaded her to it, and that father Gifford his confeſſor, put him upon it, telling him, "it was no "ſin to burn all the houſes of Heretics." He added, that he had frequent conferences on this affair with Gifford, and two Iriſhmen. Moreover Stubbs and the maid ſervant declared, the Papiſts were to make an inſurrection, and expected an army of ſixty thouſand men from France. The commons obtained a pardon for Stubbs and the ſervant, in conſideration of their ready confeſſion. But it was generally infered from this incident, that it was not Gifford's fault that the city of London was not burnt as in the year 1666.

A deſign diſcovered to burn London. Echard, Vol. III. p. 540.

This diſcovery produced an addreſs from the commons to the King, for the execution of Pickering the jeſuit, and the other condemned prieſts.

But the commons ſtoped not there. They reſolved the ſame day to ſit on the morrow, tho' Sunday, to conſider of means for the preſervation of the King's perſon and the Proteſtant religion, againſt the attempts of the Papiſts, both during the reign of his preſent Majeſty and his ſucceſſor. Accordingly, next morning, they firſt ordered a bill to be brought in to baniſh all Papiſts, or reputed Papiſts, within London and Weſtminſter, twenty miles from the ſame, for ſix months; and then they voted, nemine contradicente, "That the "duke of York being a Papiſt, the hopes of his "coming ſuch to the crown, has given the greateſt "countenance and incouragement to the preſent "conſpiracies and deſigns of the Papiſts againſt the "King and the Proteſtant religion." This vote was ſent to the lords for their concurrence (1).

Vote of the commons againſt the duke of York. Kennet, p. 363. Echard.

The earl of Danby appeared the twenty-fifth of April, at the bar of the houſe of lords, and there produced the King's pardon for all crimes and offenſes whatſoever commited before the twenty-eight day of February laſt: after which he was ſent back to the Tower. The lords having given notice of this to the commons, they appointed a commitee of ſecreſy to examine the nature of the earl's plea, who made their report, "That there was no precedent, "of a pardon granted to any perſon impeached by "the commons of high treaſon, or other high "crimes depending in the impeachment." After this report, the commons deſired the lords to demand of the earl of Danby, "Whether he would "rely upon, and abide by the plea of his pardon." This was the next day, and the earl praying time to anſwer, the lords allowed him four days.

The earl of Danby pleads the King's pardon. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 733.

The ſame day, the King returned this anſwer to the commons addreſs for the execution of Pickering and other prieſts, "Gentlemen, I have always been "tender in matters of blood, which my ſubjects "have no reaſon to take exception at: but this is "a matter of great weight, I ſhall therefore con-"ſider of it, and return you an anſwer."

Kennet, p. 363.

The vote of the commons concerning the duke of York touched the King very ſenſibly, he foreſeeing they did not intend to ſtop there. He therefore went to the parliament the thirtieth of April, and in a ſhort ſpeech recommended to both houſes the diſpatch of three affairs: 1. The proſecution of the plot. 2. The disbanding of the army. 3. The providing a fleet for the common security. Then to give them a proof of his care to preserve their religion for the future, he told them, "That he "had commanded his chancellor to mention several "particulars, which he hoped would be an evi- "dence, that in all things that concerned the "public security, he should not follow their zeal "but lead it."

Accordingly, the chancellor made the following speech:

My Lords, and you the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons.

The lord chancellor's speech.

"THAT Royal care which his Majesty hath "taken for the general quiet and satisfaction "of all his subjects, is now more evident by these "new and fresh instances of it, which I have in "command to open to you. His Majesty had con- "sidered with himself, that it is not enough that "your religion and liberty is secure during his "own reign, but he thinks he owes it to his people "to do all that in him lies, that these blessings may "be transmited to your posterity, and so well se- "cured to them, that no succession in after ages "may be able to work the least alteration. And "therefore his Majesty, who hath often said in this "place, 'That he is ready to consent to any "laws of this kind, so as the same extend not to "alter the descent of the crown in the right line, "nor to defeat the succession,' hath now com- "manded this to be farther explained.

"And to the end it may never be in the power "of any Papist, if the crown descend upon him, "to make any change either in church or state; "I am commanded to tell you, That his Majesty "is willing, that provision may be made, first to "distinguish a Popish from a Protestant successor; "then so to limit and circumscribe the authority "of a Popish successor, in these cases following, "that he may be disabled to do any harm: First, in "reference to th church; his Majesty is content that "care be taken, that all ecclesiastical and spiritual "benefices and promotions in the gift of the crown, "may be confered in such a manner, that we may "be sure the incumbents shall always be of the "most pious and learned Protestants: and that no "Popish successor, while he continues so, may have "any power to controul such presentments. In "reference, to the state, and civil part of the go- "vernment, as it is already provided, 'That no "Papist can sit in either house of parliament;' so "the King is pleased that it be provided too, that "there may never want a parliament, when the "King shall happen to die, but that the parlia- "ment then in being may continue indissolvable "for a competent time; or if there be no parlia- "ment in being, then the last parliament which "was in being before that time, may re-assemble "and sit a competent time, without any new sum- "mons, or elections. And as no Papist can by "law hold any place of trust, so the King is con- "tent that it may be farther provided, That no "lords or others of the privy council, no judges of "the common law, or in chancery, shall at any "time, during the reign of any Popish successor, "be put in or displaced, but by the authority of "parliament: and that care also be taken, "that none but sincere Protestants may be justices "of the peace. In reference to the military part, "the King is willing, that no lord lieutenant, or "deputy lieutenant, nor no officer in the navy, "during the reign of any Popish successor, be put "in or removed, but either by authority of par- "liament, or of such persons as the parliament shall "intrust with such authority.

"It is hard to invent another restraint to be put "upon a Popish successor, considering how much "the revenue of the successor will depend upon "consent of parliament, and how impossible it is "to raise money without such consent. But yet, "if any thing else can occur to the wisdom of the "parliament, which may farther secure religion "and liberty against a Popish successor, without "defeating the right of succession itself, his Ma- "jesty will most readily consent to it. Thus "watchful is the King for all your safeties; and "if he could think of any thing else, that you do "either want or wish to make you happy, he "would make it his business to effect it for you. "God Almighty long continue this blessed union "between the King, and his parliament, and "people."

Charles II. An' 1679.

A reflection upon the King's offers relating to the duke of York's succession.

The house of commons did not receive these propo- sals with that applause the King had expected. Their distrust was too great for their fears and sus- picions to be removed by such offers. Tho' some authors call this an infatuation in the house of com- mons, I think myself obliged to remark, that the King indeed offered his consent to acts of parlia- ment, but suggested no means to secure the execu- tion. It was an artifice of the court of England, begun in the reign of James I, and continued under Charles I and Charles II, to represent the laws as the impregnable bulwark of the nation's liberties. And yet these three Kings had, on several occa- sions, transgressed them. I shall give here some instances, to which many more might be added. Were the laws inacted for the preservation of re- ligion under James I, punctually executed? Of what benefit could laws made for the security of their liberties be to the subjects, since James I laid down for principle, that tho' in conscience and honor, the King ought to govern his subjects with equity, he might nevertheless, by the extent of his power, govern in an absolute manner, without any controul? Did the petition of right restrain Charles I from levying ship money? Did the laws retard the same King from governing twelve years with- out a parliament, and from raising money in that interval by an absolute authority? Had Charles II been more scrupulous? Was it in virtue of the laws that he shut up the exchequer, and seized the mo- ney there without the consent of the proprietors? Was it for the better execution of the laws, which seem to secure the liberties of the subject, that he received annually from France a pension of six mil- lion of livres? Of what use therefore are laws, the execution whereof no human power can warrant, when the interests of the Prince and people are dia- metrically opposite, which could not fail to happen in the reign of a Popish successor? This suffices to demonstrate, that the King's offer of his assent to the acts he proposed, was incapable of dispelling the peoples fears; because not only no expedient was proposed to secure the execution, but it was not even in his power to give any security. Now it will be asked, what other expedient was there for securing the religion and liberties of the nation, consistent with the right of succession? I confess there was none, and affirm withal, that those offered by the King were insufficient. But to whom was this im- possibility owing? To the duke of York alone, who had openly declared himself a Papist, and from that time incessantly excited both England and France to promote the interests of his religion, as the letters of his secretary Coleman evidently testify. To inable the reader to judge of this matter, being the most material of this reign, I shall here propose some questions which are necessary to be decided before he can determine in favor of the King or par- liament.

Question

CHARLES II. AN' 1679.

Queſtion 1. Whether there was any danger to England in admiting a Popiſh ſucceſſor?

This the King himſelf did not deny, ſince he propoſed expedients to prevent this danger.

Queſtion 2. Whether the expedients propoſed by the King, were capable of preventing this danger?

This is what no perſon can either poſſitively affirm or deny. For if, on one hand, it may be ſuppoſed, that a Popiſh ſucceſſor would have ſincerely complied with the acts propoſed by the King, it may, on the other hand, with equal juſtice be ſuppoſed, that the duke of York, the immediate ſucceſſor, conſidering his principles, his humor, his temper, his zeal for his religion, would never have patiently ſuffered himſelf to be reſtrained by theſe acts of parliament. But this was a contingency which God alone could foreknow.

Queſtion 3. The commons not believing the expedients offered by the King ſufficient to prevent the danger, and the King believing the contrary, who was to yield, the King or the people repreſented by the commons?

This is what I ſhall not pretend to decide.

Queſtion 4. Which evil was greateſt, that of breaking the lineal ſucceſſion in the excluſion of the duke of York, or that of expoſing the eſtabliſhed religion to ruin?

This Queſtion ſuppoſes, that the Kings of England ſucceed by a right purely hereditary. But this ſuppoſition is greatly conteſted. It may at leaſt be affirmed, that ſeveral parliaments have decided the contrary (1). As to the queſtion in itſelf, it may at leaſt be avered, that in France, in a parallel caſe, upon the death of Henry III, the intereſts of the Catholic religion were, without heſitation, prefered to thoſe of Henry IV, who was a Proteſtant, and the next heir: but many pretended, that as the French did ill, ſo the Engliſh parliament was to blame to follow their example.

Queſtion 5. The two evils, viz. the breach in the ſucceſſion, and the expoſing of the Proteſtant religion, being ſuppoſed perfectly equal, which was to ſuffer, the rights of the duke, or the religion of the nation?

Some maintain, that the right of ſucceſſion is not to be violated upon any conſideration, and that the intereſts of religion extend not ſo far as to authorize ſuch a violation. Others on the contrary aſſert, That when things were reduced to ſuch a ſtate, that the duke or the people muſt ſuffer, the duke ought to be the ſufferer, ſince it was he who had brought matters to that condition.

The reader ought to determine theſe queſtions, before he gives a definitive ſentenſe on this affair.

Kennet. Echard.

The day after the King's and the chancellor's ſpeeches to both houſes, the commons, without taking any great notice of his Majeſty's propoſals about the ſucceſſion, proceeded on the bill for preventing the dangers ariſing from Popery, as well in his reign, as his ſucceſſors.

They alſo read the firſt time a "bill for better "prevention of illegal exaction of money from the "ſubject;" and ordered another to be brought in, "That when any member of the houſe was pre-"fered to any office or place of profit, a new writ "ſhould immediately iſſue out for electing a mem-"ber to ſerve in his ſtead."

Judgment demanded againſt the' earl of Danby. Kennet.

The fifth of May they reſolved, "That the "pardon pleaded by the earl of Danby was illegal "and void," and the ſpeaker, with the whole houſe, went up to the lords bar, and demanded judgment againſt him.

They ſhortly after drew up an addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, in the ſtrongeſt terms that could be uſed, which was carried in a full body to his Majeſty. But it ſeems the King could not then part with this miniſter, the laſt of the Cabal, and therefore he coldly anſwered, "That "he would conſider of it, and return an anſwer." Idem. Echard.

CHARLES II. AN' 1679.

An addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale.

In the mean time the King ſent a meſſage to the commons by the lord Ruſſel, who acquainted the houſe, "That his Majeſty commanded him to "let the houſe know, that he was willing to com-"ply with their requeſt concerning Pickering; and "that the law ſhould paſs upon him accordingly: "that as to the condemned prieſts, the houſe of "peers had ſent for them, in order, as his Ma-"jeſty conceived, to ſome examinations. That "he repeated his inſtances to them for put-"ing the fleet in a good poſture; for diſpatch-"ing the diſcovery of the plot; the trial of the "lords, and the bill for the ſecurity of reli-"gion."

Pickering ordered for execution. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 721. Kennet. Echard.

After this meſſage, the commons finiſhed the money bill for diſbanding the army, which the King paſſed the ninth of May. By this act a ſupply was granted to his Majeſty of two hundred and ſix thouſand, four hundred ſixty-two pounds, ſeventeen ſhilling and three pence, for paying off and diſbanding the forces raiſed ſince the twenty-ninth of September 1677. The act had a clauſe in it, that for the future, "ſoldiers ſhould not "be quartered in any perſon's houſe againſt their "conſent."

A money bill paſſed. Idem.

The lords alſo, at the ſame time, informed the commons, that the earl of Danby reſolved to adhere to the plea of his pardon; and that the commons having demanded judgment againſt him, as conceiving his pardon illegal and null, the tenth inſtant was appointed for hearing the earl of Danby to make good his plea. The lords likewiſe acquainted the commons, that they had reſolved, the five lords in the Tower ſhould be brought to their trial the fourteenth inſtant.

State Trials, Vol. II. Echard. Burnet.

That part of the meſſage concerning the earl of Danby ſo offended the commons, that they reſolved, "That no commoner whatſoever ſhould "preſume to maintain the validity of the pardon "pleaded by the earl of Danby, without the con-"ſent of the houſe firſt had, and that the perſons "ſo doing, ſhould be accounted betrayers of the "liberties of the commons of England." This vote was poſted up in ſeveral places, that no perſon might pretend ignorance of it. The true reaſon of theſe proceedings was, that by the examination of the ſeveral articles of the earl's impeachment, the commons hoped to diſcover the King's ſecret practiſes with the court of France; whereas the King, by his pardon, had put the affair in ſuch a ſtate, that there would have been no occaſion to examine the earl of Danby's anſwers to the articles againſt him exhibited.

A difference betwixt the two houſes on the earl of Danby's affair. Burnet.

This vote of the commons much inflamed the differences that were already began between the two houſes, about the manner of proceeding againſt the five lords in the Tower. For the lords had addreſſed the King to appoint a lord high-ſteward to preſide in the trials; but the commons, thinking it unneceſſary, propoſed, "That a commitee of both "houſes might be nominated to conſider of the "moſt proper ways and methods of proceeding "upon impeachments." And this is what the lords refuſed, which occaſioned a warm conteſt; but at laſt the lords agreed to the commitee's nomination.

Their lordſhips therefore deſired to know, "Whe- "ther there was any ſuch vote as was alleged in "the petition?"

Addreſs of the commons for the raiſing of the militia. May 10. Kennet. Echard.

By the proceedings of the commons it plainly appears that they only ſought occaſion to drive things to extremity. With this view, they preſented an addreſs to the King, taking notice, "that multi- "tudes of jeſuits, Popiſh prieſts, and Popiſh re- "cuſants, reſorted to the cities of London and "Weſtminſter, in contempt of his Majeſty's laws "and Royal proclamations. Wherefore they hum- "bly beſought his Majeſty, that the militia of "London, Weſtminſter, Southwark, the Tower- "Hamlets of Middleſex and Surrey, might im- "mediately be raiſed, and put in a poſture of de- "fenſe." The next day, tho' Sunday, they or-

Immediately after they reſolved nemine contradicente, "That in defenſe of the "King's perſon, and the Proteſtant religion, they "would ſtand by his Majeſty with their lives and "fortunes; and that if his Majeſty ſhould come "by any violent death, they would revenge it to "the utmoſt upon the Papiſts." A difference between the two houſes relating to the biſhops. Burnet. Kennet.

The commitee of both houſes meeting to conſider of the way and method of trying the impeached lords, there was a warm diſpute between the two houſes concerning the biſhops; the commons pretending that the biſhops could not ſit upon the trial of the impeached lords, becauſe it was a caſe of blood. The peers on the other hand maintained, "That the lords ſpiritual have a right to ſtay and "ſit in court, till the court proceed to the vote of "guilty, or not guilty." This affair made a great noiſe, and occaſioned the publication of ſeveral books on both ſides (2).

At length, on the fifteenth of May, the commons read the firſt time their bill, "To diſable the "duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown "of England," now called the 'Excluſion-bill.' After the particulars of the conſpiracy againſt the King, the eſtabliſhed government, and the Proteſtant religion, the bill ſet forth:

Charles II. An' 1679.

The excluſion bill is read.

The ſubſtance of the excluſion bill.

"That the emiſſaries, prieſts and agents for the "Pope, had traiterouſly ſeduced James duke of "York, preſumptive heir to theſe crowns, to the "communion of the church of Rome; and had "induced him to enter into ſeveral negociations "with the Pope, his cardinals, and nuncios, for "promoting the Romiſh church and intereſts; "and by his means and procurement had advanced "the power and greatneſs of the French King, to "the manifeſt hazard of theſe kingdoms, that by "deſcent of theſe crowns upon a Papiſt, and by "foreign alliance and aſſiſtance, they might be "able to ſucceed in their wicked and villanous "deſigns."——Then after another preamble, it run to this effect:

"1. That the ſaid James duke of York, Albany, "and Ulſter, ſhould be incapable of inheriting the "ſaid crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, "with their dependencies; and of injoying any of "the titles, rights, prerogatives, and revenues, be- "longing to the ſaid crowns. 2. That in caſe his "Majeſty ſhould happen to die, or reſign his do- "minions, they ſhould devolve to the perſon next "in ſucceſſion, in the ſame manner as if the ſaid "duke were dead. 3. That all acts of Sovereignty "and Royalty that Prince might then happen to "perform, were not only declared void, but to be "high treaſon, and puniſhable as ſuch. 4. That "if any one, at any time whatſoever, ſhould in- "deavor to bring the ſaid duke into any of the "forementioned dominions, or correſpond with "him, in order to make him inherit, he ſhould be "guilty of high treaſon. 5. That if the duke him- "ſelf ever returned into any of theſe dominions, "conſidering the miſchiefs that muſt inſue, he "ſhould be looked upon as guilty of the ſame of- "fenſe; and all perſons were authoriſed and re- "quired to ſeize upon and impriſon him, and in "caſe of reſiſtance made by him and his adherents, "to ſubdue them by force of arms."

The bill read a ſecond time.

This bill five days after was read a ſecond time, upon which the queſtion being put, whether the bill ſhould be commited, it was carried by a majority of ſeventy-nine (3).

An inquiry into the members of the laſt parliament. Echard, Vol. III. p. 548.

This affair being begun, the commons proceeded to an inquiry after the penſioners in the laſt parliament. Eighteen were diſcovered *, who had received annual penſions from the King, two of one

(1) This bill was ordered to be drawn up by mr. Bennet, mr. Trenchard, ſir Nicholas Carew, ſir Robert Peyton, ſir Thomas Player, mr. Vaughan, ſir Francis Winnington, mr. Boſcawen, mr. Williams, mr. Hampden, colonel Birch, mr. Sacheverell, and mr. Swinſen. Echard, Vol. III. p. 546.

(2) The lords Nottingham and Roberts argued for the biſhops voting. But the lords Eſſex, Shaftſbury and Holles were againſt it. Upon a debate it was carried by the majority that the biſhops had a right to vote. Whereupon the commons declared they would not proceed, unleſs the biſhops were obliged to withdraw during the whole trial. Upon this breach the parliament was prorogued, and ſoon after diſſolved. And the blame was caſt chiefly on the biſhops. It ſeems they deſired to withdraw, but the King would not ſuffer it. He was ſo ſet on maintaining of the pardon, that he would not venture ſuch a point on the votes of the temporal lords. He told the biſhops they muſt ſtick to him and his prerogative, as they would expect that he ſhould ſtick to them if they came to be puſhed at. By this means they were expoſed to the popular fury, and every where cenſured as a ſet of men that, for their own ends, would expoſe the nation and Proteſtant religion to ruin. And in revenge many began to declare openly in favor of the Non-conformiſts, who upon this behaved very indecently, and fell very ſeverely on the body of the clergy. On the other hand, the biſhops and clergy ſet themſelves to write againſt the late times, and to draw a parallel between them and the preſent times; which was not managed decently enough by thoſe who undertook the argument, and who were believed to be ſet on and paid by the court. Particularly ſir Roger l'Eſtrange for four years publiſhed three or four ſheets a week under the title of the Obſervator, all tending to defame the country party, and make the clergy apprehend their ruin was deſigned. Upon this the greateſt part of the clergy delivered themſelves up to much heat and indiſcretion, which was vented both in their pulpits and common converſation. They ſeemed now to lay down all fears of Popery, and nothing was ſo common in their mouths as the year forty one, which, as they hinted, was near being acted over again. Both city and country were full of many indecencies that broke out on this occaſion. Among the worthy and eminent men, whoſe labors did in great meaſure reſcue the church from thoſe reproaches, that the follies of other drew upon her, were Tillotſon, Tenniſon, Sharp, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Calamy, Claget, Cudworth, the two Mores, Williams, &c. thouſand pounds (1); ſix of five hundred pounds (2); two of four hundred pounds (3); four of three hundred pounds (4); four of two hundred pounds (5). Beſide, there were ſix others who had received certain ſums at one time; three more were brought in for ſums upon account; and five for uncertain ſums. Tho' this number appears not very conſiderable, it is however ſo, if it be premiſed, that in the houſe of commons, there are members, who are ſo able, and of ſuch credit, that they diſpoſe of ſeveral votes beſide their own, ſome more, ſome leſs; and that thirty members who receive penſions, may have it in their power, on many occaſions, to turn the reſolutions of the houſe in favor of the court.

The parliament prorogued. Kennet. Echard. Temple's Mem.

In the interim, the King being highly offended with the commons, and hearing morever that they intended to preſent to him a remonſtrance, much like that preſented to the King his father in 1641, and of which the deſign was to inflame the nation againſt him, reſolved to prorogue the parliament. To this end, he went to the houſe of lords the twenty-ſeventh of May, and ſending for the commons, paſſed ſome bills, and particularly one for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, called the "Habeas Corpus Act," and then prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of Auguſt. By this the excluſion bill was for a time defeated.

The barbarous murder of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews. Burnet. Echard.

The news of the proceedings of the Engliſh parliament had ſo raiſed the hopes of the Scotiſh malecontents, that they thought the time was come to be revenged of their perſecutors. Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, was the moſt hated of their enemies. If dr. Burnet, in the Hiſtory of his own Times, is to be credited, Sharp had abundantly merited the hatred of the Preſbyterians. For pretending an extraordinary zeal for their party, he had prevailed to be deputed to London after the reſtoration, to take care of their intereſts, but had baſely betrayed them. This raiſed him to the archbiſhoprick of St. Andrews, and from that time he became their moſt violent perſecutor. Whether Burnet's account of Sharp be exactly true, or aggravated, it is however not to be denied, that the Scots Preſbyterians were extremely incenſed againſt Sharp, and held him as a betrayer. Wherefore, in this juncture, when they expected great alterations, twelve of them reſolved to begin their revenge upon their enemies with the archbiſhop. To this intent, they waited for him about two miles from St. Andrews, where he was going in a coach and ſix, and moſt inhumanly and barbarouſly murdered him, calling him, "Apoſtate; betrayer of the godly; and perſecutor of Chriſt's church." This murder was commited the ſecond of May (6). At the end of the ſame month, eighty Preſbyterians appeared in arms, and in a few days their number increaſed to fifteen hundred. They ſeized Glaſcow, and ſome other towns in the neighborhood, and commited great outrages.

Several were hanged and the others tranſported.

The trial of five jeſuits. Burnet.

Shortly after the prorogation of the parliament, the five jeſuits, Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gawen, and Turner were tried. The thirteenth of June, they were brought to the Old Baily, where their indictment was read, and the witneſſes heard.

Oates's depoſition. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 831.

Oates's evidence was: "1. That the great conſult of the twenty-fourth of April 1678, was "by order of Whitebread the provincial, and "that he, Fenwick, Harcourt, and Turner, did "all in his preſenſe ſign the reſolve for the King's "death.

"That Whitebread, after his return to St. "Omers, did ſay, 'He hoped to ſee the black "fool's head at Whitehall, laid faſt enough; and "if his brother ſhould appear to follow his foot-"ſteps, his paſport ſhould be made too.'

3. That in July, Aſhby a prieſt, brought over "inſtructions from Whitebread, to offer ſir George "Wakeman ten thouſand pounds to poiſon the "King; and alſo a commiſſion to ſir John Gage "to be an officer in the army they deſigned to raiſe, "which the witneſs delivered to ſir John.

As for Gawen, tho' he could not poſi-"tively ſay, he ſaw him at the conſult, yet he ſaw "his hand ſubſcribed to the reſolve: and that in "July 1678, he gave them in London an account "how proſperous their affairs were in Stafford-"ſhire and Shropſhire; that the lord Stafford was "very diligent, and that there was two or three "thouſand pounds, ready there to carry on the de-"ſign; all which he afterwards heard him declare "in father Ireland's chamber."

Dugdale's depoſition. p. 836.

Stephen Dugdale, a new witneſs, depoſed, "1. Burnet ſays, as a party of furious men were riding thro' a moor near St. Andrew's (without any deſign then upon Sharp) they ſaw the archbiſhop's coach appear. He was coming from a council day, and was driving home, having ſent ſome of his ſervants before to let them know he was coming, and others he had ſent off on compliments; ſo that there were no horſemen about the coach. They ſeeing this, concluded, according to their frantic Enthuſiaſtic notions, that God had now delivered up their greateſt enemy into their hands. Seven of them made up to the coach, and one fired a piſtol at him, which burnt his coat and gown, but did not touch his body. Upon this they drew him out of his coach, and murdered him barbarouſly, p. 471.

" ſay, 'fifteen thouſand pounds was a ſmall reward " for the ſetling of religion, and preſerving the " three kingdoms from ruin."

A letter produced. Ibid.

Beſide theſe evidences, there was a letter found among Harcourt's papers, from one Petre a jeſuit, which mentioned a meeting deſigned on the twenty-fourth of April 1678. This letter ſerved to fortify Oates's evidence of the grant conſult. But this was explained by the priſoners to ſignify a triennial meeting about the choice of a procurator to be ſent to Rome, tho' not to the full ſatisfaction of the court, who looked upon it as an evaſion.

The priſoners defenſe. p. 835.

The priſoners made a defenſe both long and various. Beſide their frequent aſſeverations and proteſtations of their innocence (2), and their ignorance of any deſigns againſt the King, they much argued againſt the witneſſes, inſiſting: " That " to the making of a credible witneſs, there muſt " be integrity of life, truth of teſtimony, and " probability of matter; but the witneſſes againſt " them, Oates, Bedloe, Prance, and Dugdale, " were men of deſperate fortunes, and flagitious " perſons, and that falſe ſwearing was their liveli- " hood."

Charles II. An' 1679. State Trials, Vol. II. p. 846, 859.

I cannot forbear remarking here by the way, that if this maxim, " That to make a credible " witneſs, there muſt be integrity of life," was received without reſtriction, it would be almoſt impoſſible to prove ſuch plots as this, becauſe commonly, only villains ingage in them, and they are diſcovered by complices. A remark.

" They alleged particularly the great improba- " bility of truſting Oates with ſecrets of the higheſt " importance, when he was turned away from St. " Omers for his miſdemeanors and immoralities, " which were ſo great, that he was denied the " ſacrament. They charged him with contradic- " tions, with relation to his former evidences." Ibid.

Theſe contradictions conſiſted, in what Oates had ſaid before the council, that he knew no more and yet added many things afterwards. I ſhall not here repeat what I have ſaid elſewhere.

They produced about ſixteen witneſſes to prove, " That Oates had been all April, May, and till " the latter end of June 1678, at St. Omers; " and that they ſaw him every day, and con- " verſed and dined with him, and that he was never " out of the college, except two days and one " night he was at Watton, and two or three he " was in the infirmary, &c. and conſequently he " could not be at the conſult the twenty-fourth " of April." Ibid.

And farther they proved, " That ſir John p. 854, 859, " Warner, and ſir Thomas Preſton, whom Oates 863. " had ſworn to come over with him to the conſult, " were all that time beyond the ſeas, one at Wat- " ton, the other at Liege."

And moreover, to ſhew that Oates was not a man to be credited, they produced eleven witneſſes to prove, " That father Ireland, who was exe- p. 859, 860. " cuted, was not at London, and made it appear " directly contrary to what he had ſworn upon his " trial." They added, " That if the evidence " of their ſide ſhould be rejected, becauſe they " were Roman Catholics, all commerce with ſeveral " countries would be deſtroyed."

The chief juſtice replied, that they had no reaſon to complain of the witneſſes being rejected by the court, ſince, on the contrary, their depoſitions were received without any ſcruple, and that it belonged to the jury to determine upon their evidence as they ſaw cauſe. Ibid.

In anſwer to theſe accuſations, Oates alleged, " That his coming to London to the conſult was p. 864, &c. " very private; yet he produced ſix witneſſes to " teſtify they ſaw him there about that time, but " in a ſort of diſguiſe (3)." But none ſpoke ſo much to the purpoſe as one mr. Smith a ſchool-maſter of Iſlington, who afterwards, in the reign of James II, retracted all he had ſaid.

As to Ireland's being in London, Oates produced one witneſs, who did affirm to have ſeen him there at that time.

Gawen

Charles II. An' 1679.

Gawen offered to undergo the Ordeal, or fiery-trial over red hot plow-ſhares, as a teſt of his innocence. But, beſide that this way of proving an accuſed perſon's innocence had been laid aſide ſix hundred years, and conſequently was not to be allowed by the court, it is certain that when the trial by Ordeal was practiſed, it was never admited but where evidences failed, which could not be ſaid of Gawen.

Harcourt urged in his defenſe, with regard to the letter ſaid to be wrote by him to Evers concerning Godfrey's death, that he muſt have been mad to ſend ſuch a letter by the poſt.

The jeſuits condemned.

The jury returned, after a ſhort conſideration, and brought in all the five priſoners guilty of high-treaſon; but ſentenſe was reſpited till the next day, on which came on the trial of Richard Langhorn a Popiſh counſellor at law of the Temple, and much imployed by the Papiſts. Being brought to the ſame place with the five jeſuits, and before the ſame perſons, with a new jury, Oates appeared and ſwore:

" 1. That the priſoner held correſpondence " with la Chaiſe and others, that the witneſſes " carried ſeveral letters to perſons beyond the ſeas, " in one of which he ſaw, under his own hand, " words to this purpoſe, 'That the parliament " began to flag in promoting the Proteſtant re- " ligion, and now they had a fair opportunity to " begin and give the blow,' with other expreſſions " plain enough concerning the plot.

" 2. That he had orders from the provincial " Whitebread, to give mr. Langhorn an account " of the reſolve of the great conſult, April the " twenty-fourth 1678, and upon acquainting him " with it, Langhorn lifted up his hands and eyes, " and 'prayed to God to give it good ſucceſs.'

" 3. " 4. That being imployed as a ſollicitor for ſeveral " of the fathers of the ſociety, the priſoner pre- " vailed upon the Benedictine monks, to raiſe ſix " thouſand pounds for carrying on the cauſe; and " ſaid in his hearing, 'That he would do his " utmoſt for procuring the money.'

" 5. That he was diſguſted, that ſir George " Wakeman was not contented with ten thouſand " pounds to poiſon the King, and called him, 'a " narrow-ſpirited, and narrow-ſouled phyſician; " who, for ſo public a cauſe, ought to have done " it for nothing.'

6. An inſtrument being produced, ſigned Paulus de Oliva, found in Langhorn's chamber; Oates ſwore, " That the forementioned commiſſions were " ſigned by the ſame hand; but they were all con- " veyed away, and this being only an eccleſiaſtical " buſineſs, and not dangerous, as they thought, was " left behind.".

p. 883.

In the next place Bedloe ſwore, " 1. That go- " ing with Coleman to the priſoner's chamber, the " former gave him his letters to father la Chaiſe, " the Pope's nuncio, and others, open, to read, " and regiſter in a book kept by him for that pur- " poſe; and that ſome of the expreſſions in theſe let- " ters were, 'To let la Chaiſe know they waited " only now for his anſwer, How far he had " proceeded with the French King, for the ſend- " ing money; for they only wanted money, all " other things being in readineſs. That the Ca- " tholics of England were in ſafety; that places " and offices had been diſpoſed to them, and that " all gariſons either were, or ſuddenly would be, " in their hands; and now they had a fair oppor- " tunity, having a King that was ſo eaſy to be- " lieve what was dictated to him by the Catholic " party.'

Charles II. An' 1679.

" 2. That he brought other letters from Har- " court to Langhorn to be regiſtered; of which let- " ters, one was for the rector of the Iriſh college " at Salamanca, which ſpecified, 'That the lord " Bellaſis, and the reſt of the lords concerned " ſhould be in readineſs, for that they had ſent " ſome Iriſh caſhiered ſoldiers, with many lay- " brothers, under the notion of pilgrims from St. " Jago, who were to take ſhiping at the Groyn, " and to land at Milford haven, and there to join " with the lord Powis."

Mr. Langhorn in his defenſe, beſide the ſolemn proteſtations of his innocence, alleged, that Oates " and Bedloe, the witneſſes againſt him, were " parties in the crime, and deſired to know, whether " they had their pardons." Upon underſtanding that Bedloe had three, and Oates had two under the broad-ſeal; he inſiſted, " That they were ſtill approvers " in the eyes of the law, and therefore not to be " heard; and deſired to know, if they expected " any rewards for their diſcoveries." Oates replied upon oath, " That he had been rewarded " by expending ſix or ſeven hundred pounds out " of his own pocket, without knowing if he ſhould " ever ſee it again." Langhorn then alleged, " He had heard Bedloe had received five hundred " pounds;" but he was anſwered, " That that " was for the diſcovery of ſir Edmundbury " Godfrey's murder, and not for the plot." And Bedloe ſwore, " That he was ſo far from having " any benefit for that diſcovery, that he was ſeven " hundred pounds out of pocket." When the priſoner inſiſted upon the improbability of their aſſertions, by reaſon of their great neceſſities and poverty, when they firſt made their diſcoveries, he was told, " That ſuch inquiries were foreign to " the matter in hand." And ſo he proceeded to prove Oates perjured, with reſpect to the conſult the twenty-fourth of April, and to the buſineſs of father Ireland, by the ſame witneſſes that had been uſed by the five jeſuits the day before. Whereupon the chief juſtice told him, that a witneſs could not be rejected as perjured, unleſs he was declared ſo upon a trial, and therefore his allegation could not be of any ſervice to him.

p. 888, &c.

As Oates had formerly ſworn, that he lay at Grove's houſe about the time of the conſult, he brought mrs. Grove to teſtify, that he never was there about that time; which was confirmed by her maid; and both affirmed, that the houſe was taken up, and that there was no room to lodge him. The court thereupon ſaid, that being diſguiſed he might lodge there without being known.

p. 894.

While this trial was pending, the earl of Caſtlemain * came into the hall, and told the judges, " That the mob uſed violence to the witneſſes " who had depoſed in favor of the priſoners, and " that they were in danger of their lives;" upon this the court ordered immediate inquiry to be made after the authors of theſe violences, in order to puniſh them according to their deſert.

In fine, the jury brought in Langhorn guilty, and he received ſentenſe, together with the five jeſuits, who had been tried the day before.

Langhorn is condemned.

On the twentieth of June, the five jeſuits were executed, proteſting their innocence. Whitebread in particular declared, " That he renounced from his " heart all manner of abſolutions, diſpenſations for " ſwearing, &c. which ſome had been pleaſed to " lay to the jeſuits charge, thinking them un- " juſtifiable and unlawful." Langhorn was reprieved prieved for a month (1). He was executed the fourteenth of July, and died, proteſting his innocence of the crimes for which he was condemned. It was aſtoniſhing to many, that ſo able a lawyer, if he was innocent, had made ſo weak a defenſe.

As the death of theſe five jeſuits, and of the three before executed, made a great noiſe; and as to this day they are believed innocent by ſome, and guilty by others, I cannot forbear to make a few reflections upon this topic, to aſſiſt the reader to judge impartially.

A reflection upon theſe trials.

1. The truth will never appear, if men ſuffer themſelves to be ſwayed by religious prejudices. If we believe an accuſed perſon guilty, becauſe he is a Papiſt or Jeſuit, or if for the ſame reaſon we believe him innocent, all examination is vain. The prejudiced perſon always finds reaſon and juſtice in one or other of theſe two opinions, and therefore he muſt, if poſſible, diveſt himſelf of his prejudices.

2. The convicted jeſuits were accuſed of three things; of a deſign to kill the King; to ſubvert the government; to root out the Proteſtant religion. And yet, moſt of the evidences againſt them ran only upon the firſt of theſe three articles, the two others being ſuppoſed. It is nevertheleſs on this ſuppoſition, that the accuſation of deſigning to kill the King is built, becauſe it is pretended, that the aim of the conſpirators was to place the duke of York on the throne, as more proper to advance their deſigns than the King his brother. But this pretenſion is not proved, nor does it appear in the evidences produced againſt them, that this was their aim.

3. But on the other hand, it can hardly be denied, that throughout this whole reign, there was a ſetled deſign to render the King abſolute, and introduce the Popiſh religion. This muſt be the meaning of theſe expreſſions, "To ſubvert the go-"vernment, and deſtroy the Proteſtant religion." This being ſuppoſed, it is not unlikely that the Papiſts and Jeſuits might believe, that their project would be ſooner executed if the King was removed, and the duke of York placed on the throne.

4. It is therefore upon this probability, that the jeſuits have been accuſed of projecting to kill the King. It is ſuppoſed, that being concerned in the general deſign, or plot, they believed the King's death a proper means to haſten the execution, and here the witneſſes were very poſitive.

5. The defenſes of the priſoners chiefly conſiſted, 1. In aſſeverations and proteſtations of their innocence. 2. In the depoſitions of the witneſſes from St. Omers and Staffordſhire, who proved, that Oates was not at London the twenty-fourth of April 1678. 3. On the improbabilities in the evidence given by Oates and Bedloe. Upon theſe three heads I propoſe to make ſome reflections.

1. The proteſtations and aſſeverations of the accuſed during their trial are not to be regarded. But when they are carried to the point of death, they ought to be conſidered. If they are not a poſitive proof, they form at leaſt a preſumption, becauſe Papiſts are not leſs convinced than Proteſtants, that lying is not the way to eſcape the juſt judgments of God, before whom they are ſhortly to appear; and that beſide, theſe proteſtations never prevail for a reverſal of the ſentenſe. I am aware that the jeſuits are accuſed of approving equivocations and mental reſervations. But, without examining how far this charge may be proved, it is certain that father Whitebread, upon the ladder, teſtified an abhorrence of this doctrine, and renounced all pardons and diſpenſations from the Pope, or any other power, for ſwearing or ſpeaking againſt the truth(2). It is not therefore impoſſible, but (without there was paſſion or prejudice in the judges and juries) the jeſuits, tho' innocent, would have been condemned upon falſe evidence. Accordingly this is what many pretend: but there are others who carry the thing farther, and maintain, that the accuſed might have been acquited, if the paſſion and prejudice of the judges and juries had not prevented it. This we ſhall examine in the next article.

Charles II. An' 1679.

2. I have elſewhere ſpoken of the defenſe, founded upon the proof the Alibi, which obliges the judge to render juſtice by chance, ſince there being a direct contrariety between the evidences, the judges cannot be ſatisfied on which ſide the truth lies. Oates depoſed, That he had aſſiſted at the grand conſult in London, April 1678. He produced ſeven witneſſes, who affirmed, that they ſaw him in London at that time. The jeſuits on their ſide produced ſixteen witneſſes, who affirmed, that Oates was at St. Omers at the ſame time. It muſt be therefore, either that Oates and his witneſſes, or thoſe of the jeſuits, were falſe. Now, that which probably determined the jury to bring in the jeſuits guilty was: Firſt, the priſoners objected only a bare denial to the teſtimonies of Prance, Dugdale and Bedloe, which could not but breed a diſadvantageous prejudice againſt them. Secondly, the witneſſes from St. Omers were all ſcholars, or perſons depending upon the jeſuits college; another conſideration capable to prepoſſeſs the jury. Laſtly, the queſtion was to examine a plot contrived by Papiſts, as ſuch, and in favor of their religion, and not as private perſons, incited by other paſſions. In this caſe, it is not very ſtrange, that the evidences given by Papiſts appeared ſuſpicious. For it is certain, at that time, the opinion, ſupported by the votes of two ſeveral parliaments, that there was a real plot to ſubvert the Proteſtant religion, was generally imbraced throughout the whole kingdom.

As to the ſuperiority of ſixteen witneſſes againſt ſeven, this could occaſion no difficulty. For ſeven witneſſes diſperſed in London, who had only accidentally ſeen Oates, were as credible as the ſixteen ſhut up in one houſe at St. Omers (3). And tho' there had been but two from St. Omers, yet, all other circumſtances being equal, they would have been as credible as the ſeven witneſſes of London.

3. I proceed now to the improbabilties in the depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe. Firſt, it is difficult to conceive the neceſſity of reſolving the King's death in an aſſembly of fifty jeſuits. Secondly, it may with reaſon be imagined that an affair of ſuch importance as the aſſaſſination of a King, paſſes thro' the hands of thoſe only who are moſt diſtinguiſhed in the ſociety, either by their poſts or capacity. But it is ſcarcely credible, that fifty ſuch could be found in England or at St. Omers. Thirdly, I know not that any perſon, to this day, has poſitively

(1) In hopes of his making ſome diſcovery. He offered to declare what eſtates and ſtock the jeſuits had in England; but proteſted he could make no other diſcovery. Burnet, p. 466.

(2) Rapin ſeems not to have taken notice of a paſſage in Burnet on this occaſion. One Serjeant, a ſecular prieſt, a zealous Papiſt in his way, ſome months after theſe executions, appeared before the council upon ſecurity given him, and avered, that Gawen the jeſuit, who died proteſting he had never thought it lawful to murder Kings, but had always deteſted it; had at his laſt being in Flanders, ſaid to a very devout perſon, from whom Serjeant had it, that he thought the Queen might lawfully take away the King's life for the injuries he had done her, but much more becauſe he was a Heretic. Upon that Serjeant ran out into many particulars, to ſhow how little credit was due to the proteſtations made by the jeſuits, even at their death, p. 466.

(3) See note above concerning the Dominican Frier.

sitively affirmed that Oates was a jeſuit. And yet he not only appears in the grand conſult of the twenty-fourth of April, but has an office in it of great truſt and importance, viz. to carry the reſolution of killing the King, to the ſeveral companies into which the aſſembly was divided. Fourthly, It is not ſaid, at what time Oates turned Papiſt; but 'tis only ſeen, he was firſt imployed in 1677 to carry letters to Spain. He returned about the end of the ſame year, and was ſhortly after ſent to St. Omers, where he continued but three or four months. Now it is not probable, that this ſhort ſtay at St. Omers could have acquired him the confidence of the heads of the ſociety, to ſuch a degree, as to be ſent to London to aſſiſt in a grand conſult, where the King's murder was to be reſolved. Fifthly, Why was Bedloe admited into ſo great a ſecret; he who was to have no ſhare in the execution? And yet he ſpeaks of it as a matter with which he was perfectly acquainted, not only from letters which he might have opened, but it appears even by his depoſitions, that the heads of the conſpiracy, Ireland, Whitebread, Harcourt, Coleman, Langhorn, uſed no caution with him; from whence it may be infered, that they themſelves imparted to him the ſecret. He is at Harcourt's chamber, when the money is ordering for the four Iriſh men who were to aſſaſſinate the King. He is at the ſame chamber when the Queen's phyſician receives a note of two thouſand pounds ſterling, without any apparent neceſſity of his preſenſe in an affair of that nature. Sixthly, Oates and Bedloe were men of mean birth, who had been imployed only as letter-carriers. They were beſide little diſtinguiſhed for their capacity or talents, and yet they are admited into all the moſt important ſecrets of the plot. Laſtly, It appears in the depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe, that the conſpirators talked together, and writ to one another, concerning the King's murder, as if it had been but a trifle, and without even taking the uſual precautions on ſuch occaſions, of diſguiſing their thoughts in ambiguous expreſſions.

Theſe are improbabilities which give but too much occaſion to ſuſpect the credit of theſe two witneſſes. It will perhaps be ſaid, that a thing is not falſe becauſe it is improbable; and that God ſometimes permits the moſt wary villains to ruin themſelves by a too great confidence in others. This may be, and it may alſo be, that this was not the preſent caſe. At leaſt it may be aſſerted that the jeſuits are not wont to proceed with ſo little caution.

Theſe are the improbabilities that have induced many people, tho' perſuaded of the reality of the plot, as far as it concerned the government and religion, to ſuſpend their judgment with regard to the King's murder. The ſame improbabilities likewiſe have furniſhed others with a pretenſe for denying the whole plot, becauſe they are pleaſed to confine it to that ſingle article, in which they impoſe upon themſelves, or elſe are deſirous to impoſe upon their readers.

The King diſſolves the parliament. Kennet. Echard.

The tenth of July the King, contrary to the advice of his new council, which he ſeemed to have reſolved to follow with an intire deference, diſſolved the parliament, and ſummoned another to meet the ſeventeenth of October. He hoped to find the next more tractable, but was very much miſtaken. The people, who no longer regarded what came from the court, affected to ſend ſuch members as were of the country party, as being the moſt proper to oppoſe the King's deſigns. The earl of Shaftſbury was at the head of this party, and without doubt greatly contributed to inflame the paſſions of the people. But it is perhaps ſaying too much, to charge this lord with all the King's late mortifications. If it could be proved, that the King had never given any occaſion of diſcontent to his people, we ſhould be obliged to recur to ſome extraordinary cauſe of the parliament's ill humor, as the intrigues, cabals, and artifices of ſome powerful and popular perſon. But what need is there to ſeek for an extraordinary cauſe, when one ſo naturally offers in the King's whole conduct, who had hitherto ſhewn, that his intereſts and thoſe of his people were intirely different?

Sir George Wakeman and others tried, State Trials, Vol. II. Burnet.

Sir George Wakeman the Queen's phyſician was brought to his trial the eighteenth of June, together with James Corker, William Marſhal, two Benedictine monks, and William Rumley, a lay brother of that order. Oates and Bedloe were the witneſſes againſt them: but, beſide that their depoſitions were imperfect, and the greateſt part upon hearſay, and could paſs for proofs only on the ſuppoſition of the deſign to poiſon the King, which was not well proved, the jury doubtleſs conſidered, that a perſon of ſir George Wakeman's ſenſe, could never truſt ſuch a ſecret to Bedloe, whom he ſcarce knew. Nay, he ſwore that he never ſaw Bedloe before in his life. However this be, the priſoners were acquited, to the great mortification of the two witneſſes, ſince it was eaſy to ſee, that Oates and Bedloe were evidences capable of ſwearing to things of which they had no perfect knowledge (1).

The King's ſickneſs. Kennet. Echard. Temple. Burnet.

About the end of Auguſt, the King being at Windſor, was ſeized with three violent fits of an intermiting fever, which gave great apprehenſion. The earl of Eſſex and the lord Halliſax, two of the four counſellors who then managed his Majeſty's affairs, fearing, if the King died, to fall into the hands of the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Shaftſbury, adviſed him to ſend for the duke of York, which was done with all poſſible ſpeed and ſecreſy; the duke appearing at Windſor the ſecond of September. The King, being then out of danger, pretended to be greatly ſurpriſed at his arrival. But this diſſimulation was not capable of deceiving the duke of Monmouth and the earl of Shaftſbury. On the other hand, the earl of Eſſex and lord Halliſax, finding they had made Monmouth and Shaftſbury their irreconcileable enemies, joined with the duke of York for their deſtruction. They ſucceeded ſo well, that his Majeſty removed the duke of Monmouth from his poſt of captain-general, and ſent him into Holland, to the great ſurpriſe of the whole court, the duke of Monmouth being in the higheſt favor with the King before the duke of York's arrival (2). Shortly after, Shaftſbury alſo was caſhiered from being preſident of the council (3). Thus the court appeared with a new face, and the duke of York was more powerful than ever. He improved this happy juncture to obtain the King's leave to retire to Scotland, repreſenting to him the danger of his being in the Low Coun-

The King, contrary to the advice of his council, prorogues the parliament. Temple's Mem. Echard.

Every one impatiently expected, where the late alterations at court would end, and it was not long before it appeared. The fifteenth of October, the King ſummoning his council, after a ſhort pauſe, told them, "That upon many conſiderations, "which he could not at preſent acquaint them "with, he found it neceſſary to make a longer pro-"rogation of the parliament than he intended: "that he had conſidered all the conſequences ſo "far as to be abſolutely reſolved, and not to hear "any thing that ſhould be ſaid againſt it: That "he would have the meeting put off, till that time "twelvemonth." The counſellors aſtoniſhed at this reſolution, and more ſo at the manner of propoſing it, were moſt of them ſilent. Some however offering to repreſent to the King the dangerous conſequences of this reſolution, were injoined ſilence. But ſir William Temple, more bold than the reſt, ſtood up, and with great freedom told his Majeſty, "That as to the reſolution he had taken, he would "ſay nothing, becauſe he was reſolved to hear no "reaſoning upon it; therefore he would only pre-"ſume to offer him his humble advice as to the "courſe of his future proceedings; which was, "That his Majeſty in his affairs would pleaſe to "make uſe of ſome council or other, and allow "freedom to their debates and advices; after "hearing which, his Majeſty might yet reſolve "as he pleaſed. That if he did not think the "perſons or number of this preſent council ſuited "with his affairs, it was in his power to diſſolve "them, and conſtitute another of any number he "pleaſed, and to alter them again when he would: "but, to make counſellors that ſhould not coun-"ſel, he doubted whether it was in his Majeſty's "power or not, becauſe it implied a contradiction: "and ſo far as he had obſerved, either of former ages, "or the preſent, he queſtioned, whether it was a "thing ever practiſed in England by his Majeſty's "predeceſſors, or were ſo now by any of the "preſent Princes in Chriſtendom: therefore he "humbly adviſed him to conſtitute ſome ſuch "council, as he would think fit to make uſe of, "in the direction of this great and public affairs."

Changes in the council. Kennet. Echard.

This proceeding cauſed ſeveral counſellors to ſurrender their commiſſions to the King, and others to abſent themſelves from the council (1), not thinking proper to incourage the King's ſecret reſolutions by their preſenſe, and thereby give occaſion to ſuſpect they approved them. The earl of Eſſex reſigned his place of firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. The lord Hallifax, ſir William Temple, and ſome others, retired into the country. Thus the council, which the King had appointed to amuſe the people, was almoſt diſſolved, and the direction of the public affairs remained in the hands of the earl of Sunderland, mr. Laurence Hyde, and mr. Sidney Godolphin (2), or rather the duke of York, whoſe intereſt they had imbraced; and who directed their reſolutions, tho' abſent.

A plot contrived. Dangerfield's Narrat. Burnet, p. 475.

About the latter end of October, in a fortnight after the prorogation of the parliament, a ſham plot was diſcovered, contrived by the Papiſts to bring an odium upon the Preſbyterians, and the heads of the country party. This project had been formed the begining of Auguſt, by the counteſs of Powis; Elizabeth Cellier a midwife; the earl of Caſtlemain, and the five lords in the Tower. The deſign was to make uſe of falſe witneſſes to accuſe Oates of perjury and ſodomy; to aſſaſſinate the earl of Shaftſbury; and to charge the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Eſſex, the duke of Monmouth, the lord Hallifax, and ſeveral conſiderable citizens of London, with being concerned in a conſpiracy againſt the King. One Dangerfield was to be the principal actor in this ſcene (3). He received his inſtructions from the lady Powis, and the lords in the Tower, with a liſt of the perſons whom he was to accuſe (4). Moreover, the lady Powis gave him a model of this plot, which he was to convey into the houſe of ſome pretended conſpirator, and there cauſe it to be diſcovered.

Dangerfield the chief actor in it.

Dangerfield, furniſhed with theſe inſtructions and papers, informed the duke of York of it, after his arrival from Bruſſels. The duke of York made him a preſent of twenty guineas, and introduced him to the King, who, after hearing him, gave him forty more. He then made ſome attempts to aſſaſſinate the earl of Shaftſbury, but was prevented by ſeveral accidents. At length, on pretenſe of ſeeing ſome rooms, which he ſaid he intended to hire, he went to colonel Manſel's lodging (5), and found means to pin ſome dangerous papers behind his bed's head. This done, he informed two of the cuſtom-houſe officers, that there were in thoſe lodgings, prohibited goods to the value of two thouſand pounds. The officers repairing thither the twenty-ſecond of October, ſearched every where in hopes of finding their prey; but as they did not think of ſearching behind the bed, Dangerfield himſelf found the papers. The officers carrying theſe papers to their ſuperiors, had orders to return them to Manſel. Four or five days after, the colonel meeting Dangerfield in the ſtreet, carried him directly to Whitehall, and brought him before the King and council. He was ſtrictly examined, and, after a full hearing, his contrivance being detected, he was ſent to Newgate the twenty-ſeventh of October.

It obtains the name of the Meal-Tub Plot.

Two days after, ſir William Waller, a magiſtrate of London, ſearching Cellier's houſe, found the model of the pretended plot, writ very fair, in a paper book tied with ribbands, and hid in a Meal-tub, which gave it the name of the Meal-Tub-Plot. Dangerfield perceiving himſelf ruined if he perſiſted in a thing which he could not ſupport, applied himſelf to the lord mayor of London, and gave him in writing a large confeſſion upon oath, with a diſcovery of the perſons by whom he was imployed. This confeſſion being tranſmited to the council, ſeveral perſons were apprehended (6), and among the reſt earl of Caſtlemain *. The lady Powis, accuſed by others, beſide Dangerfield, of conſpiring the death of the King, was ſent to the Tower, and ordered to be proſecuted for high-treaſon. The death of Hobbes.

The famous philoſopher Thomas Hobbes died this year, in the ninety-firſt of his age. His writings are, unhappily, but too well known, to need any farther notice (1).

Libels againſt the court. Echard.

In the begining of the year 1680, affairs were in ſuch a ſituation, that the King had need of all his patience and addreſs. There were viſibly two parties in the kingdom, that of the court and that of the country. To the indeavors of the court to gain proſelites, the country party oppoſed ſwarms of libels to irritate the people, by repreſenting the miſchiefs with which England was threatened, if the deſigns of the court and the Papiſts were not prevented (2). For, in theſe libels, there was no ſcruple made of affirming, that the Papiſts were countenanced by the court. The year forty-one ſeemed to be returning, and it was even probable, that the contrary party to the King had no better intentions, than the enemies of Charles I had in 1640. It was a deplorable thing to ſee the kingdom thus divided by the oppoſite intereſts of the King and the ſubject. But when it was known, that the King had reſolved to prorogue the parliament till November, not only anonymous libels were publiſhed, but petitions flowed from all parts, for the ſiting of the parliament the twenty-ſixth of January, according to the laſt prorogation. His Majeſty received theſe petitions with great uneaſineſs, and failed not to return a diſobliging anſwer to thoſe who had the boldneſs to preſent them. Nay, he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations againſt theſe petitions, uſing the ſame reaſons that James I, and Charles I, had alleged on the like occaſions. He ſaid, "He was the head of the government, and "the only judge of what was fit to be done in ſuch "caſes, and that he would do what he thought moſt "for the good of himſelf and his people, deſiring "they would not meddle with a matter, that was "ſo eſſential a part of his prerogative (3)." All this is very true in the ordinary courſe of the government. But when the people imagine the Sovereign is uſing, to the kingdom's deſtruction, a prerogative intended for their welfare, the bare allegation of the Royal prerogative is not capable to ſatisfy them. Whatever color is given to it, the Engliſh would never be convinced, that it ought to turn to their ruin. Accordingly, the proclamations were not able to put a ſtop to the petitions, as on the other hand, the petitions obliged not the King to alter his meaſures.

Addreſſes to the King for the meeting of the parliament. Kennet. Burnet. Echard.

The parliament comes together and is farther prorogued. Echard.

However, his Majeſty reſolved to meet the parliament the twenty-ſixth of January, but it was only to tell both houſes, that the unſetled condition of the nation, rendered a long interval of the parliament abſolutely neceſſary, for compoſing and quieting the minds of the people. That nevertheleſs he would only prorogue them to April, in order to meet them again in that month, if the condition of his allies abroad demanded their aſſiſtance. After this ſhort ſpeech, the chancellor, by the King's command, prorogued the parliament to the fifteenth of April.

The duke of York returns to court. Kennet, p. 367. Echard.

Two days after, the King declared in council, "That he had ſent for his Royal Highneſs, not "having found ſuch an effect from his abſenſe, as "ſhould incline him to keep him longer from him, "when queſtions were ſtarted of ſuch a nature, "as made it reaſonable that he ſhould be preſent "at the next ſeſſion." Upon this invitation the duke of York appeared at court the twenty-fourth of February, where he was received with great pomp and ſatisfaction by the King his brother.

Two parties formed, called the Addreſſers and the Abhorrers. Kennet. Echard. Burnet.

The duke's arrival, and the King's late firmneſs in proroguing the parliament, notwithſtanding the clamors of the male-contents, greatly incouraged the court party, ſo that multitudes of addreſſes were preſented to his Majeſty, teſtifying an abhorrence of the liberty taken by ſome men to require him to hold the parliament (4), and in that from Norfolk he was thanked for recalling the duke of York. Tho' it is certain, the general ſenſe of the people for or againſt the court, is ſeldom to be known by theſe petitions, it is no leſs certain, they are, for the moſt part, the work of a few popular men, who by intrigue and cabal, procure ſubſcriptions to theſe addreſſes, from thoſe with whom they have intereſt, and who often ſign them without examining the contents. Accordingly, theſe addreſſes are not uſually to be regarded, moſt of the ſubſcribers being ready to ſign the contrary, if they think it for their private advantage. They are however urged as evidence of the peoples being of this or that ſentiment, tho' in the main, it is a very dubious proof. On the preſent occaſion, petitions had been preſented to the King for the parliament's ſiting. As ſoon as the parliament was prorogued, and the duke of York at court, many addreſſes were preſented in abhorrence of the former, ſo that two parties were formed, called the Petitioners and Abhorrers; and as the animoſity between the two parties gradually increaſed, they beſtowed upon each other names of reproach, and from hence aroſe the ſo much famed diſtinction of WHIG and TORY. The petitioners looking on their adverſaries as intirely devoted to the court and the Popiſh faction, gave them the name of Tories, a title given to the Iriſh robbers, villains and cut throats, ſince called Rapparees. Thus the name of Tories, ſerves only now to diſtinguiſh one of the two factions which ſtill divide England. The Abhorrers, on their ſide, conſidering the Petitioners, as men intirely in the principles of the parliament of 1640, and as Preſbyterians, gave them the name of Whig, or Sour-Milk, formerly appropriated to the Scotiſh Preſbyterians, and rigid Covenanters. Theſe two denominations are too well remembered at this time (5).

Riſe of Whig and Tory.

(1) To be a little more large upon the character of this philoſopher. He was the ſon of a clergyman, born at Malmſbury in Wiltſhire, and called from this place of his birth Malmſburienſis. He went out bachellor of arts at Magdalen hall in Oxford, and from thence was taken very young into the earl of Devonſhire's family. With the ſon of that nobleman he traveled into France and Italy, and made an acquaintance with Gaſſendus, and ſome of the greateſt men of the age. In his ſixty-third year he ſetled in England for the remainder of his days, and in the healthful air of Chatſworth, in Derbyſhire, held it out to the ninety-firſt year of his age. The King having learned mathematics of him abroad, allowed him a penſion of one hundred pounds a year. His genius was vaſt and extenſive. But notwithſtanding his pretenſes to philoſophy and the mathematics, young Wallis of Oxford convinced the world, that his ſelf ſufficiency was much greater than his real abilities. He likewiſe aimed at a reputation in poetry, tranſlated Homer, and writ ſome other little things which have only ranked him againſt our Ogilby's in this part of learning. He certainly writ Latin with great purity, and his verſion of Thucydides ſhews him a maſter in his own language. It is ſaid that his years improved his fears of death, and that he did not leave the world with the decency and reſignation of a philoſopher.——This year alſo died Matthew Poole, the compiler of the Synopſis Criticorum on the bible.

A report ſpread of the duke of Monmouth's legitimacy. Sandford, p. 640. Kennet, Echard.

The Whigs were governed by the earl of Shaftſbury, who looking on the duke of York not only as his own, but alſo as the mortal enemy of his party, believed there was no medium between periſhing, or ruining that Prince. To accompliſh this end, he made it his buſineſs to extol the duke of Monmouth, and render him the darling of the people, imagining, that when he had gained the people, the ſupplanting of the duke of York would not be impracticable. With this view it was, at leaſt as it is pretended, that the earl of Shaftſbury found means to ſpread a rumor, that the King was lawfully married to mrs. Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother, and that the marriage contract was in a black box, in the cuſtody of ſir Gilbert Gerard. The King and duke of York readily perceived the tendency of this rumor, and therefore omited nothing to undeceive the people. To this purpoſe, the King called an extraordinary council the twenty-ſixth of April, in which he declared, "That the ſaid report was altogether falſe, "and that he thought himſelf obliged in honor and "conſcience to have the matter thoroughly ex-"amined and ſearched into." Gerald appearing before the council, declared upon oath, "That he "never had any ſuch writing, as was reported, "commited to his charge, nor did he ever ſee or "know of ſuch writing." In fine, after many fruitleſs inquiries after the author of this report, the King was forced to content himſelf with publiſhing, the third of June, a declaration, to confirm one made January the ſixth, and another made March the third, which were entered in the council books, and ſigned by ſixteen privy counſellors, wherein he ſaid, "That to avoid any diſpute which might "happen in time to come, concerning the ſucceſ-"ſion to the crown, he did declare in the preſenſe "of Almighty God, that he never gave, nor made "any contract of marriage, nor was married to "mrs. Barlow, alias Walters, the duke of Mon-"mouth's mother, nor to any other woman what-"ſoever, but to his preſent wife Queen Katherine, "then living (1).

The accomplices of the Meal-Tub-Plot acquitted. State Trials, Vol. III.

There were ſeveral proſecutions and trials this ſummer, and the twenty-third of June, the earl of Caſtlemain, a Papiſt, huſband to the ducheſs of Cleveland *, the King's miſtreſs, was brought to his trial and acquited; Cellier the midwife, who had aſſiſted the lady Powis in the ſham plot, was likewiſe acquited. Shortly after, ſhe publiſhed a narrative of her trial, with ſevere reflections on ſome perſons, then in credit, for which ſhe was tried a ſecond time, and ſentenced to ſtand three times in the pillory, and pay a thouſand pounds fine. The grand jury found not the bill againſt the counteſs of Powis. Thus all the perſons concerned in the Meal-Tub-Plot were acquited. The torrent then run in favor of the court party.

Bedloe dies. Echard.

Bedloe, the famous witneſs of the Popiſh plot, died at Briſtol the twentieth of Auguſt. Three or four days before his death, the lord chief juſtice North, then on his circuit, viſiting him, Bedloe, in his preſenſe, ſigned the following depoſition:

His depoſition before the lord chief juſtice North, on his death-bed.

"That the duke of York hath been ſo far in-"gaged in the plot, as he had ſeen by letters in "cardinal Barbarini's ſecretary's ſtudy, that no part "that hath been proved againſt any man already, "that hath ſuffered, but that to the full thoſe let-"ters have made him guilty of it; all but what "tended to the King's death." And at Rome I aſked father Anderton and father Lodge, two jeſuits, "What would the duke do with his brother when "he was King?" And they anſwered me, "they "would find a means for that; they would give "him no trouble about it." Then I told them, "I believed the duke loved his brother ſo well, he "would ſuffer no violence to be done to him." They ſaid, "No: if the duke could be brought to "that, as he had been religiouſly to every thing "elſe, they might do their work; their other buſi-"neſs was ready, and they might do it preſently. "But they knew they could not bring him to that "point; but they would take care for that them-"ſelves: they had not begun with him to leave "him in ſuch ſcruples as that. But they would ſet "him into his throne; and there he ſhould reign "blindfold three or four days; for they had ſetled "ſome they ſhould pitch the action upon, ſhould "clear their party. And then he ſhould fly upon "them with the ſword of revenge."

Charles II. An' 1680.

And this examinant doth farther add, "That "the Queen is not, to this examinant's knowlege, "nor by any thing he could ever find out, any "way concerned in the murder of the King; but "barely, by her letters, conſenting, and promiſing "to contribute what money ſhe could to the intro-"ducing the Catholic religion. Nay, it was a "great while, and it made her weep before ſhe "could be brought to that."

He alſo declared to the lord chief juſtice, ["That "he looked upon himſelf as a dying man, and "found within himſelf, that he could not laſt long, "but muſt ſhortly appear before the Lord of "Hoſts, to give an account of all his actions. "And becauſe many perſons had made it their buſi-"neſs to baffle and deride the plot, he did, for the "ſatisfaction of the world, there declare, upon the "faith of a dying man, as he hoped for ſalvation,] "That whatever he had teſtified concerning the "plot was true: and that he had wronged no man "by his teſtimony, but had teſtified rather under "than over what was truth;——and, that he had "other things to diſcover, which were of great "importance to the King and the country," with other matters of the like nature. In concluſion, his lordſhip was "deſired to repreſent to his Majeſty "his condition, and that his ſickneſs was very "chargeable, and move his Majeſty in his behalf "for ſome ſupply of money for his ſubſiſtence."

Remarks on this depoſition.

This depoſition merits ſome remarks. The firſt, that it comes from a dying man, and who indeed died three days after. If the proteſtations of thoſe who had been condemned, either for the plot, or Godfrey's murder, may form a preſumption in their favor, I do not ſee why this of dying Bedloe ſhould not form the like, unleſs the point in queſtion is taken for granted, viz. that the condemned perſons were innocent, and Bedloe a villain for ſwearing againſt them. Secondly, Bedloe diſtinguiſhes perfectly the ſeveral articles of the plot, in that he accuſes the duke of York of being ingaged in it, but acquits him from deſigning the King's murder. Now the plot, with regard to the government and religion, is ſo evident, and the part the duke of York had in it ſo clear from Coleman's letters, that nothing can better agree with Bedloe's depoſition. Thirdly, it is really improbable, that two jeſuits at Rome, directors of ſo important an affair, ſhould ſpeak ſo openly to Bedloe. But on the contrary, the manner of the King's death three or four years after Bedloe's, gives but too juſt reaſon to ſuſpect, there was foul play, and cauſes this improbability in part to vaniſh. Laſtly, Bedloe declared in his depoſition, "That whatever he had

Charles II. An' 1680.

"teſtified concerning the plot was true," and this laſt teſtimony, far from giving room to ſuſpect it of falſehood, may rather create a belief, that it was not an invention, ſince, being ſo near death, he could have no inducement to acquit the duke of York upon one article, and accuſe him upon others, or even to trouble the chief juſtice with any depoſition at all.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 577.

This depoſition a little perplexes a famous hiſtorian, who, in this part of his hiſtory, undertakes to prove the plot to be a fiction. To free himſelf from this difficulty, he ſcruples not to oppoſe his own authority to Bedloe's depoſition. "We know "not, ſays he, how to ſpeak ſoftly of the dying "words of one hardened by many years villanies; "but muſt expreſly declare, that as to his public "oaths he did not only ſwear to the moſt ſhocking improbabilities, but ſometimes changed, "and other times contradicted his own evidence." After this authority no man, doubtleſs, will regard this laſt depoſition of Bedloe, otherwiſe than as a continuation of the crimes he had been guilty of, in falſly ſwearing there was a plot, when in reality there was none.

Two Preſbyterian ſheriffs elected. Burnet, p. 479. Echard.

The city of London was then in the country intereſt, which gave it great reputation. The choice for ſheriffs on Midſummer day, fell upon two famous Preſbyterians, by a majority of voices, both accounted Fanatics by the oppoſite party (1). Theſe were Slingſby Bethel and Henry Corniſh, who had taken care to qualify themſelves by receiving the ſacrament in the church of England, abjuring the covenant, and doing every thing as appointed by act of parliament. While this election was depending, it was pretended, that Bethel's party had commited ſome violence againſt the other, which obliged the King to order a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, to be iſſued out for the trial of the riot. Mean time, the two ſheriffs, contrary to the King, being choſen, Thomas Papillon, eſq; preſented an addreſs to the lord mayor, in the name of the city, wherein, after diſowning all tumultuous and diſorderly proceedings, and teſtifying an inviolable fidelity to his Majeſty, they deſired his lordſhip, "That he "would, in their names, humbly beſeech his Ma"jeſty, that the parliament might ſpeedily aſſem"ble." Whether the addreſs produced any effect, or the King had already taken his reſolution, a few days after, it was made known by a public proclamation, that the parliament ſhould ſit on the twenty-firſt of October.

The duke of Monmouth returns, and takes no notice of the court. Temple. Echard. Burnet, p. 477.

While the time of the meeting of the parliament was yet remote and uncertain, the court party had ſome advantage; but as it approached, the country party gained the ſuperiority. The duke of Monmouth was returned from Holland without leave (2), and inſtead of going to court, made ſeveral progreſſes in the kingdom to incourage his friends and increaſe their number. This party were reſolved to run all riſks and either ruin themſelves or the duke of York, the next ſeſſion of parliament. To this purpoſe, the earl of Shaftſbury attended by twelve lords and gentlemen of note, went publicly to Weſtminſter-hall, and at the King's-Bench-Bar, by a bill in form, preſented the duke of York as a Popiſh recuſant (3). This matter was but too true, and the whole kingdom was ſenſible of it. But till this time no man had dared to take ſuch a ſtep, which was conſidered as a formal deſign to break all meaſures with the duke. This action ſo ſurpriſed the three principal miniſters, that they concluded the contrary party muſt neceſſarily be beforehand aſſured of the reſolutions of the parliament. Wherefore, to ingratiate the King with the parliament; they adviſed him to ſend the duke of York into Scotland, believing it would not be in his power to ſupport him if he left him in England during the inſuing ſeſſion. The King approving their reaſons, obliged the duke to return to Scotland, after repeated aſſurances, that he would never forſake him. So the duke departed the day before the meeting of the parliament, to the great ſatisfaction of his enemies, who hoped in his abſenſe, the more eaſily to accompliſh his ruin.

The King ſends away the duke of York. Burnet, p. 481. Echard.

At length, the parliament met the twenty-firſt of October, as the King had promiſed in his proclamation. In his ſpeech at the opening, he acquainted both houſes, "That he had made and perfected "an alliance with the crown of Spain, ſuitable to "that which he had before with the States of the "United Provinces, conſiſting of mutual obligations of ſuccor and defenſe. He aſſured them, "that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to "give them the fulleſt ſatisfaction their hearts "could wiſh, for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant "religion, conſiſtent with preſerving the ſucceſſion "of the crown in its due and legal courſe of deſcent. In order to this he recommended to them "to purſue the farther examination of the plot, with "a ſtrict and impartial inquiry; neither thinking "himſelf nor them ſafe till that matter was gone "thro' with, and therefore it would be neceſſary "that the lords in the Tower ſhould be brought to "their ſpeedy trial, that juſtice might be done.—— "He told them, it would be impoſſible without "their ſupport to preſerve Tangier, and therefore "deſired their advice and aſſiſtance.——In con"cluſion, he recommended to them a perfect union "with himſelf, and one another, as the only thing "which could reſtore the kingdom to its ancient "ſtrength and vigor, and raiſe it up again to that "conſideration which England had uſually had."

Kennet, p. 371. Echard.

During this whole reign, the King's religion was ſo great a ſecret, that very few were acquainted with it; and therefore he more boldly proteſted his zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and on all occaſions declared, he would maintain it againſt the attempts of the Papiſts. Theſe proteſtations might then have ſome effect, ſince it is very natural for a King to favor his own religion. But ſince it had been certainly known, that Charles II was a Papiſt, had abjured the Proteſtant religion before his reſtoration, and profeſſed, tho' ſecretly, the Popiſh religion, theſe ſo ſolemn and ſo frequent proteſtations muſt be thought very ſtrange, being intended only to deceive his ſubjects.

The duke of York preſented as a Papiſt.

After the ſpeaker (4) was choſen, and approved by the King, the houſe of commons immediately diſcovered what was to be expected from them, by expelling ſome of their members, for having been Abhorrers. But not content with puniſhing their own members, they ordered an addreſs to be preſented to the King, to remove from all public offices ſir George Jefferies, ſerjeant at law, recorder of London, and chief juſtice of Cheſter, as guilty of the ſame crime, and a betrayer of the rights of the ſubject.

As this was a new parliament, and as the affair of the plot was to be reſumed at the King's own requeſt, the witneſſes who had already depoſed, laid before the houſe their informations, and were joined by Dangerfield, Jenniſon, Dugdale, and one Turberville, a new evidence. Some likewiſe came from Ireland. Upon a report made to the houſe, that dr. Tonge, who had firſt diſcovered the plot to the King, had received no gratuity, he was now recommended to his Majeſty for the firſt good eccleſiaſtical preferment that fell in his gift. But the doctor was diſappointed of the benefit of this recommendation, by leaving the world not long after. The King on this occaſion diſcovered no leſs zeal than the commons, and iſſued out a proclamation, with a promiſe of his pardon to any perſon who ſhould, within two months, give farther information and evidence concerning the horrid and execrable Popiſh plot.

The King's diſſimulation.

But this diſſimulation was not capable of deceiving the commons. The twenty-ſixth of October, five days after the opening of the parliament, the lord Ruſſel moved, "That they might in the "firſt place take into conſideration how to ſuppreſs "Popery, and prevent a Popiſh ſucceſſor." He was ſeconded by ſir Henry Capel, brother to the earl of Eſſex, who, in a long ſpeech, related what had been done to the prejudice of the kingdom during the preſent reign. He aſcribed the whole to Popiſh counſels. He ſpoke of the firſt Dutch war; of the diviſion of the fleet; of the affair of Chatham: of the fire of London; of the diſcharge of the priſoners concerned in that wicked act, without trial; of the violation of the triple league; of the ſeizing the Dutch Smyrna fleet before war was proclaimed; of the ſecond Dutch war; of the permiſſion to the Iriſh Papiſts to wear arms; of the alteration of the government of Scotland, by lodging it in a commiſſioner and a council, beſide an army of twenty thouſand men. He ſaid, the Papiſts were imboldened to act any thing, by the hopes of having the duke of York for King: that they were moreover incouraged by the French embaſſador, who by his frequency at court, ſeemed to be rather one of the family, and of the King's houſhold, than a foreign embaſſador; and by his free recourſe to his Majeſty, rather a prime miniſter of ſtate of this kingdom, than a counſellor to another Prince: that ſince all theſe irregularities and inormities proceeded from the Popiſh party, ſupported by the duke of York, it was high time to think of ſome effectual expedient to prevent Popery and a Popiſh ſucceſſor.

Several other members ſpoke to the ſame effect, ſome more, ſome leſs; and no man offered to vindicate the duke, or ſpeak in his behalf, till the houſe, on the ſecond of November, came to the two following reſolves;

Votes of the commons for the excluſion of the duke of York. Debates, &c. p. 24.

"1. That the duke of York's being a Papiſt, and "the hopes of his coming ſuch to the crown, hath "given the greateſt countenance and incouragement to the preſent deſigns and conſpiracies "againſt the King and the Proteſtant religion.

"2. That in defenſe of the King's perſon and government, and Proteſtant religion, this houſe doth "declare, that they will ſtand by his Majeſty with "their lives and fortunes, and that if his Majeſty "ſhould come to any violent death, which God "forbid, they will revenge it to the utmoſt of their "power on the Papiſts."

Speeches for and againſt it.

Upon theſe two reſolutions, the lord Ruſſel moved for a commitee to bring in a bill to diſable the duke of York from inheriting the crown. This affair was now debated with great warmth in ſeveral eloquent ſpeeches on both ſides the queſtion. The ſubſtance of what was urged for the bill was, that the evils which the kingdom had felt, and ſtill labored under, proceeded from Popiſh counſels, begun and headed by the duke of York. That the danger muſt be extreme, ſhould he ever injoy the crown. That it might be read in ſcripture, "That "one man ought to die for a nation, but not that "three nations ſhould die for one man." The oppoſers of the bill did not offer to ſhew there was no danger in a Popiſh King. This they were willing to ſuppoſe, but pretended that there were other expedients to prevent this danger than that of excluſion. That beſide, it could not be expected that the duke of York, and many others, would ſubmit to this law, the conſequence whereof would be a civil war, in which the duke of York would be ſupported by all the Princes of Europe.

Charles II. An' 1680.

To this objection it was anſwered, that no expedient could be thought of to ſecure the Proteſtant religion under a Popiſh Prince, who would have a Popiſh council, Popiſh judges, Popiſh magiſtrates, and deputy lieutenants, Popiſh commanders at ſea and land, nay, and Popiſh biſhops too. That the excluding the duke from the ſucceſſion, was no depriving him of his right to the crown, of which he had rendered himſelf incapable, by imbracing a religion contrary to that of the nation. For a Popiſh King and Proteſtant ſubjects were irreconcileable.

The others replied, there was no law which, for a difference of opinion in religion, deprived any man of his right.

The excluſion bill read.

In fine, it was reſolved, "That a bill be brought "in to diſable the duke of York from inheriting "the Imperial crown of this realm."

Hitherto the court party had only ſkirmiſhed, as I may ſay, in hopes that an ingagement might be avoided. But when this vote had paſſed, and the bill was read the firſt time, ſir Leoline Jenkins, ſecretary of ſtate, ſtood up and argued directly againſt it, by alleging:

Secretary Jenkins ſupports the intereſts of the duke of York. Debates, &c. p. 51.

"1. That it was contrary to natural juſtice, to "condemn any man before the conviction, or the "hearing of him.

"2. It was contrary to the principles of our religion, to diſpoſſeſs a man of his right, becauſe "he differs in point of faith.

"3. He was of opinion, that the Kings of England had their right from God alone, and that no "power on earth could deprive them of it.

"4. It was againſt the oath of allegiance, taken "in its own ſenſe, without jeſuitical evaſions; "which binding all perſons to the King, his heirs, "and ſucceſſors, the duke, as preſumptive heir, "muſt be underſtood."

His reaſons anſwered.

The advocates for the bill anſwered to the firſt objection; that not only the duke of York's intereſts were concerned, but thoſe of the whole kingdom; and that if the duke of York had withdrawn at the time the parliament was going to meet, his abſenſe ought not to prevent their providing for the good of the nation. To the ſecond objection it was replied, that in eſtabliſhing for principle, that difference of opinion in religion ought to be no cauſe for diſpoſſeſſing any man of his right, all the acts of parliament made ſince the reformation againſt Papiſts and Sectaries were condemned, who, as ſubjects, had rights in common with the reſt, of which nevertheleſs it was thought expedient to deprive them, on account of the dangers to which the kingdom would be expoſed, if they were left in the injoyment of them. That this was a maxim generally received in all ſtates, Proteſtant or Popiſh. That it was very true, the ſubjects of a different religion might be injured by being deprived of their rights; but that this injury proceeded not from the government's having no right to take this precaution,

tion, but from taking it unſeaſonably and groundleſly, thro' prejudice, pride, paſſion, revenge or hatred. To the third objection it was anſwered, That allowing the principle, that the Kings of England had their right from God alone, it ſhould at leaſt have been ſpecified wherein conſiſted this right, and it would never be proved, that the Kings of England were inveſted with power from God, to alter the conſtitution, or introduce a new religion at pleaſure. But, if by this right was underſtood only that of the ſucceſſion, the principle was falſe, as might be proved by many inſtances in the Engliſh ſucceſſion; for all the Kings and Queens ſince Henry VII, mounted the throne by virtue of an act of parliament, which had ſetled the ſucceſſion upon the poſterity of that Prince, and had ſince been confirmed by others. It was replied to the fourth objection, that the oath of allegiance, which bound the ſubject to the King's heirs and ſucceſſors, was to be underſtood, when thoſe heirs and ſucceſſors were on the throne, and not while they were yet ſubjects. But ſuppoſing even the oath to be meant of an ingagement to acknowlege for King the next heir, it certainly became void, if that heir rendered himſelf incapable of ſucceeding by his ill conduct. That the laws which impoſed oaths had always in view a certain conſtitution of government, which they ſuppoſed conſtant and unalterable, becauſe all caſes that might happen could not be foreſeen. But that it could not be denied, there were poſſible caſes in which theſe oaths would become intirely null; as for inſtance, if the preſumptive heir ſhould declare openly againſt the conſtitution of the ſtate, and clearly diſcover, that he intended to alter it when on the throne; and if in that caſe it was pretended, the ſubject was ſtill bound by his oath of allegiance to this ſucceſſor, the plain meaning of the oath would be, that the ſubjects bound themſelves to ſlavery, whenever the Prince ſhould think fit to impoſe it, which was abſurd. In fine, that the parliament was the ſole judge of ſuch caſes.

Several other reaſons alleged for the bill.

But the advocates for the bill, not content with replying to Jenkins's objections, added likewiſe other reaſons to demonſtrate the legality, the expedience, the neceſſity of the excluſion of the duke of York. They proved the firſt point by precedents taken from the hiſtory of England, by which they demonſtrated, that, on ſeveral occaſions, the parliament had really diſpoſed of the crown in a manner different from the uſual cuſtom. Edward III was acknowleged King in his father's life-time, and Henry IV while Richard II was ſtill living. The parliament moreover granted the crown to Henry IV, and ſetled the ſucceſſion in his poſterity, contrary to the known and natural right of the earl of March, who was next heir to Richard II. Then they ſetled the crown upon the duke of York, and his poſterity, after the death of Henry VI, tho' Henry had a legitimate ſon living. After the houſe of York had injoyed the crown for three ſucceſſive reigns, tho' that houſe had a numerous iſſue, the parliament transferred the crown to Henry VII and his poſterity. They gave a power to Henry VIII to name his ſucceſſors, and ſetle the ſucceſſion as he ſhould think proper. Laſtly, on the ſucceſſion of James I to the crown, tho' no act was demanded by him to confirm his right, the parliament however made one, in order to preſerve their own. As to the objection, that theſe Princes were poſſeſſed of the crown when theſe acts were made, it ought be obſerved, that tho' they had the power in their hands, and were in poſſeſſion, they thought fit to demand the parliament's confirmation, as a thing abſolutely neceſſary to juſtify their pretenſions. In fine, it was impoſſible for the parliament, conſidered as conſiſting of King, lords and commons, to act any thing contrary to the laws, ſince their power of repealing old and inacting new laws, could not be diſputed. That the ſupreme and abſolute authority reſides in the parliament compoſed of King, and both houſes: for what is the parliament but a body conſiſting of all the members of the ſtate, to which no power on earth hath a right to preſcribe? To ſay therefore, that the parliament can act unjuſtly againſt the laws, is to ſay, that all the members of the ſame body may act unjuſtly to themſelves, and be reſponſible for this injuſtice, which is an abſurdity not to be defended.

CHARLES II. AN' 1680.

As to the fitneſs and benefit of this bill, it was not neceſſary to uſe many arguments to ſhew, that it was expedient and fit, that the government and religion would be ſecured, and the people delivered from their fears and ſuſpicions. It could not even be denied, that the excluſion of the duke of York would be attended with theſe advantages. But as it could not be ſuppoſed, that the duke of York and his adherents, would ſubmit to this bill, which might occaſion a civil war, wherein the duke might be ſupported by foreign aid; to this objection it was anſwered, that it was better to hazard ſuch a war, than be expoſed to a more certain danger, viz. of ſeeing the laws and religion invaded by a Popiſh Prince.

But it was chiefly to demonſtrate the neceſſity of the excluſion bill, that the advocates for it diſplayed all their wit and eloquence. They maintained, that all precautions to limit the power of a Popiſh Prince, would be fruitleſs, becauſe his promiſes and oaths could not be relied on, from which the Pope, thro' a motive of religion, could abſolve him. That before the reformation, the reign of Henry VII furniſhed very remarkable inſtances, and it did not appear, that Popes, ſince the reformation, had relinquiſhed their principles. That beſide, the duke of York's zeal for his religion, and his principles concerning the government, were well known, ſince the letters of his ſecretary, and his intimate union with France, had clearly ſhewn, he was not only diſpoſed to undertake any thing to ſupport the intereſts of his religion, but had even, for that end, ingaged in meaſures very prejudicial to the ſtate. That it was to Popiſh counſels, and to the duke in particular, that the two Dutch wars, ſo contrary to the intereſts of England, were to be aſcribed. That to him were owing the non-execution of the laws made againſt Popiſh recuſants; the pernicious deſigns of the Cabal; and that Coleman's letters made it as clear as the ſun, that he was the chief author of the frequent adjournments and prorogations of the parliament, at the very time they were imployed in ſeeking out expedients to ſave Europe and the Proteſtant religion from certain deſtruction. Other arguments were alſo alleged to prove, that all the precautions which could be taken, would be to no purpoſe, when the duke ſhould be on the throne. Firſt, it was ſaid, that this union with France would ſupply him with money, without his being obliged to apply to the parliament. That he might thereby maintain what forces he pleaſed, and having an army at his command, would be maſter of the kingdom, and free to perform or not perform the conditions on which he ſhould be raiſed to the throne. That with this army he might influence the elections, and procure ſuch a parliament as would ſubvert all poſſible precautions. That there was too much reaſon to ſuſpect, that the late army had been raiſed with this deſign, ſince, being certain, that it was not intended againſt France, it could only be deſigned againſt the ſubjects. Nay, it was probable, this was the intent of the expedient propoſed, that when the King ſhould happen to die, the parliament then in being, being, or the laſt that was in being, ſhould aſſemble and ſit a competent time, without any new ſummons or elections; ſo that after the expiration of this competent time, the kingdom would fall into the inconveniency juſt mentioned. That if the tranſactions ſince the King's reſtoration were conſidered, it would be found, that nothing had been done with relation to the government, but what tended to ſubvert it, and introduce Popery. That the duke of York's influence in the King's counſels was well known: that tho' he was abſent, his adherents and creatures injoyed the principal places in the court and kingdom, and that from him proceeded all the evils wherewith England was afflicted, and all the dangers the nation had to apprehend. That if after ſo manifeſt a diſcovery of his deſigns; after the laſt teſtimony of Bedloe on his death-bed; after all the evidence of an execrable plot againſt the ſtate and religion, the duke's ſincerity and flattering promiſes were to be truſted, the conſequence would be a too late and fruitleſs repentance. From theſe reaſons, and many others, it was infered, that the excluſion bill was abſolutely neceſſary, and that the people juſtly expected from their repreſentatives this extraordinary precaution, to free them from their fears.

Reaſons alleged againſt the bill.

The court party were extremely imbaraſſed. There were facts alleged againſt the duke which could not be anſwered, and there were others which they durſt not directly deny, for fear of farther diſputes, at a time when the torrent ran ſo high againſt the duke. Nay, very few ventured to appear openly for him. Among theſe were ſir Leoline Jenkins ſecretary of ſtate; mr. Hyde a privy counſellor, and one of the three who then managed the duke's affairs; mr. Seymour, and one more. Sir Leoline Jenkins deſired the houſe to conſider, "That the duke "of York was the King's brother, and ſon of "Charles I, for whoſe memory the people had a "great veneration; that the duke was inriched "with excellent indowments, which he had im-"ployed in the ſervice of the nation, by fighting "their battles, and defending them from the op-"preſſion of their enemies, and was only guilty of "this one crime, which he hoped, upon a mature "deliberation, would not deſerve ſo great a con-"demnation.——He remembered them, that "there were laws already for the puniſhment of the "crimes he was accuſed of, and therefore humbly "conceived, they ought not to chaſtiſe him, by "making a new law before any hearing." Mr.

Hyde added——"I do not know that any of "the King's murderers were condemned without "being heard; and muſt we deal thus with the bro-"ther of our King?——It would conſiſt much "better with the juſtice of the houſe, to impeach "him, and try him, in a formal way, and then "cut off his head, if he deſerve it. I will not "(continued he) diſpute the power of parliaments; "but I queſtion whether this law, if made, would "be good in itſelf.——For ought I know, when "you have made this law, it may have a flaw in "it; if not, I am confident there are a loyal "party, which will never obey, but will think "themſelves bound by their oath of allegiance and "duty, to pay obedience to the duke, if ever he "ſhould come to be King, which muſt occaſion a "civil war."——

p. 98.

In the courſe of the debates on this bill, ſir Francis Winnington alleged, "That an act of "the thirteenth of Elizabeth made it treaſon for "any man to ſay, that the parliament could not "alter the ſucceſſion." To which mr. Finch replied, "I will not ſay that acts of parliament can-"not diſpoſe of the ſucceſſion, becauſe it was made "treaſon by a ſtatute in the thirteenth of Eliza-"beth. But I will deny that the Kings of England "rule by virtue of any ſtatute law, as was ſuggeſted; "for their right is by ſo ancient a preſcription, as "that it may juſtly be ſaid to be from God alone, "and that no power on earth ought to diſpute "it."

Charles II. An' 1680.

Tho' this queſtion was only accidentally raiſed and carried no farther, I think it ought not to paſs unregarded, becauſe it ſerves to diſcover the two opinions among the Engliſh, concerning the ſucceſſion. Some believe, that in extraordinary caſes the parliament has power to diſpoſe of the ſucceſſion, becauſe the parliament is ſuppoſed to include the whole nation, from the King to the meaneſt ſubject, and it is abſurd to diſpute the power of the whole nation united in one body, to preſcribe what is for their well-being. Others aſſert, that the ſucceſſion is unalterable, and admits not of any change, either by the nation in a body, or by the parliament. That if this be done, it is unjuſt, and the parties concerned are not obliged to ſubmit to the parliament's deciſions. That ſuch changes were never made without creating troubles and inteſtine wars in the kingdom; becauſe, as it is not in the power of the King to deprive the nation or the parliament of their rights, ſo neither is it in the power of the parliament to deprive the next heir of the ſucceſſion to which he is intitled by nature and birth. This queſtion has never been unanimouſly decided, but each party maintain their opinion, and determine according to the ſtrength of their reaſons. In all likelikood this diſpute will ſtill be of long continuance.

Different opinions of the power which the parliament has in relation to the ſucceſſion of the crown.

The commons paſs the excluſion bill. Debates, &c. p. 83.

At length, after ſeveral days debates, the excluſion bill paſſed the commons by a great majority. This bill was much the ſame with the other brought in during the laſt parliament, only it had this additional clauſe, "That, during the life of James duke "of York, the act ſhould be given in charge at "every aſſizes and general ſeſſions, and read "openly in every cathedral, pariſh church and "chapel, twice every year immediately after divine "ſervice, that is to ſay, on the twenty-fifth of "December and on Eaſter-day."

A meſſage from the King. Nov. 10. Ibid. p. 69.

While the commons were proceeding on this bill, the King indeavored to interrupt their debates by two meſſages. By the firſt he deſired them to expedite ſuch matters as were depending before them, relating to Popery and the plot; aſſuring them, that all remedies they could tender to him, conducive to theſe ends, ſhould be very acceptable provided they were ſuch as might conſiſt with preſerving the ſucceſſion of the crown in the legal courſe of deſcent.

An addreſs from the commons. Nov. 11. Ibid. p. 79.

On this meſſage an addreſs was preſented to the King by the houſe in which they ſaid, "That tho' "the time of their ſiting had not much exceeded a "fortnight, yet they had in that time not only "made a conſiderable progreſs in ſome things ab-"ſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of his Majeſty's "perſon; the effectual ſuppreſſion of Popery; and "the ſecurity of the religion, lives, and eſtates of his "Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects; but even in rela-"tion to the trials of the five lords impeached in par-"liament, they had ſo far proceeded, as they "ſhould in a ſhort time be ready for the ſame. "But they could not (without being unfaithful to "his Majeſty and their country) omit humbly to "inform his Majeſty, that their difficulties, even as "to thoſe trials, were much increaſed, by the evil "and deſtructive counſels of thoſe perſons who ad-"viſed his Majeſty, firſt to the prorogation, and "then to the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, "at a time when the commons were prepared for "thoſe trials; as likewiſe by the many and long "prorogations of the preſent parliament, before "the ſame was permited to ſit. That a principal "evidence was unfortunately dead, between the "calling and the ſiting of the parliament. That " others had been taken off, or discouraged from " giving their evidence. To prevent the like in- " conveniencies for the future, they made it their " humble request to his Majesty, that he would " not suffer himself to be prevailed upon by the " like counsels, to do any thing which might occa- " sion either the defering a full discovery of the " plot, or the preventing the conspirators from " being brought to speedy and exemplary justice " and punishment."———

The King's message to the house in relation to Tangier. Nov. 17. Debates, &c. p. 106, 115, 117.

His Majesty's other message was concerning Tangier, recommending to the commons the preserving of that place. But the house not being disposed to satisfy the King, instead of offering him money for the relief of Tangier, besieged by the King of Morocco, took occasion from this message to consider some of the court's proceedings in this reign. It was argued, " That they were in- " deed afraid of Tangier, but more afraid of a " Popish successor:———they were unwilling to " give any money, because they remembered, " when eleven hundred thousand pounds was given " for the building of ships, not one ship was " built; and above two millions given to support " the triple league, when it was soon imployed for " the breaking of it; and twelve hundred thou- " sand pounds given for a war with France, when " at the same time we were under private obliga- " tions for peace." These were truths to which the friends of the court had nothing to reply, be- cause they were publicly known. They contented themselves with demonstrating the importance of Tangier to the Levant trade, and representing, that the two millions expended on the Mole would be intirely lost. In fine, as the commons had always in mind the exclusion bill, they took occasion from this message to present to the King a long address, or rather remonstrance, seting forth, in eighteen articles, the dangerous state of the kingdom, with regard to Popery. But this was not so much to inform the King of these dangers, as to represent them to the people, that they might think the ex- clusion bill less strange. The substance of these eighteen articles were as follows:

p. 120.

Nov. 29. Ibid. p. 149.

" 1. That Tangier had been several times under " the command of Popish governors; that the " supplies sent thither, had been in great part made " up of Popish officers and soldiers, and that the " Irish Papists had been most countenanced and in- " couraged.

" 2. That here at home the indeavors and at- " tempts of the Popish party had been so bold " and successful, that it was a matter of admira- " tion to them, and which they could only ascribe " to an over-ruling providence, that his Majesty's " reign was still continued over them, and that " they were yet assembled to consult the means of " their preservation.

" 3. That this bloody and restless party had " found countenance and protection from the laws " made against them: that they had found means " to disgrace their opposers; and if they were " judges, justices of the peace, or other magistrates, " to have them turned out of commission: so that " after some time, they became able to influence " matters of state and government; and thereby to " destroy those that they could not corrupt.

" 4. The continuance and prorogation of par- " liaments, had been accommodated to serve the " purposes of that party.

" 5. Money raised upon the people to supply his " Majesty's extraordinary occasions, had, by the " prevalence of Popish counsels, been imployed to " make war upon a Protestant state, and to advance " and augment the dreadful power of the French " King.

" 6. That great numbers of his Majesty's sub- " jects were sent into, and continued in the service " of that King: and even the ministers of England " were made instruments, to press the States of " Holland to accept of a demand from the French " King, of admiting the public exercise of the Ro- " man Catholic religion.

CHARLES II. AN' 1680.

" 7. That if ever any command were given for " those laws to be put in execution against Papists, " even from thence they gained advantage to their " party, while the edge of those laws was turned " against Protestant Dissenters, and the Papists es- " caped in a manner untouched.

" 8. That the test act had little effect; for the " Papists, either by dispensations obtained from " Rome, submited to those tests, and held their of- " fices themselves; or those put in their places were " so favorable to their interests, that Popery it- " self had rather gained than lost ground since that " act.

" 9. That a Popish secretary, since executed for " his treasons, had maintained a correspondence at " Rome, and in the courts of other foreign Princes, " 'For the subduing (to use their own words) that " pestilent heresy which had so long domineered " over this northern world.'

" 10. That out of these counsels and correspon- " dencies, was hatched that damnable and hellish " plot, by the good providence of God brought to " light about two years since.

" 11. That when this accursed conspiracy was " first discovered, the Papists began to smother " it, with the barbarous murder of a justice of " the peace, within one of his Majesty's own pa- " laces.

" 12. That amidst these distractions and fears, " Popish officers for the command of forces were " allowed upon the musters, upon special orders " counterSigned by a secretary of state: and in like " manner, above fifty new commissions were " granted about the same time to known Papists.

The lords throw out the excluſion bill. Temple. Kennet, p. 377. Echard. Vol. III. p. 594. Burnet.

On the fifteenth of November (1), two days after this mortifying addreſs, the excluſion bill was ſent up to the houſe of lords (2). It paſſed only by two voices upon the firſt reading. But on the ſecond, it was thrown out by a ſuperiority of ſixty-three, againſt thirty. Of fourteen biſhops that day in the houſe, three only gave their votes for, and eleven againſt the bill (3). The King was preſent at the whole debate, which laſted till near midnight.

Nov. 25. Kennet. Burnet, p. 484.

It was to the commons a great mortification, to ſee their favorite bill thus thrown out by the lords. They grew ſo ſullen and out of humor, that they fell upon ſeveral members of their own houſe, expelling ſome, and impeaching and impriſon others, as well as upon perſons not of their houſe (4), for being Abhorrers, or for having adviſed and aſſiſted in drawing up the proclamation againſt petitioning for the ſiting of the parliament. But this ſerved only to diſcover their rage at being diſappointed concerning the excluſion bill (5).

The trial of the lord Stafford. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 101, &c. Burnet. Echard.

On the thirtieth of November, a new ſcene was opened, viz. the trial of William Howard, lord viſcount Stafford, one of the five Popiſh lords in the Tower, who were accuſed of being concerned in the plot. He was tried before the lords in Weſtminſter-hall, the chancellor being appointed by the King, to perform the office of high-ſteward. The managers for the commons began with the plot in general, and laid open the malice, wickedneſs, and horror, of ſo dreadful, bloody, and helliſh a deſign, they ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the expreſs poſitive oaths of the witneſſes, on whom the credit of the plot depended; they expatiated on Coleman's letters and others, clearly proving the deſigns and activity of the writers; they preſſed home the execrable murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, charged on the Papiſts, as well by the oaths of ſelf-aknowleged partners in the fact, as by a letter ſent from London to Tixall, intimating this very murder, the third day after it was commited; they fully diſplayed the ſham plots, and counter-contrivances, whereby the Papiſts would have ſuborned the King's evidence, and turned all the guilt upon his Majeſty's loyal ſubjects; they urged the firing the city, the burning the navy, and calling in French armies, wild Iriſh, Spaniſh pilgrims, &c. they recapitulated the ſeveral trials of Ireland, Whitebread, Langhorn, &c. and alleged the votes of both houſes of parliament, declaring the plot. To corrobate all which, they repeated the cruelties of Queen Mary, the French and Iriſh maſſacres, the powder plot, &c. And they anatomiſed the wicked principles and practiſes of murdering, lying, equivocating, forſwearing, faith-breaking, &c. imputed to the Papiſts, as held by them lawful and meritorious. In fine, they produced witneſſes to prove the plot in general, but chiefly three appeared againſt the accuſed lord, viz. Dugdale, Oates, and Turberville.

Charles II. An' 1680.

1. Dugdale ſwore, " That at a certain meeting " held at Tixall in Staffordſhire, about the end of " Auguſt, or begining of September 1678, the " lord Stafford, with lord Aſton, and others, did " in the preſenſe of the witneſſes, give his full " conſent, 'to take away the King's life, and in- " troduce the Popiſh religion.' And that on the " twentieth, or twenty-firſt of September, in the " forenoon, the lord Stafford ſent for the witneſs " to his chamber, while he was dreſſing; and, " turning his ſervant out, offered him five hundred " pounds for his charges and incouragement, to " take away the King's life; and farther told " him, 'He ſhould have free pardon of all his " ſins, and be ſainted; for the King had been ex- " communicated, and was likewiſe a traitor, and " a rebel, and a enemy to Jeſus Chriſt.'

State Trials, Vol. III. p. 123, 124.

Oates ſwore, " That in the year 1678, both in " Spain and at St. Omers, he ſaw ſeveral letters, " ſigned Stafford, wherein his lordſhip aſſured " the jeſuits of his fidelity and zeal, in promoting " the Catholic cauſe; that in 1678, being in " London, his lordſhip came to the chamber of " father Fenwick, ſince executed; and there in " his preſenſe received a commiſſion from him to " be pay-maſter general to the army: whereupon " his lordſhip ſaid, 'He muſt of neceſſity go down " into the country to take account how affairs ſtood " there; and did not doubt, but at his return, " Grove ſhould do the buſineſs.' And, ſpeaking " of the King, he farther added, 'He hath de- " ceived us a great while, and we can bear no " longer."

p. 126.

Turberville gave an account of " diſobliging his " friends, by leaving his Frier's habit at Doway; " and thereupon went into France, in the year " 1675, where at Paris, geting acquaintance with " his lordſhip, he propoſed to the witneſs, a way, " both to retrieve his reputation with his friends, " and make himſelf happy; and this was by 'tak- " ing away the life of the King of England, who " was a heretic, and a rebel againſt God Almighty.' " That when he took leave of him, his lordſhip " appointed to meet him at London; but he ſoon " after returned into France, not being willing to " undertake the propoſals, and was diſcountenanced " by his friends, and reduced to poverty."

(1) The addreſs is dated November 13, but it was not preſented to the King till November 29.

(2) It was carried up by William lord Ruſſel, attended by the lord Cavendiſh, ſir Henry Capel, and indeed by almoſt the whole houſe of commons. Echard, Vol. III. p. 594.

(3) Burnet ſays all the biſhops voted againſt the bill, p. 482.

(4) They agreed to impeach ſir Edmund Seymour the late ſpeaker; and ſir Robert Peyton was brought upon his knees, and expelled the houſe. They alſo voted to proceed for high crimes and miſdemeanors againſt ſir Francis North, chief juſtice of the common pleas, ſir Thomas Jones, one of the judges of the King's Bench, and ſir Richard Weſton one of the barons of the exchequer; and to impeach the lord chief juſtice Scroggs of high treaſon. Kennet, p. 377.

(5) The gentlemen who ſpoke for the excluſion were, lord Ruſſel, ſir Henry Capel, mr. Harbord, colonel Titus, mr. Thomas Bennet, ſir Francis Winnington, ſir Thomas Player, ſir William Jones, mr. Boſcawen, mr. Trenchard, mr. Montague, colonel Sidney.——Againſt the bill, ſir Lionel Jenkins, mr. Laurence Hyde, mr. Edward Seymour, mr. Daniel Finch, mr. Garraway, ſir Richard Graham. Debates, &c. In the houſe of lords the earls of Eſſex and Shaftſbury argued moſt for it: and the earl of Halifax (who was for limitation) was the champion on the other ſide. For which, when the bill was thrown out, the commons voted an addreſs to the King to remove lord Halifax from his counſels and preſenſe for ever, pretending it was for his adviſing the diſſolution of the laſt parliament. Burnet, p. 482.

The

CHARLES II. AN' 1680.

The accuſed lord, in his defenſe, alleged many things to invalidate the credit of the plot, and particularly, the reputation of theſe three witneſſes.

State Trials, Vol. III. p. 145, 146.

Againſt Dugdale he produced evidence, "That "he was a perſon of an infamous life; that he had "cheated the lord Aſton, his maſter, and defrauded "the workmen and ſervants of their wages; that "by his extravagancies and miſdemeanors, he had "run himſelf into ſeveral hundred pounds debt, "for which he was thrown into jail, and deſpaired "of ever geting out from thence, otherwiſe than "by making the pretended diſcoveries. In the next "place, that he had directly perjured himſelf, in "diverſe parts and circumſtances, as to the time "and place, in this and other depoſitions." And farther, he proved, "That he had indeavored to "ſuborn diverſe perſons to make falſe oaths, and "ſo to ſtrengthen his own by other men's per-"jury."

p. 152, &c.

Againſt Oates he inlarged upon the great improbabilities, "That ſo many great and rich conſpi-"rators, who had truſted him with their greateſt "ſecrets, and whoſe lives were at his mercy, ſhould "ſuffer him to be reduced to ſuch a wretched de-"gree of beggary, as he was acknowleged to be "in when he made his firſt diſcoveries. He like-"wiſe inſiſted upon his omiſſions, additions, and "contradictions, that plainly appeared in his ſe-"veral depoſitions about the plot; and alſo upon "his villainous feigning himſelf to be of another "religion, by ſolemn renunciations of his faith, "and by ſuch ſacraments on one ſide, and ſuch "abjurations and execrations on the other, as ren-"dered him unfit to be admited for an evidence "againſt any man living."

As to Turberville, he urged, "That he was "perjured in this, and many other of his depo-"ſitions; and that his narative had many miſtakes "and blunders in it. He denied that he or any "of his ſervants, ever ſaw him at Paris; and "made ſome remarks upon his poverty and want; "his looſe manner of living; his ſhameful curſing "and ſwearing; and particularly his uſing theſe "words, 'God damn me! There is no trade good "now, but that of a diſcoverer."

This defenſe, as is eaſily ſeen, could not well be more weak, and yet it laſted a ſix days, and the account of this trial makes a ſmall volume in folio, containing in ſubſtance, only what I have ſaid. The accuſations and depoſitions were expreſs, and the priſoner's defenſe conſiſted, 1. In an abſolute denial of the crime for which he was impeached: but this denial could be of no ſervice to him, as it is not what the judges go by. 2. In ſeveral allegations againſt the witneſſes: but bare allegations without proofs, are not wont to juſtify the accuſed. 3. In an improbability alleged againſt Oates, that if he had been ſo well acquainted with the ſecrets of ſo many rich men, they would never have ſuffered him to be reduced to ſuch neceſſity. To this the lords doubtleſs paid the regard, they thought it deſerved: but, methinks, ſuch an improbability cannot be ſaid to make a convincing proof in favor of the priſoner. 4. In a witneſs who depoſed, that Dugdale was a perſon of an infamous life, and guilty of ſeveral cheats: on which I cannot forbear repeating what I ſaid on a like occaſion, that if in a plot againſt the King or the ſtate, only witneſſes of honeſty and reputation were to be allowed, there would be danger of always wanting evidence, becauſe ſuch plots are commonly diſcovered by the complices, and ſeldom any but villains are concerned.

The lord Stafford condemned. p. 187, 211, 212.

Notwithſtanding all this, after the lord Stafford had made a long and pathetic ſpeech, and in the preſenſe of God proteſted his innocence, he was found guilty by fifty-five votes againſt thirty-one. The lord high-ſteward aſking him, "What he "had to ſay for himſelf, why judgment of death "ſhould not paſs upon him, according to law? He "replied, my lord, I have very little to ſay; I con-"feſs, I am ſurprized at it, for I did not expect it. "But God's will be done; I will not murmur at "it. God forgive thoſe that have falſely ſworn "againſt me."

CHARLES II. AN' 1680.

Sentence being paſſed upon him, ſeveral of his relations and acquaintance were urgent with him to make diſcoveries of all he knew, as the only means to ſave his life; to which he anſwered, that he was willing, out of a meer ſenſe of duty, without any temporal view, to diſcover the utmoſt of what he knew. Whereupon, he was brought to the bar of the lords, where he declared things known to all the world, but ſaid nothing of what was expected to be known.

Burnet, p. 493.

He ſaid, "That he thought it no crime for "any man to wiſh his neighbor might be of the "ſame religion, wherein he himſelf hoped to be "ſaved; nay, to ſeek and promote it by ſuch "ways as the laws of God and the nation allow. "That there had been, on ſeveral occaſions, in-"deavors uſed to obtain an abrogation, or at leaſt "a mitigation of ſeverities againſt the Catholics; "but no otherwiſe than by legal and parlia-"mentary means. That he himſelf, at Breda, pro-"pounded a hundred thouſand pounds to the "King, for the taking off the penal laws againſt "them. That a bill had been brought into the "houſe of lords in their favor, but was quaſhed "by chancellor Hyde. That the earl of Briſtol "had made ſome propoſals with no better ſucceſs. "That he had offered ſome propoſals to the duke "of York, the chancellor, and the earl of Shafts-"bury, which laſt ſaid, "He doubted not but "that there would come great advantages to the "King by it." But this pretended confeſſion not being ſatisfactory to the lords, he was ſent back to the Tower.

He makes an illuſory confeſſion. Echard, Vol. III. p. 597.

He was beheaded the twenty-ninth of December, being ſixty-eight years of age; proteſting his innocence to his laſt moment.

Is beheaded.

The fifteenth of December the King came to the houſe of lords, and ſending for the commons, made a ſpeech to both houſes, which properly was but a repetition of that made at the opening of this ſeſſion, concerning his alliances with Spain and Holland, for the repoſe of Chriſtendom; and in relation to Tangier. After which he renewed his promiſe of concurring with them in any expedient for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religon, which might conſiſt with preſerving the ſucceſſion of the crown in its due and legal courſe of deſcent.

Debates, &c. p. 150. Kennet, p. 378. Echard.

The commons returning to their houſe, inſtead of taking the King's ſpeech into conſideration, reſolved themſelves into a grand commitee how to ſecure the nation againſt Popery and arbitrary government. After a warm debate, they reſolved:

Several reſolves of the commons. Debates, &c. p. 154.

"That a bill be brought in immediately, to "baniſh all the conſiderable Papiſts out of the "kingdom." And upon a farther debate on the miſchiefs and dangers of Popery, they reſolved, "That it is the opinion of the commitee, that as "long as the Papiſts have any hopes of the duke "of York's ſucceeding the King, the kingdoms of "England and Ireland, and dominions thereunto "belonging; the King's perſon, the Proteſtant "religion, and the lives, liberties, and properties "of all his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects, are in ap-"parent danger of being deſtroyed." Then upon reference made to an act of Queen Elizabeth, for an aſſociation, they came to a like reſolution, "That a bill be brought in for an aſſociation of "all his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects, for the ſafety "of his Majeſty's perſon; the defenſe of the Pro-

" jeſty's ſubjects, againſt all invaſions and oppo-
" ſitions; and for preventing the duke of York,
" or any other Papiſt from ſucceeding to the " crown."

The commons ſtoped not here. After conſider-ing of ways and means to ſecure the kingdom againſt Popery and arbitrary government, they
p. 185. came to theſe three reſolves: 1. That it is the opinion of this houſe, that a bill be brought in, " For " the more effectual ſecuring of the meetings and " ſitings of frequent parliaments." 2. That it is the opinion of the houſe, that a bill be brought in, that the judges may hold their places and ſalaries,
" Quam diu ſe bene geſſerint." 3. That it is the opinion of this houſe, that a bill be brought in,
" againſt illegal exaction of money from the " people, making it high-treaſon."

After theſe reſolves, each of which diſcovered their their extreme diſtruſt of the court, they thought fit to conſider the King's ſpeech. Many ſevere reflections were made upon the French embaſſador, the French women, the duke, and his creatures, and indirectly, even on the King him-
Dec. 20. ſelf. At length, they reſolved upon an addreſs to Id. p. 196. the King, by way of anſwer to his ſpeech, in which they repreſented:

" That this Proteſtant kingdom can never be " ſafe, while there is any hopes or expectation of " a Popiſh ſucceſſor; and they beſeech his Ma-
" jeſty, in his great wiſdom, to conſider, whether,
" in caſe the Imperial crown of this Proteſtant
" kingdom ſhould deſcend to the duke of York,
" the oppoſition which may poſſibly be made to " his poſſeſſing it, may not only indanger the far" ther deſcent in the Royal line, but even Mo" narchy itſelf? They therefore became humble
" petitioners to his ſacred Majeſty, that in tender
" commiſeration of his poor Proteſtant people, his
" Majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to depart
" from the reſervation in the ſaid ſpeech; and " when a bill ſhall be tendered to his Majeſty in a " parliamentary way, 'To diſable the duke of " York from inheriting the crown,' his Majeſty
" will give his aſſent thereunto; as alſo to another
" act, whereby his Proteſtant ſubjects may be in" abled to 'aſſociate themſelves for the defenſe of " his Majeſty's perſon, the Proteſtant religion,
" and the ſecurity of his kingdom.'——And as " ſome farther means for the preſervation both of " their religion and property, they are humble
" ſuitors to his Majeſty, that from henceforth ſuch
" perſons only may be judges, as are men of " ability, integrity, and known affection to the " Proteſtant religion, and that they may hold both
" their offices and ſalaries, 'Quam diu ſe bene
" geſſerint.' That no one may bear the office of " a lord lieutenant, but who is a perſon of integrity
" and known affection to the Proteſtant religion.
" That deputy lieutenants and juſtices of the peace,
" may be in like manner qualified, and men of ability,
" of eſtates, and intereſt in their country. That none
" may be imployed as military officers, but men
" of known experience, courage, and affection to
" the Proteſtant religion. And theſe their hum" ble requeſts being obtained, they ſhall, on their " part, be ready to aſſiſt his Majeſty for the pre-
" ſervation of Tangier, and for puting his Ma-
" jeſty's fleet into ſuch a condition, as it may pre-" ſerve his Majeſty's ſovereignty of the ſeas, and
" be for the defenſe of the nation." The King gave no anſwer to this addreſs till about a fortnight after.

Charles II. An' 1680.

Intrigues of the Papiſts to ſow diſſentions among the Proteſtants. Burnet, p. 461, 486.

While the King and parliament were united, it was the intereſt of the Papiſts to promote a toleration of the Non-conformiſts, that they themſelves might injoy the benefit under that general denomination. But ſince the King and the parliament were at variance, the perſecution fell on the Papiſts alone, who were accuſed of intending by force to introduce their religion. Wherefore, it was their intereſt to incenſe the church of England againſt the Preſbyterians, and thereby cauſe a diverſion. It cannot be denied, that many of the biſhops and clergy fell into this ſnare, and were pleaſed to ſee the court, which always favored the Papiſts, inclined to perſecute the Preſbyterians. Incouraged by the court, the moſt zealous of the Epiſcopalians failed not to diſcover their hatred of the Preſbyterians; ſo that at the very time, the Papiſts were accuſed by the parliament as the authors of all the miſchiefs of the kingdom, the Preſbyterians were attacked, as if it were intended to caſt on them the blame. By this the clergy of the church of England were cenſured for appearing to favor the deſigns of the Papiſts. Beſide, it is certain, that during the conteſts between the King and the parliament, the clergy in general were attached to the court, and the duke of York's intereſts.
This was ſufficient to revive the complaints of the Preſbyterians againſt the church of England, and to charge her with being Popiſhly affected. Moreover, in the diſpoſition of the court in favor of the Papiſts, ever ſince the begining of this reign, or at leaſt, ſince the earl of Clarendon's diſgrace, it may eaſily be imagined, that care had been taken to introduce, among the clergy, men of a doubtful religion, and from whom the court had nothing to apprehend.

The commons favorable to the Preſbyterians.

On all theſe accounts, the commons thought it highly ſeaſonable, at this juncture, to ſcreen the Preſbyterians from perſecution. They found themſelves moreover concerned, in that, for the reaſon before hinted, there being many Preſbyterians in the houſe, who, to qualify themſelves for their election, had taken the oaths, and received the ſacrament in the church of England, but who nevertheleſs remained ſtanch Preſbyterians: ſo, the twenty-firſt of December, a bill was read the firſt time, " for " uniting the King's Proteſtant ſubjects." While the rigid Epiſcopalians prevailed in the ſecond parliament of this reign, they had carefully avoided diſtinguiſhing the Proteſtant Non-conformiſts from the others, becauſe it was advantageous to them to make them but one body under the ſame appellation. But this parliament which had other views, neglected not to make ſo natural a diſtinction. This bill, which perhaps was too indulgent to Preſby-terians, meeting with ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe, was relinquiſhed for one leſs advantageous, which exempted the Proteſtant Diſſenters from the penalty impoſed on the Papiſts by the act of the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth. This bill paſſed both houſes, but was ſecretly conveyed away, when it was to be offered to the King for his aſſent (1).

The King had no mind openly to deny it: but he had leſs mind to paſs it. So this indiſcreet method was taken, which was an high offenſe in the clerk of the crown. Burnet, p. 495.

Different opinions in the council. Temple's Mem. Part III. p. 353.

His Majeſty found himſelf greatly perplexed what anſwer to return to the commons addreſs. His council was divided. Some adviſed him to return no anſwer, and to uſe this pretenſe, that as he had addreſſed his ſpeech to both houſes, he could not conſider the particular addreſs of one houſe as an anſwer to his ſpeech. Others were of opinion, that the King ſhould return a poſitive anſwer, becauſe they little cared to keep any meaſures with the parliament, but on the contrary (knowing their management of the King's affairs, would never be forgiven by the commons) they were indirectly doing all they could to ingage him to diſſolve the parliament, and call no more for the future. The four principal directors of the King's affairs were of this opinion, viz. Sunderland, Halifax, mr. Hyde, and mr. Godolphin. When it is conſidered, that from the begining of this reign, or at leaſt from the earl of Clarendon's diſgrace, there were not only men of theſe principles always in the council, but that alſo they were generally the chief miniſters, it can ſcarcely be doubted, that the King himſelf was likewiſe of the ſame opinion, tho' there ſhould be no other proof. It is therefore certain, that the fears of the commons were not groundleſs. It muſt be farther obſerved, that tho' the council was divided concerning the manner of anſwering the commons addreſs, they were agreed as to the thing itſelf, not one privy counſellor being of opinion, that the King ſhould not conſent to the excluſion of the duke of York.

The King's anſwer to the commons addreſs. Jan. 4. Debates, &c. p. 239.

Tho' the King at firſt ſeemed to approve of the former of theſe two opinions, he ſuffered himſelf to be influenced by the latter, viz. to return a poſitive anſwer to the commons, which he did to the effect following.

" His Majeſty received the addreſs of this houſe,
" with all the diſpoſition they could wiſh to comply
" with their reaſonable deſires, but upon peruſing
" it, he is ſorry to ſee their thoughts ſo wholly " fixed upon the bill of excluſion, as to determine,
" that all other remedies for the ſuppreſſing of Po-
" pery, will be ineffectual: his Majeſty is con" firmed in his opinion againſt that bill, by the " judgment of the houſe of lords, who rejected it.
" He therefore thinks, there remains nothing more " for him to ſay, in anſwer to the addreſs of this " houſe, but to recommend to them the conſidera-
" tion of all other means for the preſervation of " the Proteſtant religion, in which they have no
" reaſon to doubt of his concurrence, whenever " they ſhall be preſented to him in a parliamentary
" way: and that they would conſider the preſent
" ſtate of the kingdom, as well as the condition of " Chriſtendom, in ſuch a manner as may inable
" him to preſerve Tangier, and ſecure his alli" ances abroad, and the peace and ſetlement at " home (2)".

Jan. 7. Debates, &c. p. 221.

This anſwer was not read in the houſe till three days after, becauſe the commons were imployed in drawing up an impeachment againſt chief-juſtice Scroggs, who was accuſed of indeavoring to ſtifle the belief of the plot; diſcouraging the King's evidences; diſmiſſing the grand-jury, that ſhould have preſented the duke of York, and of unjuſtly proſecuting ſeveral authors and publiſhers of pamphlets. In this interval the lords ſent the following vote to the commons; " That they declared, and were " fully ſatisfied, that there now was, and for di-
" verſe years laſt had been, a horrid and treaſon-
" able plot, continued and carried on by the Iriſh
" Papiſts, for maſſacring the Engliſh, and ſub-
" verting the Proteſtant religion, and the ancient " eſtabliſhed government of that kingdom." The commons readily concurred to this vote, and added, " That the duke of York's being a Papiſt, and " the expectation of his coming to the crown, " had given the greateſt countenance and incou-
" ragement thereto, as well as to the horrid Popiſh
" plot in the kingdom of England."

Charles II. An' 1680.

Approved by the commons.

When the houſe of commons read the King's anſwer, it raiſed great heats and complaints againſt the lords, for throwing out the bill of excluſion, in complaiſance to his Majeſty, or becauſe they were awed by his preſenſe. At length, after great debates, they came to theſe three reſolutions:

Reſolutions of the commons upon the King's anſwer. Debates about the excluſion. p. 265. Kennet. Echard.

" 1. That it is the opinion of this houſe, that " there is no ſecurity nor ſafety for the Proteſtant
" religion, the King's life, or government of this " nation, without paſſing a bill for diſabling James
" duke of York, to inherit the Imperial crown of " this realm, and the dominions and territories
" thereunto belonging: and to rely upon any other " means and remedies, without ſuch a bill, is not " only inſufficient but dangerous.

" 2. That his Majeſty, in his laſt meſſage, hav" ing aſſured this houſe, of his readineſs to concur
" in all other means for the preſervation of the " Proteſtant religion, this houſe doth declare, that " until a bill be likewiſe paſſed for excluding the " duke of York, this houſe cannot give any ſup-
" ply to his Majeſty, without danger to his Ma-
" jeſty's perſon, extreme hazard of the Proteſtant
" religion, and unfaithfulneſs to thoſe by whom
" the houſe is intruſted.

" 3. That all perſons who adviſed his Majeſty
" in his laſt meſſage to this houſe, to inſiſt upon an " opinion againſt the bill for excluding the duke
" of York, have given pernicious counſel to his " Majeſty, and are promoters of Popery, and
" enemies to the King and kingdom."

An addreſs from the commons to the King Debates, &c. p. 267. A vote againſt him. p. 268. Kennet.

In purſuance of this laſt vote, the houſe came to a reſolution of preſenting to the King an addreſs, to remove from his perſon and councils, George earl of Halifax; Laurence Hyde, eſq; * the marquis of Worceſter; † the earl of Clarendon; and ‖ the earl of Feverſham. Moreover they voted, That whoſoever ſhould hereafter lend, or cauſe to be lent, by way of advance, any money upon the branches of the King's revenue ariſing by cuſtom, exciſe, or hearth-money, ſhould be judged a hinderer of the ſiting of parliament.———And that whoſoever ſhould accept or buy any tally, or anticipation, upon any part of the King's revenue, ſhould be in like manner adjudged.

The King is in vain preſſed to forſake the duke of York.

The houſe of commons had carried things to that height that they ſeemed to intend ingaging the King in ſome violent action, which might give an advantage againſt him. Thus had the parliament of 1640 behaved to Charles I. But Charles II had one advantage which his father wanted, viz. That he had not, like him, deprived himſelf of the power to prorogue or diſſolve the parliament, and ſo could put an end to the mortifications which were given him whenever he pleaſed. It is true, in ſuch a caſe he muſt have contented himſelf with his ordinary revenue, which, to a Prince ſo prodigal as he, was not eaſy. It was this which made his enemies hope, he would come at laſt to their terms, and conſent to the bill of excluſion. Indeed, if father Orleans may be credited, the ducheſs of Portſmouth threw herſelf at his feet, and prayed him not to ruin himſelf for the ſake of his brother (1). Fagel, Penſionary of Holland, ſent mr. Sidney, the King's envoy at the Hague, a memorial, repreſenting, that the King could not ſupport the duke of York, without relinquiſhing the intereſts of all Europe.

However this argument made no great impreſſion on the King's mind. On the other hand, theſe difficulties ſerved only to provoke him the more, ſo that he reſolved to prorogue the parliament. The commons having private notice of this, aſſembled more early than uſual, and, before the King came to the houſe of lords, the tenth of January, had time to paſs the following votes:

Kennet, p. 379. Echard, Vol. III. p. 607.

Votes of the commons.

" 1. That whoſoever adviſed his Majeſty to " prorogue the parliament, to any other purpoſe, " than in order to paſſing a bill for the excluſion " of James duke of York, is a betrayer of the " King, the Proteſtant religion, and of the king- " dom of England; a promoter of the French in- " tereſt, and a penſioner of France.

" 2. That it is the opinion of this houſe, That " the acts of parliament made in the reign of " Queen Elizabeth and King James, againſt Po- " piſh Recuſants, ought not to be extended againſt " Proteſtant Diſſenters.

" 3. That it is the opinion of this houſe, That " the proſecution of Proteſtant Diſſenters upon the " penal laws, is at this time grievous to the ſubject, " a weakening the Proteſtant intereſt, an incou- " ragement to Popery, and dangerous to the peace " of the kingdom."

The King prorogues the parliament.

They had ſcarce paſſed theſe votes, when the King came to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, gave the Royal aſſent to two or three acts of little importance (2), and then the chancellor, by his order, prorogued the parliament to the twentieth of January.

Addreſſed by the city of London. Echard, Vol. III. p. 607.

Three days after, the lord mayor and common-council of London, preſented to the King an addreſs, for the ſiting of the parliament on the day appointed, that they might effect the great affairs before them. This addreſs ſerved only to exaſperate the King farther. Wherefore, by a proclamation, the eighteenth of January, he diſſolved the parliament. At the ſame time he ſummoned another to meet at Oxford the twenty-firſt of March, being offended with the city of London.

He diſſolves the parliament, and calls one at Oxford.

The miniſters and privy counſellors in great difficulties. Temple's Mem. Part III. p. 354, 355.

During theſe conteſts, the miniſters and privy-counſellors were not a little imbarraſſed. They ſaw the houſe of commons ſo attached to the bill of excluſion, that nothing elſe could ſatisfy them. On the contrary, they knew by experience, that on other important occaſions, the King had not ſhown that firmneſs which his miniſters could have wiſhed, but had abandoned them, and come into the meaſures of the parliament. This made them fear, the ſame thing might happen on the preſent occaſion, and therefore * the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate, went off the firſt, and, contrary to the King's expreſs order, voted for the excluſion bill in the houſe of lords. The earls of Eſſex and Saliſbury, privy counſellors, did the ſame; and ſir William Temple ſufficiently teſtifies his fear of being expoſed to the houſe of commons. This conduct of ſome of the privy counſellors, gave the country party hopes, that the King would at laſt comply if he was warmly preſſed.

The King perſiſts in ſtanding by his brother. Ibid.

But that party was diſappointed in their expectations. For, tho' the King had diſcovered no great firmneſs in all his difficulties, yet in the affair of his brother he was ever immoveable (3). Immediately after the parliament's diſſolution, he removed the earl of Sunderland from being ſecretary, and gave the place to the earl of Conway. He likewiſe ſtruck out of the council book, the names of the earls of Eſſex, Saliſbury, Sunderland, and ſir William Temple, and in their room put men whoſe principles were more agreeable to his own (4). He likewiſe made ſome alteration among the judges. In ſhort, by the men whom he advanced, he ſufficiently diſcovered his intention to ſupport the duke of York his brother, let what would be the event.

London chuſes the old members. Echard, Vol. III. p. 610.

The contrary party to the court, on the other hand, were not idle. The magiſtracy and common council of London, being of that party, haſtened the elections of members to ſerve in the inſuing parliament, and on the fourth of February re choſe their old repreſentatives (5). The election was no ſooner over, than the new members were preſented with a paper, in the name of the citizens of London then aſſembled in the common hall, containing a " return of their moſt hearty thanks for their faith- " ful and unwearied indeavors in the two laſt par- " liaments, to ſearch into and diſcover the depth " of the Popiſh plot; to preſerve his Majeſty's " Royal perſon, the Proteſtant religion, and the " well eſtabliſhed government of this realm; to " ſecure the meeting and ſiting of frequent parlia- " ments; to aſſert their undoubted rights of peti- " tioning, and to puniſh ſuch as have betrayed thoſe " rights; to promote the long-wiſhed for union of " his Majeſty's Proteſtant ſubjects; to repeal the " thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the corporation act; " and more eſpecially for their aſſiduous indeavors in " promoting the bill of excluſion of James duke " of York." In fine, they concluded, " That " being confidently aſſured, that they [the ſaid " members for the city] will never conſent to the " granting any money ſupply, till they have ef- " fectually ſecured them againſt Popery and ar- " bitrary power, they reſolved, by God's aſſiſtance, " to ſtand by their ſaid members with their lives " and fortunes." The example of London was followed by moſt places in the kingdom, and not only the old members were re-elected (6), but papers of addreſſes, like that of London, were preſented

(1) The true reaſon, according to Burnet, why the ducheſs of Portſmouth openly declared for the houſe of commons, and was ſo hearty for the excluſion, was this: It was propoſed to her, that if ſhe could bring the King to the excluſion, the parliament would next preſs the King to declare the ſucceſſor to the crown; and as ſhe was abſolute miſtreſs of the King's ſpirit, ſhe might reckon the King would be prevailed on to declare her ſon his ſucceſſor. The duke of Monmouth, who had the ſame view, ioined with her to carry on the excluſion; and they thought they were making tools of one another to ſerve their own ends, p. 487.

(3) He at firſt came in to the bill of excluſion, or ſeemed to do ſo. The ducheſs of Portſmouth and others perſuaded him to wave the duke of York's right, and accept of an act of parliament in his own favor, like that made in the reign of Henry VIII. by which he ſhould have a power veſted in him to diſpoſe of the crown at his death, under ſuch reſtrictions and limitations as ſhould be agreed on. Whether ſuch act was really intended is hard to determine; but it is certain ſuch an offer was made to the King, with a promiſe of a conſiderable ſum of money, towards the ſupplying his preſſing wants. It is likewiſe certain, that King Charles ſeemed willing to accept of it, till the French court, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport the duke of York, ſtruck up a bargain with the King, to give him more money for refuſing, than had been offered him for conſenting to the bill of excluſion. to them. So, when the elections were over, the King with grief saw, he was going to meet a parliament like that he had dissolved.

Mean time, the King's precaution to call his new parliament at Oxford, gave great uneasiness to the country party. They were desirous that the parliament should sit at Westminster, by reason, in case of need, they were sure of the Londoners assistance. And who knows, whether some did not propose to use, for passing the bill of exclusion in the house of lords, the same means formerly taken to extort from the peers their consent to the bill of attainder against the earl of Strafford? However this be, they resolved to use their utmost indeavors to have the place altered, and the parliament removed to Westminster. To this end, the earl of Essex, attended by fifteen lords (1), delivered a petition to the King, which he introduced with the following speech:

Kennet, p. 383. Echard, Vol. III. p. 611.

May it please your Majesty,

The earl of Essex's speech to the King.

"THE lords here present, together with diverse other peers of the realm, taking notice, that by your late proclamation, your Majesty had declared an intention of calling a parliament at Oxford; and observing from history and records, how unfortunate many assemblies have been, when called at a place remote from the capital city; as particularly the congress in Henry the second's time at Clarendon; three several parliaments at Oxford in Henry the third's time, and at Coventry in Henry the sixth's time; with diverse others which have proved very fatal to those Kings, and have been followed with great mischief on the whole kingdom: and considering the present posture of affairs, the many jealousies and discontents which are among the people, we have great cause to apprehend, that the consequences of a parliament now at Oxford, may be as fatal to your Majesty and the nation, as those others mentioned have been to the then reigning Kings. And therefore we do conceive, that we cannot answer it to God, to your Majesty, or to the people, if we, being peers of the realm, should not, on so important an occasion, humbly offer our advice to your Majesty; that, if possible, your Majesty may be prevailed with to alter this (as we apprehend) unseasonable resolution. The grounds and reasons of our opinion are contained in this our petition, which we humbly present to your Majesty."

Kennet, p. 383.

The petition contained in substance, an enumeration of the mischiefs attending the many late adjournments, prorogations, and dissolutions of parliaments, at a time when his Majesty's person, and the whole nation were in such imminent danger from the Papists. "And now his Majesty had been "prevailed with to call another parliament at Oxford, where neither lords nor commons could be "in safety, but daily would be exposed to the sword "of the Papists, and their adherents, of whom too "many have crept into his Majesty's guards: the "liberty of speaking, according to their consciences, would be thereby destroyed, and the validity of their acts and proceedings left disputable: "the straitness of the place no ways admited of "such a concourse of persons, as now followed "every parliament; and the witnesses which were "necessary to give evidence upon the commons "impeachment, were unable to bear the charges of "such a journey, and unwilling to trust themselves "under the protection of a parliament, that was "itself evidently under the power of guards and "soldiers. In conclusion, they prayed, that the "parliament might, as usually, sit at Westminster, "where they might consult and act with safety and "freedom."

CHARLES II. AN' 1680.

To this address the King returned no answer, but contented himself with frowning upon the lords who presented it.

During these transactions, the two parties were skirmishing in so hot, or rather so violent a manner, with their pens, that no measures were kept. Libels swarmed with impunity. Some pretend, this was a court artifice, to prevent the union of the Protestants, and that ill language thrown out against the King and the duke of York, was patiently suffered, in order to cast the blame on the Presbyterians, and give the Episcopal party occasion to return the imputation of being too much attached to the court. Thus much is certain, this division, which was carefully fomented, turned to the King's advantage, as will hereafter appear. On this subject I shall relate an affair which then made a great noise.

Echard.

The affair of Fitz-Harris. Kennet, p. 386. Echard, Vol. III. p. 612. R. Coke. Burnet, p. 497.

One Fitz-Harris, an Irish Priest, who had free access to the duchess of Portsmouth, and kept a correspondence with her favorite woman mrs. Wall, and with the confessor of the French embassador, having received several presents, and particularly one of two hundred and fifty guineas, undertook to prevail with one Edmund Everard, to write a libel against the King. Everard feigned to consent, and appointed a meeting to receive informations, by which his pamphlet was to be framed. But at the same time he communicated the affair to sir William Waller, and mr. Smith, and caused them to be concealed in a place where they might hear what passed between Fitz-Harris and him. The next day being both together in a room, Fitz-Harris told Everard, that he should write a libel against the King upon the following heads:

Febr. 21.

1. That the King and Royal family were Papists, and arbitrarily affected from the begining.

2. That Charles I had a hand in the Irish rebellion, and that Charles II did countenance the same, by prefering Fitz-Gerald, Fitz-Patrick, and Mount Garret, who were ingaged in the said rebellion.

3. That the act, forbiding to call the King a Papist, was to stop men's mouths when he should incline to promote Popery; which appeared by his adhering so closely to the duke of York's interest, and retarding him from being proceeded against by the parliament, and hindering the officers put in by the duke, from being turned out; and for that the privy counsellors and justices of the peace, who were for the Protestant interest, were turned out of all places of trust.

4. That it was as much in the power of the people to depose a Popish possessor, as a Popish successor; and seeing there was no hopes that the parliament, when they met at Oxford, could do any good, the people were bound to provide for their own safety.

Everard afterwards received these instructions in writing, and drew up his libel, which was full of sedition, and injurious to the King (2). This pamphlet was to be dispersed by the penny post, to the Protestant lords, and particularly to the leading Presbyerians, whose houses were to be searched in order to find this libel, and which was to serve as a proof of a conspiracy formed by the Presbyterians against the government. This is what Everard affirmed, and that the whole came from the court. At laſt, Waller having informed the King of the affair, his Majeſty ordered ſecretary Jenkins to iſſue out a warrant for apprehending Fitz-Harris, and that Waller ſhould execute it. Yet he was no ſooner gone, but ſir William declared, he was informed by two worthy gentlemen, "That the King "was highly offended with him, ſaying, he had "broken all his meaſures." However, Waller arreſted Fitz-Harris, and ſent him to Newgate (1).

He is ſent to Newgate. Echard, Vol. III. p. 614.

Here, as in the former affair concerning the plot, it is pretended, that Fitz-Harris was gained by promiſes or threats, to depoſe what has been ſaid (2). But before this affair could be fully diſcovered, Fitz-Harris was taken out of Newgate, and ſent to the Tower by the King's expreſs order. I ſhall enter no farther into the particulars of this affair, but content myſelf with briefly ſaying, that ſhortly after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, when the court began to ſail with a proſperous gale, without being controlled by the parliament, Fitz-Harris was brought to his trial; that the ducheſs of Portſmouth owned ſhe had given him money, but merely out of charity; that Fitz-Harris continually inſinuated, that what he did was by the order of his ſuperiors, and that, after his death, his wife conſtantly affirmed that the libel was a court trick. In ſhort, he was condemned and executed, while the public could not conceive for what reaſon an Iriſh Papiſt had publiſhed a libel againſt the King, if it was not an artifice of the court. This affair began in February, and the laſt parliament had taken notice of it, ſo that the commons had ordered an impeachment againſt him, and when he was ſent to the Tower, declared; that for any inferior court to proceed againſt him, or any other perſon lying under an impeachment of parliament, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament. Nevertheleſs, he was tried, condemned and executed, to the great diſappointment of the Whigs, who hoped, by his means, to diſcover the artifices of the court. The King and his party thought it for their advantage to be rid of a man, who might throw them into difficulties. He was not executed till June, after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament.

The King ſends him to the Tower. March 11. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 226.

He is condemned and executed. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 224, 226.

The meeting of this parliament was univerſally expected with the utmoſt impatience, and with the greateſt uneaſineſs by the King, who foreſaw the ſtorm that was gathering. He repaired to Oxford ſeven or eight days before the opening, and as the jealouſies and fears of the Whig party were then at the utmoſt height, it was thought, the King went thus early to Oxford, on purpoſe to take meaſures beforehand, for rendering himſelf maſter of the parliament. Accordingly, the members manifeſtly ſhewed their fears of ſome violence, by going thither attended with armed retinues. Thoſe for the city of London in particular came with a numerous body of well armed horſe, having ribbands in their hats, with theſe words woven in them, "No "Popery! No Slavery!" The parliament meeting the twenty-firſt of March, the King made the following ſpeech to both houſes (3).

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"THE unwarrantable proceedings of the laſt "houſe of commons, were the occaſion of "my parting with the laſt parliament; for I, who "will never uſe arbitrary government myſelf, am "reſolved not to ſuffer it in others. I am unwilling "to mention particulars, becauſe I am deſirous to "forget faults; but whoſoever ſhall calmly conſider what offers I have formerly made, and "what aſſurances I renewed to the laſt parliament; "how I recommended nothing ſo much to them "as the alliances I had made, for the preſervation of the general peace in Chriſtendom, and "the farther examination of the Popiſh plot, and "how I deſired their advice and aſſiſtance concerning the preſervation of Tangier; and ſhall "then reflect upon the ſtrange unſuitable returns made to ſuch propoſitions, by men that "were called together to conſult; perhaps may "wonder more, that I had patience ſo long, than "that at laſt I grew weary of their proceedings. "I have thought it neceſſary to ſay thus much "to you, that I may not have any new occaſion "given me to remember more of the late miſcarriages: it is much my intereſt, and it ſhall be "as much my care as yours, to preſerve the liberty of the ſubject; becauſe the crown can "never be ſafe when that is in danger: and I "would have you likewiſe be convinced, that "neither your liberties nor properties can ſubſiſt "long, when the juſt rights and prerogatives of "the crown are invaded, or the honor of the government brought low, and into diſ-reputation.

"I let you ſee, by my calling this parliament "ſo ſoon, that no irregularities in parliament ſhall "make me out of love with them; and by this "means, offer you another opportunity of providing for our ſecurity here, by giving that countenance and protection to our neighbors and allies, which you cannot but know they expect "from us, and extremely ſtand in need of at this "inſtant; and at the ſame time give one evidence "more, that I have not neglected my part, to give "that general ſatisfaction and ſecurity, which, by "the bleſſing of God, may be attained, if you, "on your parts, bring ſuitable diſpoſitions towards "it: and that the juſt care you ought to have of "religion, be not ſo managed and improved into "unneceſſary fears, as to be made a pretenſe for "changing the foundation of the government. "I hope the example of the ill ſucceſs of former "heats, will diſpoſe you to a better temper; and "not ſo much to inveigh againſt what is paſt, as "to conſider what is beſt to be done in the preſent conjuncture, the farther proſecution of the "plot; the trial of the lords in the Tower; the "providing a more ſpeedy conviction of recuſants; "and, if it be practicable, the ridding ourſelves "quite of that party, that have any conſiderable "authority or intereſt among them, are things, "tho' of the higheſt importance, that hardly need "to be recommended to you, they are ſo obvious "to every man's conſideration, and ſo neceſſary

(2) Corniſh, one of the ſherifs of London, going to ſee him, he deſired he would bring him a juſtice of the peace. Corinſh went and acquainted the King with it. Whereupon the ſecretaries and ſome privy counſellors were ſent to examine Fitz Harris; to whom he gave a long relation of a deſign to kill the King; in which the duke of York was concerned, with many other particulars; but it was all a fiction. The ſecretaries came to examine him farther a ſecond time: he boldly ſtood to all he had ſaid: and deſired that ſome juſtices of the city might be brought to him. So Clayton and Treby came; to whom he made in all points the ſame pretended diſcovery over again. A reſolution to print the votes. Debates about the Excluſion, p. 297. Kennet, p. 386. Echard.

After the commons had ſpent three days in chuſing their ſpeaker, and taking the uſual oaths, a motion was made for printing the votes, and approved, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of ſecretary Jenkins. As the ſecret deſign of the commons was to let the people ſee the neceſſity of the bill of excluſion, they were deſirous to acquaint them with their proceedings in that affair, that they might not be deceived by general accounts of it. For a contrary reaſon, the King was unwilling the people ſhould know all the circumſtances. But his party was not ſtrong enough to prevent it, and from that time the votes of the commons have been printed, to the great profit of the ſpeaker.

Debates, &c. p. 300, 307.

In the ſecond place, a motion was made to inquire into the miſcarriage of the bill for the repeal of the act of the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, how it came to be ſlipt over in the late parliament, and not preſented for the Royal aſſent? " Which, " ſaid the mover, I look upon as a breach of the " conſtitution of the government." But the farther debate of this matter was adjourned to the next day.

Id. p. 301.

Thirdly, a motion was made to bring in a bill to exclude the duke of York from the ſucceſſion. Secretary Jenkins warmly oppoſed it, becauſe as he ſaid, the King had given his vote againſt it. But he was anſwered, that his Majeſty had as ſtrongly declared, that he would never depart from his declaration for liberty of conſcience; and yet upon reaſons given him by the houſe, he was perſuaded to revoke it. Tho' the debates on this ſubject were very warm, the houſe came to that temper, as to agree, that in order to pay the King all the reſpect that might be, they would ſet a-part a time to conſider of expedients, and accordingly they appointed Saturday the twenty-ſixth for the debate of them.

Fourthly, they examined the affair of Fitz-Harris, and his libel, and thought the matter ſo full of knavery and ſubtilty, and of that conſequence to the public, that they reſolved to impeach Fitz-Harris of high treaſon, in order to diſcover the bottom of this myſtery, and lay open the artifices of the court. Secretary Jenkins, the King's man in that houſe, was ordered to carry up the impeachment to the lords. He refuſed at firſt, but being threatened by the houſe, at laſt complied. At the ſame time it was ordered, that ſir William Waller ſhould have the thanks of the houſe for his diſcovery of Fitz-Harris.

The twenty-ſixth of March, the day fixed for examining the expedients which ſhould be propoſed to prevent the excluſion bill, a paper was read in the houſe, the ſubſtance of which is as follows (1).

" 1. That the duke of York be baniſhed, dur- " ing his life, five hundred miles from England, " Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions and " territories to them belonging. 2. That the whole " government both eccleſiaſtical and civil, ſhall, " upon the demiſe of the King, be veſted in a " regent, for ſuch time as the duke of York ſhall " ſurvive. 3. The houſe was ſo little inclined to the expedients for preventing the excluſion bill, that they found in them, however rigorous they were againſt the duke, more difficulties than in the bill itſelf. So, after diverſe fruitleſs debates, permited only for formſake, the houſe reſolved to adhere to the bill of ex-cluſion, which had paſſed the commons in the laſt parliament, and this bill was ordered to be brought in the next Monday.

A difference between the two houſes. Debates, &c. p. 345.

The commons had ſcarce concluded on this great affair, when they were told, the lords had rejected Fitz-Harris's impeachment, and ordered that he ſhould be proſecuted at common law. Several members exclaimed againſt this pretended injuſtice, and its conſequences, and the houſe at length voted;

Votes of the commons. Kennet, p. 389. Echard, Vol. III. p. 622.

"1. That it is the undoubted right of the commons in parliament aſſembled, to impeach before the lords in parliament, any peer or commoner, for treaſon, or any other crime or miſdemeanor. And that the refuſal of the lords to proceed in parliament upon ſuch impeachment, is a denial of juſtice, and a violation of the conſtitution of parliaments.

"2. That in the caſe of Edward Fitz-Harris, who by the commons had been impeached of high-treaſon before the lords, with a declaration, 'That in convenient time, they would bring up the articles againſt him for the lords to reſolve, that the ſaid Fitz-Harris ſhall be proceeded with according to the courſe of common law, and not by way of impeachment at this time, is a denial of juſtice, and a violation of the conſtitution of parliaments, and an obſtruction to the farther diſcovery of the Popiſh plot, and of great danger to his Majeſty's perſon, and the Proteſtant religion.'

"3. That for any inferior court to proceed againſt Edward Fitz-Harris, or any other perſon lying under an impeachment in parliament, for the ſame crimes for which he or they ſtand impeached, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament (1)."

The bill of exclusion read. Debates, &c. p. 351.

March the twenty-eighth, the excluſion bill was brought into the houſe and read. After the reading, ſir Leoline Jenkins alone ſpoke againſt it. He repeated ſome of his former reaſons, as that this bill condemned a man unheard; was directly contrary to the wiſdom and juſtice of the nation, and tended to introduce a new form of government. "If, "continued he, the duke will try to cut this law "with his ſword, if he overcome, he will have the "ſame power to ſet aſide all laws, both for re"ligion and property; the power will be in the "hands of the conquerer, &c." Some railleries paſſed upon him for not being ſeconded, after which the bill was ordered a ſecond reading.

The parliament diſſolved. Burnet. Debates, &c.

The houſe of commons was reſuming the debate about Fitz-Harris, when on a ſudden, the uſher of the black-rod commanded their attendance in the houſe of lords, where they found the King in his robes, who told them. —— "He perceived there "were great heats between the lords and com"mons, and their beginings had been ſuch as he "could expect no good ſucceſs of this parliament, "and therefore thought fit to diſſolve them." Accordingly, the chancellor declared the parliament diſſolved.

Kennet, p. 387. Echard, Vol. III. p. 623.

His Majeſty, who was beforehand prepared for what he had done, immediately took coach, and drove with all ſpeed to Windſor, and the next morning to Whitehall, ſeeming extremely pleaſed that he had thus extricated himſelf from the deſigns of the commons. This parliament, which ſat but ſeven days, was the fifth and laſt of this reign.

Charles II. An' 1681.

The King governs arbitrarily. Burnet.

From this time, the King, during the reſt of his life, governed not only without a parliament, but with an abſolute power. When he found himſelf out of the reach of the parliament, he intirely threw away the maſk of diſſimulation, and ſhewed, that the Popiſh plot, the proſecution whereof he had lately recommended ſo earneſtly to the parliament, appeared to him but a mere chimera, or at leaſt, he did not think it near ſo dangerous as he would have had it believed. The four lords, priſoners in the Tower, whom he would have ſacrificed to the parliament, appeared innocent to him. But what was ſtill more remarkable, even to the end of this reign, was, that the King grew as ſanguinary, as he had hitherto appeared merciful, and that no ſooner had he got the power in his hands, but he made his enemies feel the moſt terrible effects of his vengeance. In ſhort, he clearly diſcovered, by his conduct, that he was intirely in the principles of deſpotic power, and had only diſſembled his ſentiments in his ſpeeches to his parliament, becauſe he judged ſuch diſſimulation proper to conduct himſelf to the end propoſed, from the begining of his reign.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 223.

The reader muſt be amazed to ſee a King, who had received ſo many mortifications from his parliaments; who had been ſo often obliged to comply, and feign opinions he had not, on a ſudden become abſolute maſter of his kingdom, without fleet, without army, without foreign aſſiſtance, without money, but that of his ordinary revenue, after many years fruitleſs labors to accompliſh his deſigns. It is therefore abſolutely neceſſary to unfold the cauſes of ſo ſurprizing a revolution.

The cauſes which put the King in poſſeſſion of abſolute power.

By the artifices of the court, and the natural inclination of many Engliſhmen, the kingdom was divided into Whigs and Tories. This diviſion was ſo carefully fomented by the court, and the Popiſh party, that at laſt it became very extenſive. To render the two parties irreconcileable, it was inſinuated to the Epiſcopalians, of whom the majority were Tories, that both church and monarchy were in danger, and that the ſcene of Forty-one was going to be revived. That the Preſbyterians, under color of providing for the preſervation of liberty, really intended the deſtruction of the church, and the introduction of Preſbyterianiſm, in order to which, they were purſuing the ſame courſe they had taken in 1640, and the following years, by undermining the foundations of the monarchy, for the more eaſy ſubverſion of the church. Theſe inſinuations had the greater effect, as what had once happened, might happen again, the memory whereof was ſtill freſh; and I know not, whether it may not juſtly be doubted, that ſome of the Preſbyterians had ſuch a thing in view. This was ſufficient to awaken the old animoſities between the church of England and Preſbyterianiſm. The Epiſcopalians, terrified with the proſpect of falling into the ſame ſtate from which they had been almoſt miraculouſly delivered, conſidered the introduction of Popery, with which they were alarmed, as a diſtant and uncertain evil, and the eſtabliſhment of Preſbyterianiſm, as certain and preſent. It is even very probable, that many, whoſe paſſions were violent,

(1) The commons, it ſeems, reſolving to take the management of Fitz-Harris's affair out of the hands of the court, carried to the lords bar an impeachment againſt him, which was rejected by the lords, on a pretenſe that the lord Nottingham furniſhed them with. It was this: Edward III, had got ſome commoners to be condemned by the lords, of which when the houſe of commons complained, an order was made, that no ſuch thing ſhould be done for the future. Now that related only to proceedings at the King's ſuit: but it could not be meant, that an impeachment from the commons did not lie againſt a commoner. Judges, ſecretaries of ſtate, and the lord keeper were often commoners: ſo, if this was good law, here was a certain method offered the court to be troubled no more with impeachments, by imploying only commoners. In ſhort, the peers ſaw the deſign of the impeachment, and were reſolved not to receive it. So they made uſe of this color to reject it. Burnet, p. 498.

looked upon Popery as the leſs evil. In this belief, they threw themſelves as it were deſperately into the court party, without conſidering, that the duke of York, whoſe cauſe they eſpouſed, was no better affected to them than to the Preſbyterians. Paſſion made them forget the intereſt of the Proteſtant religion, in order not to be once more under the Preſbyterian yoke. On the contrary, the three laſt parliaments, compoſed, as I obſerved, of men well-affected to Preſbyterianiſm, proceeded with too little circumſpection, and diſcovered too haſtily or too openly their deſigns with regard to religion. By that they gave the court party an opportunity of uniting with the Epiſcopalians, and of joining together the intereſts of religion and the monarchy. From that time, the Tories were ſo well pleaſed with this union, that they would never hear of ſeparating theſe two intereſts, but once, under James II, when there was no poſſibilty of keeping them united, without indangering the conſtitution in church and ſtate. The Whigs, on their ſide, having ſince perceived, what advantages the Tories received from this union, ſeem to have moderated their pretenſions with reſpect to religion, contenting themſelves with procuring the Preſbyterians a bare liberty of conſcience. But the Tories not confiding in this moderation, conſidered it as a ſnare and an artifice to ſeparate the intereſts of religion from thoſe of the ſtate; for in this union the ſtrength of the Tory party wholly conſiſted. I have perhaps wandered a little too far from my ſubject, in ſpeaking of theſe two parties, with regard to what has happened ſince the reign of Charles II. But I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed with this geneal idea. I return now to the tranſactions after the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament.

The Preſbyterians being thus divided, and the court ſtrengthened with the church, the Tory party was compoſed of all the rigid Epiſcopalians, mortal enemies of the Preſbyterians; of all the Papiſts, and thoſe to whom all religions were indifferent, and whoſe expectations were centered in the court. It may be affirmed, that the number of theſe laſt was never greater in England, the King having inceſſantly labored to increaſe it, whether thro' inclination, or becauſe he depended on ſuch as his firmeſt friends. The Whig party conſiſted of all the Preſbyterians, and of ſome churchmen, who were more attached to the intereſts of the ſtate, and the Proteſtant religion in general, than to the church of England in particular. But the city of London was the chief ſtrength of this party, whoſe magiſtrates were intirely devoted to it. Things ſtanding thus, the King believed he ſhould run no great hazard in diſſolving the Oxford parliament, concluding, he had a party in the kingdom ſtrong enough to reſiſt, and even ſubdue his adverſaries, when they ſhould be no longer ſupA declaration of the reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments. ported with the authority of a parliament. Mean time, not to alarm the nation by too haſty a diſcovery of his intention as to his future government, he contented himſelf at preſent with publiſhing a declaration, containing reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments. I ſhall not here inſert this declaration, becauſe every reader, who remembers what has been ſaid, will eaſily comprehend wherein conſiſted the King's complaints. I ſhall only briefly ſay, that the King ſuppoſed, as undeniable, that he had no other aim than to procure the good of his people, and that the commons, actuated by a ſpirit of cabal and ſedition, only ſought to ſhake the foundations of the monarchy, and inveſt themſelves with abſolute power, by all their proceedings, which he largely ſet forth. He poſitively declared, that no irregularities in parliaments ſhould ever make him out of love with them: and therefore he was reſolved to have frequent parliaments, and both in and out of parliament, to uſe his utmoſt indeavors to extirpate Popery (1).

CHARLES II. AN' 1681.

Several pamphlets were publiſhed, as well againſt the diſſolution of the parliament, as againſt the declaration. It was ſaid upon the firſt, that tho' the King pretended, that he diſſolved the parliament on account of the votes paſſed the ſame day about Fitz-Harris, yet the ducheſs of Mazarine publiſhed the news at St. James's many hours before it was done. As to the declaration, it was ſaid to be of no validity, of French extract (2), and to have ſeveral manifeſt galliciſms in it, particularly that expreſſion, "It was a matter ex-"tremely ſenſible to us," a form of ſpeech peculiar to the French, and unknown to any other nation: but his Majeſty took little notice of ſuch libels (3).

Pamphlets. Vindication of the laſt parliament, by ſir W. Jones. p. 393, 394.

The declaration having been publiſhed and read in the churches (4) according to the King's order, addreſſes flowed from all parts, approving the diſſolution of the parliament, and in general the King's whole conduct. Not content with thanking the King, theſe addreſſes were even filled with invectives againſt the late houſes of commons. One of theſe addreſſes (5) being preſented at the King's-Bench, by the grand jury of Middleſex, as a public libel, the court paid no regard to it. It may eaſily be judged who preſented theſe addreſſes, by what has been ſaid. They became ſo much in vogue, that the ſmalleſt corporations feared the reſentment of the court if an addreſs was neglected. The King received them all very graciouſly, and diſtinguiſhed thoſe who brought them with particular marks of his favor. But as ſome of the other party ventured to preſent addreſſes of a very different ſtile, the King either refuſed, or received them, with evident ſigns of diſpleaſure. Some of the aldermen and common council of London preſenting an agreeable addreſs, were received very kindly: but the lord mayor, recorder, and ſome others of the common council, waiting on him at Windſor, with a very different petition, were denied admitance, and ordered to attend the council at Hampton-court, where, from the lord chancellor, they received a reprimand. It was however pretended, that theſe loyal addreſſes, as they were called, expreſſed the ſentiments of the people in general, tho' they came but from one of the parties. But what may make it preſumed,

(1) This declaration, however ſmooth and fair, was by no means popular. Some thought it nothing but a torrent of words. Others had a worſe opinion of it, as a ſtretch of prerogative, and a profeſſed inſult upon the late members of both houſes. Kennet, p. 389.

(2) Tho' the King did not communicate this declaration to the council till April 8, yet mr. Barillon, the French embaſſador, did not only read it to a gentleman the 5th of April, but adviſed with him about it, and demanded his opinion of it. Vindicat. &c. by ſir William Jones, p. 394.

(3) The anſwer to the King's declaration, intitled, "A juſt and modeſt vindication of the proceedings of the two laſt par-"liaments." was writ with great ſpirit and true judgment. It was at firſt pened by Algernoon Sidney: but a new draught was made by John Somers, eſq; and corrected by ſir William Jones. Burnet, p. 500.

(4) When this declaration paſſed in council, the archbiſhop of Canterbury moved, that an order ſhould be added to it, requiring the clergy to publiſh it in all the churches of England. Accordingly, ſuch an order came out, dated April 8. This was looked upon as a moſt pernicious precedent, by which the clergy were made the heralds to publiſh the King's declarations, which in ſome inſtances might come to be not only indecent but miſchievous. Burnet, p. 500.

that the King did not much depend on the people, notwithſtanding theſe numerous addreſſes which weekly filled the Gazettes, is, that he never after dared to call a parliament to the end of his reign, a ſure ſign, that he feared the elections would not prove favorable to him; for if theſe addreſſes had expreſſed the general ſenſe of the people, what could have hindered the King from calling a parliament, which, to judge by theſe addreſſes, muſt have been devoted to him.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 627.

The King was not ſatisfied with diſcouraging thoſe who would have preſented diſagreeable addreſſes to him, but alſo ſilenced and impriſoned the news-writers who were not of his party (1), while others had liberty to publiſh daily invectives againſt the Whigs, and the late parliaments.

Fitz-Harris tried and executed. June 9. July. 1. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 261. Echard, Vol. III. p. 622.

Burnet, p. 497, 504.

Notwithſtanding the vote of the commons in relation to Fitz-Harris, he was indicted of high-treaſon at the King's-bench bar, tried, condemned and executed. It is pretended, that he confeſſed to the chaplain of the Tower, that there was a deſign laid by the Proteſtant party to ſeize the perſon of the King, and impriſon him, till he had conſented to what ſhould be deſired of him, and that he mentioned many particulars. Others inſinuate, this confeſſion was forged (2), or only made to ſave his life. Indeed it is not eaſy to imagine, that ſo many Proteſtants, ingaged, as was pretended, in this plot, would communicate their deſigns to an Iriſh Papiſt. Nor is it leſs difficult to conceive, why his execution was haſtened, ſince he might have ſerved for evidence of this plot, about which, however, there was no farther inquiry.

And Oliver Plunket. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 291. Echard. Burnet.

The ſame day Fitz-Harris was executed, Oliver Plunket, the Popiſh titular primate of Ireland, ſuffered the like puniſhment for contriving, with the court of France, to raiſe an inſurrection in Ireland. Some pretend, he was condemned unjuſtly, and upon falſe evidence (3). I know not what there is in it, but from this time forward no agreement is to be expected among the hiſtorians, in relating the ſame facts. It is always with ſome addition, which plainly diſcovers the party they eſpouſe.

The earl of Shaftſbury ſent to the Tower. July 2. Burnet. Kennet, p. 390. Echard, Vol. III. p. 634. and others.

Thus much is certain; that the King delayed not to be revenged of ſome of thoſe who had appeared againſt him. The earl of Shaftſbury was ſent to the Tower the begining of July. He had now given him the title of The Protestant Earl, in deriſion of his having appeared more zealous than any other lord in ſupport of the Proteſtant party, and from hence it may be eaſily judged, who gave him that name. The ſame day, the King alſo ſent to the Tower ſome perſons of a much inferior rank, as Rouſe, Hayns, White, and one Colledge a joiner of London, who had been very ſtrenuous for the Whigs, while that party was ſupported by the parliament. He was alſo called the Protestant Joiner, for the name of Proteſtant was become the nick-name of thoſe who had moſt oppoſed the King and the Papiſts. The adherents of the court, pretend, on the other hand, that the Whig party in London, perceiving the court began to be revenged on their enemies, had found means, with the aſſiſtance of Corniſh and Bethel, ſherifs of London, and zealous Whigs, to ſecure grand juries intirely at their devotion, ſo that, to defeat the efforts of the oppoſite party, theſe juries were to return Ignoramus upon all bills brought againſt any of the Whigs, and therefore obtained the name of Ignoramus. But we are not to require any proofs of this ſuppoſition. The hiſtorians of the court party content themſelves with affirming, as a matter out of queſtion, that the grand jury of London was reſolved to return Ignoramus upon all bills againſt their friends, and we muſt take their word for it tho' it ſeems to be ſupported only by the rumors of their own party.

Colledge indicted of high-treaſon. Acquited.

However, the court began their ſpleen with Colledge the joiner, and for that end, a bill of indictment of high treaſon was delivered againſt him to the grand jury of London, who, not finding it well grounded, threw it out with an Ignoramus (4). This cauſed an univerſal joy in London, and was looked upon as a ſort of triumph. But the court was reſolved to proceed againſt Colledge with the utmoſt ſeverity. For this purpoſe, on pretenſe of certain words ſaid to be ſpoken by Colledge at Oxford, he was removed to that city, and there tried and condemned. The court fearing to be diſappointed, as they had been at London, the King's council came to Oxford, and were ſhut up with the grand jury, till they had perſuaded them to find the bill. This at leaſt is a fact which has been often objected, and publicly and openly maintained, without having been denied. But not to enter into this; Colledge was carried to Oxford, and tried at the aſſizes, upon the evidence of Dugdale and Turberville, who had been the witneſſes in the trial of the lord Stafford. It is impoſſible to read the particulars of this trial, the partiality of the judges (5), and the depoſitions of the witneſſes, without diſcovering a ſetled deſign for the deſtruction of this man, who was condemned and executed as a traitor (6). He died, proteſting his innocence and ignorance of any plot but the Popiſh. The court's reſentment againſt this man ſhewed itſelf ſo evidently, that he was conſidered as the firſt martyr for the Proteſtant cauſe. The writers, even the moſt devoted to the court, do not poſitively affirm, he was guilty. They content themſelves with leaving the thing doubtful, after indeavoring however, by the turn they give to their account, to inſinuate a belief that he was not innocent.

New ſherifs and a lord mayor. Kennet, p. 391. Echard.

The time for electing the ſherifs of London being at hand, Thomas Pilkington and Samuel Shute, both Whigs, were choſen in the room of Bethel and Corniſh, which was very diſagreeable to the court: but on Michaelmas-day they had the ſatisfaction to ſee ſir John Moor, an addreſſer, choſen lord mayor.

At the ſeſſions for London, Rouſe, one of thoſe ſent to the Tower by the King, was indicted of high treaſon, and the grand jury found the bill Ignoramus.

The lord Shaftſbury's bill not found. Nov. 24. State-Trials, Vol. III. Echard. Kennet.

It was the ſame with the earl of Shaftſbury. The King paſſionately wiſhed to be revenged of this lord, who for ſome time had ſhewn him no reſpect. To this end, he granted a ſpecial commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer to all the judges of the kingdom to ſit, the twenty-fourth of November, with the lord mayor and aldermen, at the Old Bailey, on the earl's trial. Eight witneſſes were produced againſt him, who depoſed upon oath many things from his own mouth, which diſcovered pernicious deſigns againſt the King's perſon. But the greateſt crime objected againſt him was, the copy of an aſſociation (found in his ſtudy) againſt the enemies of the King, of the Proteſtant religion, and of their country (1). But notwithſtanding the hopes conceived by the court, of being freed from this enemy, the grand jury, conſiſting of twenty-one of the principal citizens of London, conſidering that the paper, containing the aſſociation was only a copy, and not writ by the earl of Shaftſbury's hand, and obſerving very great improbabilities in the depoſitions of the witneſſes, found no ſufficient ground for the bill, and returned it Ignoramus. Immediately the whole city teſtified their joy for the earl's deliverance, by bonfires in all the ſtreets, and other marks of ſatisfaction, and the witneſſes againſt him were in great danger of being torn in pieces by the rabble (2).

Affairs of Scotland. Kennet, p. 391. Burnet, p. 510. Echard, Vol. III. p. 645. Acts in favor of the King and royalty. Life of James II.

Before we conclude this year, it will be neceſſary to mention the tranſactions in Scotland, where the duke of York, as the King's high-commiſſioner, had opened the parliament the twenty-eighth of July. This parliament, very different from the two laſt held in England, took a quite contrary courſe, and paſſed ſeveral acts ſuch as the King required.

They acknowleged by the firſt, that the crown of Scotland is by inherent right; by the nature of monarchy; by the fundamental and unalterable laws of the kingdom, tranſmited and devolved by lineal ſucceſſion, according to proximity of blood; and that no difference in religion, no law, no act of parliament, can alter or divert the right of ſucceſſion, and lineal deſcent of the crown to the neareſt and lawful heirs. This act made it high treaſon, either by word or writing, to indeavor to ſuſpend, or alter, the right of ſucceſſion.

Charles II. An' 1681.

By the ſecond act, "all former laws for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion preſently profeſſed "in that realm, were ratified;" by which all the laws made by James I, Charles I, and Charles II, againſt Popery, were confirmed. To this act was annexed a teſt and oath to be taken by all officers in church and ſtate (3). This oath was drawn after ſuch a manner, that it impoſed a neceſſity of ſwearing directly againſt conſcience, or of being, as I may ſay, debared the ſociety of men. Accordingly, it was refuſed by moſt of the miniſters, and a great number of the laity. But this was what the contrivers of the oath wanted, in order to have opportunity to perſecute and deſtroy thoſe, who, it was foreſeen, would obſtruct the deſigns of the court. Scotland was almoſt reduced to ſlavery, with regard to its government. There was nothing wanted, but an introduction of the Popiſh religion, and for this the oath was intended, becauſe it was thereby hoped to have an opportunity of diſabling the greateſt enemies of Popery from oppoſing this deſign.

Archibald Campbel earl of Argyle, ſon of him beheaded at Edinburg, was one of the refuſers of this oath, unleſs he might take it with a reſerve of his own explanation (4). But this the duke of York abſolutely denied him. Indeed theſe ambiguities had been purpoſely inſerted to keep the rigid Preſbyterians from taking it. At length, he was arreſted, impriſoned, and brought to a ſolemn trial, not only for refuſing the oath, but for having diſſuaded others from taking it; and for this new kind of treaſon, was condemned to loſe his head. It is pretended, the King would have pardoned him; but this can only be ſaid by conjecture. However, he found means to eſcape out of the caſtle of Edinburg, and withdrew into Holland (5).

From what has been ſaid it appears, that the Whig party moſtly conſiſted of profeſſed Preſbyterians, or of men inclined to Preſbytery, tho' they profeſſed the eſtabliſhed religion. That is to ſay, the times of James I and Charles I, were returned, when every man who was not of the court party, and a furious Tory, was a Preſbyterian. The King finding his authority ſufficiently eſtabliſhed ſince the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, reſolved intirely to ruin his enemies the Whigs, and conſequently the Preſbyterians. To this purpoſe, he ordered, that the Non-conformiſts ſhould be rigorouſly proſecuted, which diſcovered his motive for conveying away, in the houſe of lords, the bill to repeal the act of the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, at the very time it was about being paſſed into a law. For if this bill had not been ſecreted, no advantage could have been taken againſt the Preſbyterians. This order of the King occaſioned a violent perſe-

(5) When the teſt was in debate, Argyle ſpoke zealouſly againſt the clauſe, whereby all the Royal family were excepted out of it. He ſaid, the only danger we could apprehend as to Popery was, if the Royal family ſhould happen to be perverted: therefore he thought it was better to have no act at all than ſuch a clauſe in it. For this reaſon, when he came to explain himſelf concerning the taking the teſt in his own ſenſe, his words were conſtrued as a defaming and a ſpreading of lies of the proceedings of parliament, which was capital. Accordingly he was tried and condemned. No ſentenſe, ſays Burnet, in our age, was more univerſally cried out upon than this. All ſpoke of it, and the duke who drove it on, with horror. All that was ſaid to leſſen the horror was, that duke Lauderdale had reſtored the family with ſuch an extended juriſdiction, that he was really the maſter of all the Highlands. This, as the duke wrote to the King, was all he intended by it, as lord Halifax aſſured Burnet. Tho' a perſon of quality, whom lord Argyle never named, affirmed to him, on his honor, that he heard one in great favor ſay to the duke, the thing muſt be done, and that it would be eaſier to ſatisfy the King about it after it was done, than to obtain his leave for doing it. cution againſt the Diſſenters. Since the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, all the magiſtrates, judges, juſtices of the peace, governors, and lord lieutenants, had been changed, and the moſt violent Tories put in their places. It may eaſily be imagined, with what joy and zeal theſe men executed the laws againſt the Preſbyterians, which had for ſome years been ſuſpended. The clergy particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves by ſhowing their attachment to the principles and maxims of the court.

Paſſive-obedience every where preached up.

The pulpits reſounded with the doctrine of Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance, which had been eſpouſed by a few in the reign of Charles I, but was now univerſally preached. They ſeemed earneſtly buſy in ſurrendering to the King, all the liberties and privileges of the ſubjects, and to leave themſelves only an unlimited obedience. According to the principles publicly preached, no Eaſtern Monarch was more abſolute than the King of England. This doctrine was ſupported in the courts of juſtice, by all the judges and lawyers, to the utmoſt of their abilities. All this was followed with numberleſs petitions and addreſſes, wherein the aſſociation, and the principles from which it flowed, were utterly deteſted. This aſſociation, which had occaſioned the perſecution againſt the Diſſenters, was but a chimera, and intirely grounded on the paper found in the earl of Shaftſbury's cloſet, without even a poſſibility of knowing whether it was an original, or a copy. But any man's thinking of aſſociating the ſubjects againſt the King, was ſufficient, according to the current principles, to charge the whole Whig party, as guilty of the greateſt crime imaginable. I ſhall not tranſcribe theſe addreſſes. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that they ſuppoſed the King of England as abſolute as it is poſſible to deviſe. Thus the violent Tories, who then prevailed in the corporations, were not ſatisfied with perſecuting the Preſbyterians, but alſo made King Charles an arbitrary and abſolute Monarch, as if there had been no other expedient to ſave the church of England from the attempts of the Preſbyterians.

The duke of York returns. Kennet, p. 392. Echard, Vol. III. p. 653, 656.

The begining of March, the duke of York returned from Scotland, and was received by the King with all poſſible ſigns of affection. At the ſame time, a letter came to the King from Scotland, ſubſcribed by ſeven biſhops, full of the duke of York's praiſes, and of the happineſs injoyed by the church of Scotland under his adminiſtration. So that it was not the fault of theſe prelates, that the duke, tho' moſt zealous for the Popiſh religion, was not reſpected as the principal ſupport and protector of the Proteſtant church.

After two months ſtay in England, the duke returned to Scotland to bring his family from thence. He went by ſea; but by an unexpected accident, the ſhip, tho' the weather was fair, ſtruck upon the ſand *, and in a ſhort time had above ſeven foot water in the hold. This obliged him to put off in his pinnace, with as many perſons as it would hold, and to ſave himſelf on board the Mary yatch. It is pretended, he himſelf named the perſons whom he would have in the boat with him, and that ſome prieſts and jeſuits were prefered to ſeveral perſons of quality, who were unfortunately drowned, with a hundred and thirty ſeamen, the ſhip ſinking ſoon after the duke put off. But I will not warrant this circumſtance, which perhaps is only a report ſpread by his enemies (1). The duke made but a ſhort ſtay in Scotland. He departed within a few days for England, where he continued the reſt of this reign, with great influence over the actions and counſels of the King his brother. To him is generally aſcribed the rigor with which the King treated his enemies the remaining part of his life. It is ſaid, the King being one day importuned by the duke to undertake things which he thought very dangerous, told him, "Brother, I am reſolved never "to travel again; you may do ſo, if you "pleaſe."

Charles II. An' 1682. Returns back to England, where he grows very powerful. Echard Vol. III. p. 657.

Tho' the Tory party had the advantage, being ſupported by the court and the magiſtrates, the Whigs however were not diſcouraged, in the expectation of cauſing ſome turn, by informing the people in pamphlets of their danger from the court. Theſe pamphlets were numberleſs, and new ones daily appeared, to attack or defend. That which made the greateſt noiſe was, "The life of Julian "the Apoſtate," in which a parallel was drawn between that Prince and the duke of York. The neceſſity of the excluſion was ſhown, and Paſſive-obedience exploded as a Mahometan doctrine. This book did but exaſperate the advocates of Paſſive-obedience. They took occaſion from thence to carry the doctrine ſo high, that when, in the reign of James II, reſtrictions became neceſſary, they knew not how to make them, and many even perſiſted in ſupporting this tenet, rather than own they had been in the wrong to carry it to ſuch extremity.

Pamphlets againſt the court. Id. p. 638.

A remark upon the doctrine of Paſſive-obedience.

To make it appear, that to this time the date of the birth, or at leaſt of the great progreſs of the doctrine of Paſſive-obedience muſt be fixed, it needs only to be conſidered, that the ſecond parliament of this reign, tho' chiefly compoſed of rigid church of England men, devoted intirely to the King, after having, by acts, eſtabliſhed ſuch principles as led to this doctrine, readily departed from it, when the court, as they believed, intended thereby to introduce a deſpotic government. This ſhows their deſign was not to eſtabliſh ſuch a government. But in 1682, the time I am ſpeaking of, theſe principles were not only preached, but practiſed, and the King was thanked in public and ſolemn addreſſes, for having eſtabliſhed an abſolute power. The pulpits rang with Paſſive-obedience, which was inforced from the poſitive declarations of God; and all the magiſtrates emulouſly ſtrove to reduce this doctrine to practiſe. The Whigs on their part in their attacks of theſe ſtrange opinions, threw themſelves into the other extreme, and thereby gave their enemies room to accuſe them as ſubverters of Monarchy. In ſhort, a kind of infatuation ſeized the kingdom, and one party, inſtead of moderating themſelves, violently imbraced whatever was moſt contrary to the other.

Great rage againſt the Whigs. Echard, Vol. III. p. 658.

The animoſity againſt the Whigs was then ſo exceſſive, that even in the adminiſtration of juſtice, the judges forgot common decenſy. The earl of Shaftſbury having brought his action of Scandalum Magnatum againſt one mr. Cradock, the defendant's counſel alleged, "That there was no pro-"bability of a fair trial by a London jury, by "reaſon that the earl was of the Skinners company, "of which ſherif Pilkington was maſter, and that "therefore the jury ought to be taken from ſome "other place." The court of King's-bench found this exception ſo juſt, that it was ordered, "That "unleſs the earl would conſent to try his cauſe by a "country jury, it ſhould not be tried in London." I know not whether ſuch an exception had ever been known or admited before. Party rage appeared in

The long boat went off with very few in her, tho' ſhe might have carried off above eighty more than ſhe did, p. 523. What makes this account probable in the main, is, that the following perſons periſhed with the reſt, the earl of Roxborough, the lord Obryan, the laird of Hopton, ſir Joſeph Douglaſs, lieutenant Hyde the duke's brother-in-law. The mayor and ſheriffs of London elected by the influence of the court. June 24. Kennet, p. 395. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 660.

Tho' the Whigs had a great diſadvantage in the kingdom, they ſtill preſerved their ſuperiority in London, where almoſt all the magiſtrates were of their party; but they were not ſuffered long to injoy them. Moor, the lord mayor, who had been an abhorrer, and was in the intereſts of the court, objected againſt the election of the ſheriffs, and afterwards of the lord mayor, who was to ſucceed him; and being ſupported by the privy council, prevailed, partly by force, and partly by conſent, to have new ſheriffs (1), and a new mayor elected of the King's party. This was a triumph for the court, and the earl of Shaftſbury was ſo ſenſible of it, that ſeeing himſelf like to be deprived of the city of London's protection, avoided the impending ſtorm, by a retreat into Holland. It was remarked, that he was forced to ſhelter himſelf under the protection of a Republic, to which, when he was chancellor, and one of the cabal, he had applied that ſaying of Cato, 'Delenda eſt Carthago. —— He died ſix weeks after his arrival in Holland.

A deſign againſt London and other corporations.

The court having got a lord mayor and ſheriffs at their devotion, improved the advantage, and relying on the compliance of the magiſtrates, reſolved to annul the charter of London, and afterwards thoſe of all the other corporations in the kingdom. But this deſign was not executed till the next year.

Mean while, the lord mayor and the ſheriffs of London, were very active againſt the Preſbyterians, and executed the laws with great ſeverity. Moreover, to recommend themſelves the more to the court, they prevented the burning of the Pope, as had been cuſtomary on the ſeventeenth of November (2).

Pilkington fined for words ſpoken againſt the duke of York Nov. 24. Echard, Vol. III. p. 665. Burnet, p. 535.

The duke of York imbracing ſo favorable a juncture, brought his action againſt the late ſherif Pilkington, for theſe words, ſpoken by the defendant, "The duke of York has fired the city, "and is now come to cut our throats." The jury found for the duke, and gave him one hundred thouſand pounds damages. To ſuch extravagance was party rage carried.

Before we finiſh the events of this year 1682, which was memorable only for the progreſs of the court and the Tories; the downfal of the Whigs, and the perſecution of the Preſbyterians; I ſhall relate ſome other things which happened this year.

Mr. Thynne murdered.

Firſt, the murder of mr. Thynne, almoſt in the heart of the city, by count Coningſmark, for which his footman was hanged. As this is a private affair, I ſhall ſay no more of it.

Embaſſies.

This year the King received two extraordinary embaſſies, one from the King of Fez and Morocco, the other from the King of Bantam in the iſle of Java.

Deaths.

This year died Prince Rupert, count palatine of the Rhine, ſo often mentioned in the foregoing reign, ſixty-three years of age; John Maitland duke of Lauderdale; Heneage Finch earl of Nottingham and lord high chancellor; and Anthony Aſhley Cooper earl of Shaftſbury.

Promotions.

On the other hand the King created ſeveral peers (3), among the reſt, the duke of Ormond, an Iriſh duke, was promoted to the ſame dignity in England.

Laſtly, the earl of Sunderland was reſtored to the office of ſecretary; upon the reſignation of the earl of Conway.

CHARLES II. AN' 1682.

Burnet, p. 531.

His Majeſty having had no extraordinary ſupplies from the parliament for ſome years, it would be aſtoniſhing that he ſhould at once become ſo good an œconomiſt, as to live on his revenues, if it had not afterwards appeared, that he had contracted many debts, and thereby ſupplied in ſome meaſure the aids of money, which, on one pretenſe or other, he had uſed to receive from the parliament. The court purſued the ſame courſe, without any appearance of intending to uſe their new power for raiſing money upon the ſubject. It might appear ſomewhat ſurpriſing, that the King, in his preſent ſituation, did not ſummon a parliament, as well to repeal what had been inacted againſt him, as to get a ſupply of money. Pretenſes would not have been wanting. That was not the thing. But it ſeemed, that notwithſtanding the multitude of addreſſes, which were ſtill daily preſented, he did not confide in the affection of his people, and feared, that the elections would not prove favorable to him. Theſe addreſſes indeed came but from one party, and the King knew, it was very poſſible to receive addreſſes from all the corporations in England, without being aſſured, that the people in general were well affected. But as foreigners may not underſtand this, I ſhall give it a brief explanation.

The King runs in debt.

Reaſons which hindered the King from calling a parliament.

England is almoſt all divided into communities, called corporations, which have each their privileges, obtained from the Sovereigns on certain conditions. There is ſcarce a town which has not its magiſtrates and laws as a corporation. The mayor, or head of the corporation, the aldermen, the recorder, and other principal officers, are elected either by the whole community, or by a certain number of townſmen. It is eaſy therefore to apprehend, that the prevailing party may, without great difficulty, form a common council of their own principles, and it is this common council which manages the addreſſes preſented to the King, in the name of the whole corporation. Provided the ſuperiority of voices in the common council be for one of the parties, that ſuffices, if an addreſs be ordered, to ſay, it is in the name of the town or community, tho' all the other members ſhould be of a contrary opinion. But in chuſing repreſentatives, another method is taken. For then every burgeſs, every freeholder, has a right to give his vote, and conſequently repreſentatives of a contrary party to the magiſtrates and common council may very poſſibly be elected. This, probably, hindered the King from venturing to call a new parliament, fearing he ſhould not find his account in it. For the ſame voters who had choſen the members of the two laſt parliaments, would have had a right to vote for the members of a new one, which could not be advantageous to his Majeſty. The court therefore came to a reſolution of reſuming the charters of the corporations, and to grant others drawn in ſuch manner, that the King ſhould be almoſt inabled to cauſe ſuch repreſentatives to be elected, as he pleaſed. It may be affirmed, there was no readier or more effectual way to invade at once the liberties of the nation, and cauſe the parliament itſelf to approve of the ſame.

cution of this deſign, or ſome favorable occaſion offer itſelf, the King reſolved to take the diverſions of New-market. He had ſcarce been there ſix days, when a fire broke out in the town with ſuch violence, that he was obliged to return to London ſome days ſooner than he deſigned. It was pretended afterwards, that there was, at this time, a plot againſt his life, to be executed at New-market, and which was prevented by his ſudden return, occaſioned by the fire. This accident was aſcribed to a particular providence preſerving the King, when he was in ſo great danger.

An' 1683. Several aldermen tried for a riot. May 8. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 541.

His Majeſty intending to be revenged on the old magiſtracy of London, which had oppoſed him for ſeveral years, iſſued out a commiſſion for trial of the authors of the diſorder at the election of ſherifs the laſt year. This diſorder, in the commiſſion, was called a "riotous and unlawful aſſembly," and aggravated as much as a thing of ſuch little moment could admit. Fourteen aldermen and ſubſtantial citizens, leaders of the Whigs, were all tried and condemned in great fines (1).

A Quo Warranto brought againſt the charter of London. Kennet, p. 399. Echard, Vol. III. p. 671. Burnet, p. 530, 533.

But the King ſtoped not here; tho' the new magiſtrates and common council were aſſiduous in giving him marks of their reſpect and loyalty, by repealing ſeveral acts of the court of common council, made during the late troubles (2). They likewiſe replaced, in its nich in the Royal Exchange, the ſtatue of Charles I, which had been taken down after his death. Nevertheleſs, this did not prevent his Majeſty's iſſuing a Quo Warranto againſt the city, that is, an order to ſhow by what warrant they pretended to be a corporation, and injoy the privileges mentioned in the writ. On ſuch occaſions, the corporation, againſt whom the Quo Warranto is ſent, produces the charter of their privileges, and the queſtion is to know, whether they have exactly obeyed the conditions and articles of their charter. If they have been faulty in any eſſential article, the court, before whom the affair is brought, may declare their privileges and charter forfeited. This rarely happens, becauſe a corporation is not wont to break their charter in eſſential articles, for fear of loſing it; and if it is in a point of little importance, the court is ſatisfied with a fine to the King. This is the practiſe where juſtice, and a maintenance of the laws and cuſtoms of the kingdom are only deſigned. But, in the preſent caſe, the King's intention was not to maintain juſtice and the laws, but to take occaſion from the breach of ſome article of the charter, to ſeize the liberties of London into his hands, and render himſelf abſolute maſter of the government of that city. The preſent juncture was very favorable to his deſign, becauſe, ſince the diſſolution of the Oxford parliament, he had taken care to fill the courts of juſtice with judges devoted to him, and to theſe judges were commited the deciſion of this affair.

R. Coke, p. 313.

The King alleged two violations of the charter by the corporation of London. The firſt was the illegal exaction of tolls in the market, and particularly the raiſing money to rebuild Cheapſide conduit. The ſecond was the framing and printing a ſcandalous petition, wherein they charged the King with obſtructing the juſtice of the nation, by proroguing the laſt Weſtminſter parliament. This affair was learnedly argued on both ſides; but at laſt the judges of the King's-Bench declared, that the liberties and privileges of the city of London were forfeited, and might be ſeized into the King's hands. Nevertheleſs, it was declared, by the expreſs command of the King, "That judgment "ſhould not be entered until his Majeſty's plea-"ſure ſhould be further known."

Charles II. An' 1683.

The city ſubmits to the King.

On this judgment ſeveral reflections were then, and ſtill are made, which are not to the honor either of the King or the court. However, the inhabitants of London were extremely ſurpriſed at this procedure, and the common council aſſembled to conſult how to proceed in this exigency. Some were for having the judgment entered till an opportunity offered to procure a reverſal: but the court party inſiſted upon an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the King before judgment was entered, which was in effect a voluntary ſurrender of the privileges of the city into the King's hands, and a depriving it of the means to cauſe the ſentenſe one day to be reverſed. This opinion was carried by a majority, and the King was waited on with a petition agreeble to ſuch a reſolution. The King anſwered by the lord keeper North, That he would reſtore the charter if the city would ſubmit to the following regulations:

June 18. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 673.

Conditions offered by the King.

1. That no lord mayor, nor any officer of the corporation, or ſteward of the borough of Southwark, ſhould be capable of, or admited to the exerciſe of their reſpective offices, before his Majeſty ſhould have approved them under his ſign Manual.

2. That if his Majeſty ſhould diſapprove the choice of any perſon to be lord mayor, &c. the citizens ſhould, within one week, proceed to a new choice: and if his Majeſty ſhould in like manner diſapprove the ſecond choice, his Majeſty might if he pleaſed, nominate a perſon to be lord mayor for the year inſuing.

3. The ſame with regard to the ſherifs.

4. The lord mayor and court of aldermen might alſo, with the leave of his Majeſty, diſplace any alderman, recorder, &c.

5. Upon the election of any alderman, if the court of aldermen ſhould judge and declare the perſon preſented to be unfit, the ward ſhould chuſe again; and upon a diſapproval of a ſecond choice, the court might appoint another in his room.

6. The juſtices of the peace were to be by the King's commiſſion; and the ſetling of theſe matters to be left to his Majeſty's attorney and ſollicitor general, and council learned in the law.

By theſe articles, it is evident, the King was abſolute maſter of the government of the city, and by reſtoring their charter, effectually deprived them of their principal privileges.

The city accepts them. Echard.

Two days after, the common council met, and reſolved on ſubmiting to his Majeſty, by a majority of eighteen voices (3). The hiſtorians of the King's party ſpeak of this affair very ſlightly, pretending the city was juſtly puniſhed for their great provocations to the King of late years. But as to the conduct of the King and court, which occaſioned theſe provocations, they do not think proper to mention it, and ſo the whole blame lies on the city.

in a Proteſtant country, with deſigns framed by Proteſtants againſt Papiſts, and as ſome gladly remove the idea of the King and duke of York's being Papiſts, they rather chuſe to give it the name of the Rye-houſe-plot, from a houſe ſo called, in the road to Newmarket (1), where, it is pretended, the conſpirators had projected to murder the King and duke. I muſt not conceal, that as the former conſpiracy, called the Popiſh plot, did then, and ſtill does, paſs for an invention, with the adherents of the court; ſo this had the ſame fate among thoſe who were, or ſtill are, of the contrary party. The hiſtory of this conſpiracy muſt therefore be read with great caution, ſince the authors are intirely divided; the one repreſenting as falſe, what the others aſſert as true. Were they both content with relating the bare facts, giving for true thoſe that may be proved, as for falſe thoſe whoſe contrary cannot be proved, and for doubtful ſuch as are doubtful, the reader might be able to form ſome judgment. But their accounts are artfully labored to prepoſſeſs the reader. A thouſand things are inſinuated which have no foundation but in their ſyſtem. The witneſſes are either knaves or honeſt men, as is moſt for their advantage. The conſpiracy in their recitals is ſuppoſed true or falſe at pleaſure. Numberleſs circumſtances are inſerted to ſerve their purpoſe, without the leaſt proof or authority. So the reader, who is in ſearch of truth, finds himſelf at a loſs, it being impoſſible to enter into a particular examination of ſo many oppoſite things. Impartial readers content themſelves with leaving the matter undecided, becauſe they ſee no proofs ſtrong enough to determine their aſſent either way. Others thro' prejudice in favor of one of the parties, or thro' lazineſs or indifference, implicitly follow the ſentiments of the hiſtorian, or reject them abſolutely.

Sprat. Echard.

Therefore to avoid as much as poſſible the errors which I condemn, I ſhall ſuppreſs all inſinuations of the hiſtorians of both parties, and confine myſelf to the depoſitions and defenſes of the accuſed, without adding any circumſtance which is not owned by both ſides.

On the twelfth of June this year, Joſiah Keeling diſcovered the conſpiracy, real or pretended, to the lord Dartmouth and ſecretary Jenkins, before whom he made open confeſſion of the whole affair, and ſubſcribed his depoſitions. But afterwards, conſidering that his ſingle intelligence was not ſufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, that his brother John Keeling might be admited into the next meeting of the conſpirators. This was done, and thereupon both the brothers gave in their joint teſtimony upon oath on the fourteenth of June.

Keeling's information in Sprat, 8vo. Burnet, p. 544. Sprat's Hiſt. p. 89.

It muſt be obſerved, that this circumſtance of the admiſſion of John Keeling into the ſecrets of the plot, manifeſtly ſuppoſes a conſpiracy. Accordingly it is only produced by thoſe hiſtorians who believe the reality of the plot.

In the next place, the diſcovery of the plot being made by Joſiah Keeling the twelfth of June, and the depoſition of the two brothers being given on the fourteenth, it follows that, according to the firſt ſuppoſition, John Keeling had but one day to be informed of the ſecrets of this plot.

Burnet, p. 543, &c.

According to the depoſitions of the two Keelings, the plot conſiſted of three articles. 1. The conſpirators deſigned to ſecure the King's guards (but how this was to be executed does not appear) then to block up or beſiege Whitehall, and ſeize the perſons of the King and duke of York. 2. To aſſaſſinate the King and the duke in a hollow way near the Rye-houſe, in their return from Newmarket. 3. To cauſe inſurrections in London, and other parts of the kingdom (2). But Keeling depoſed only againſt perſons of no note.

Charles II. An' 1683.

Upon this depoſition, the King iſſued a proclamation for apprehending, colonel John Rumſey, Richard Rumbold, maſter (3), Richard Nelthorpe, eſq; Edward Wade, gent. Richard Goodenough, gent. capt. Walcot, William Thompſon, James Burton, and William Hone; for either of which a hundred pounds was offered to the diſcoverer. Upon this proclamation, colonel Rumſey ſurrendered himſelf the next day; and being examined by ſecretary Jenkins, he confeſſed all he knew; which confeſſion was next day confirmed by two others, mr. Weſt and mr. Sheppard: ſo that on the twenty-eight of June, there came out a ſecond proclamation, for apprehending James duke of Monmouth, Ford lord Grey, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, knight, and Robert Ferguſon. It is pretended, that when the warrants were delivered to Legat the meſſenger, to ſeize Ferguſon with the reſt of the offenders, ſecretary Jenkins gave Legat a ſtrict command, not to take him, but to ſhun him wherever he met him. Shortly after, the lord Howard of Eſcrick alſo ſurrendered himſelf, and upon his information, warrants for high treaſon were iſſued out againſt the earl of Eſſex, the lord Ruſſel, and others, who were taken up accordingly.

Addreſſes flowed from all parts to congratulate the King on this diſcovery. The embaſſadors of foreign Princes paid the ſame compliment; and the King of France offered five hundred piſtoles for the apprehending of Monmouth, Grey, Armſtrong, or Ferguſon.

Beſide theſe witneſſes, there was a letter pro- duced, under Walcot's own hand, to ſecretary Jenkins, in which he ſaid, " That if his Majeſty " deſired it, he would diſcover to him all that he " knew in England, Scotland, or Ireland, which " might be ſomething more than the original diſ- " coverer could acquaint him with, eſpecially as " to Ireland; that his intimacy with a Scotiſh " miniſter, thro' whoſe hands much of the buſineſs " went, occaſioned his knowing very much, &c."

Walcot's defenſe. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 615.

Walcot's defenſe conſiſted, firſt, of a plain denial of having any hand in the aſſaſſination; ſaying, " He knew well enough, if he had undertaken to " charge the guards, while others killed the King, " he was equally guilty with thoſe that killed " him; but that he was ſick of the gout during " the meetings, while the King was at Newmar- " ket." To this Weſt replied, " That he re- " membered it well, by a good token, that the " the priſoner himſelf ſaid, 'He was afraid when " the time came, he ſhould not be able to draw on " his boots." Walcot added, " That he came ac- " cidentally to their meetings only to hear news. " That what he had promiſed to diſcover, he had He is con- demned. " only heard from Ferguſon." In concluſion, he was brought in guilty of high treaſon by the jury.

A remark upon this trial.

Thoſe who believe this plot was only an artifice of the court to deſtroy their chief enemies obſerve, that the depoſitions of the witneſſes againſt Walcot, and the other pretended conſpirators, are all founded on the ſuppoſition, that there was really a deſign to ſeize the King's guards, aſſaſſinate him and the duke, and raiſe an inſurrection, and on a previous narrative of this pretended conſpiracy, ſuppoſed to be undeniable, to which the ſeveral depoſitions were adjuſted, before the reality of the deſign was approved.

In the ſecond place, they ſay, that theſe depoſi- tions are incoherent: for the conſpirators muſt have had, at the ſame time, two contrary deſigns, one to ſecure the King's perſon, and oblige him to conſent to their propoſals; and the other to aſſaſſi- nate him; two deſigns which can hardly ſubſiſt together.

Their adverſaries reply, it being proved by the depoſitions of the witneſſes, that the accuſed had aſſiſted at ſuch and ſuch meetings, where the King's aſſaſſination was mentioned, and having diſcourſed concerning the deſign, the ſuppoſition was ſuffi- ciently proved.

Trial of the lord Ruſſel. p. 629. Burnet, p. 553.

I ſhall not relate the trials of the other priſo- ners of little note, but confine myſelf to the lord Ruſſel's, ſon to the earl of Bedford. This lord, being one of thoſe againſt whom the court was moſt incenſed, becauſe he had propoſed the bill of excluſion in the houſe of commons, and carried it up to the lords, was tried the twelfth of July at the Old-Bailey, before eight judges. He was very urgent for one day longer before his trial, becauſe, as he ſaid, he had witneſſes that might come be- fore night; but he was over-ruled. He then urged to have his trial defered to the afternoon; but with no better ſucceſs. Three witneſſes depoſed againſt him, colonel Rumſey the evicence againſt Walcot, mr. Sheppard, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick.

Rumſey's depoſition. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 636, 637.

1. Rumſey depoſed, " That in the end of Octo- " ber, or in the begining of November 1682, there " met at mr. Sheppard's houſe in Abchurch-lane, " the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, the lord " Ruſſel the priſoner, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and " Robert Ferguſon; that the earl of Shaftſbury " deſired him to go to them thither, to know what " reſolution they were come to about the riſing of " Taunton; that he did go, and mr. Sheppard car- " ried him up where they were, and he delivered " his meſſage. That the anſwer was, mr. " Trenchard had failed them, and there would " be no more done in the matter at that time; " that there was at the ſame time a diſcourſe " by all the company, about ſeeing what poſture " the guards were in, that they might know how " to ſurpriſe them; that ſome of them undertook " to go and ſee: that the lord Ruſſel in particular p. 638. " did ſpeak about the riſing, and gave his conſent " to it."

Sheppard's depoſition. p. 638, 639.

2. Mr. Sheppard teſtified, " That in October " laſt, Ferguſon deſired of him, in the duke of " Monmouth's name, the conveniency of his houſe, " for the meeting of ſome perſons of quality; and " that the ſame day in the evening, the duke of " Monmouth, the lord Grey, the lord Ruſſel, ſir " Thomas Armſtrong, colonel Rumſey, and Fer- " guſon came; that they deſired to be private, and " none of his ſervants to come up; that their " diſcourſe was how to ſurpriſe the guards; that " the duke of Monmouth, the lord Grey, and ſir " Thomas Armſtrong, went one night to the " Mews to view them; that the next time they " came (1), Armſtrong ſaid, the guards were very " remiſs, and the thing was feaſible; that they " had two meetings of this kind at his houſe; that " in one of them ſomething was read by Ferguſon " in the nature of a declaration, ſeting forth the " grievances of the nation in order to a riſing; " that he could not poſitively ſay, that the lord " Ruſſel was there when it was read; but the ſaid " lord, the priſoner, was there when it was diſ- " courſed of ſeizing the guards."

The lord Howard's depoſition. p. 639, 642.

The lord Howard began his teſtimony, with a long ſtory about the plot in general, which ſeemed to be deſigned only to exaſperate the jury; after which he depoſed to this effect: " That after the " earl of Shaftſbury's flight, the chief perſons con- " cerned in the conſpiracy, in his time, began to " conſider, they had gone ſo far, that it was unſafe " for them to make a retreat; and that in ſo " great an affair, conſiſting of ſuch infinite par- " ticulars, to be managed with ſo much fineneſs, " it would be neceſſary to have ſome general coun- " cil; and that therefore they reſolved to erect a " Cabal among themſelves, which uſually conſiſted " of ſix perſons, the duke of Monmouth, the earl " of Eſſex, the lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, mr. " Hampden junior, and the deponent; and this " was about the middle of January laſt. They " met at mr. Hampden's houſe, where it was pre-

For a farther defenſe of his lordſhip, there ap- p. 646. peared for him the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Angleſey, mr. Edward Howard, the lord Cavendiſh, the lord Clifford, doctor Tillotſon, doctor Burnet, doctor Cox, doctor Fitz-Williams, mr. Luton Gore, mr. Spencer. Some of theſe teſtified, Burnet, p. 546, 554. that the lord Howard, before he was taken, declared, " He believed the lord Ruſſel inno- " cent, and knew nothing againſt him." Others ſpoke to his lordſhips private character, and declared his great worth and probity; his virtuous and ſober life, and conſequently the improbability of his being thus ingaged. But this was turned againſt him by the King's counſel, who ſaid, there could not be any more dangerous enemies to a ſtate, than ſuch as come ſober to indeavor its deſtruction.

As to what concerned the lord Howard's ſay- State Trials, Vol. III. p. 648. ing, he believed the priſoner innocent, it was anſwered by that lord himſelf, who confeſſed, " He " had ſaid ſo, being then himſelf not accuſed, ſo " that he intended to out-face the thing both for " himſelf and the party; but now, his duty to " God, the King, and his country required it, he " muſt ſay the truth; and that tho' the council of " ſix were not choſen by any community, yet they " did erect themſelves by mutual agreement one " with another into that ſociety."

In fine, the jury brought him in guilty of high- He is condemned. July 14. treaſon. This ſentenſe was conſidered by all, who had any ſenſe of ſhame left, as the moſt crying injuſtice ever known in England. For the lord Ruſſel was condemned for words ſpoken in his hearing, which in England can never paſs for treaſon. The lord Howard ſo loſt his reputation, for being acceſſary to this injuſtice, that he was looked on with horror by honeſt men, who avoided his company, as aſhamed or afraid to be ſeen with him. Some ſay, he had made his peace with the King a little before, by the mediation of the ducheſs of Portſmouth, and by an ingagement to ſerve as a witneſs againſt the pretended conſpirators.

But that which was believed to have very much The earl of Eſſex found with his throat cut in the Tower. influenced the jury againſt the lord Ruſſel, was, that in the very time of his trial, the earl of Eſſex, priſoner in the Tower, was found dead in his chamber, with his throat cut from ear to ear with a razor. The news was immediately brought to the Old-Bailey, and communicated to the judges and the King's counſel, who from thence took occaſion to inſinuate to the jury the reality of the plot (1), ſince the earl of Eſſex rather choſe to lay violent hands on himſelf, than ſtand a trial.

It was beſide urged, that it was not poſſible for a man to cut his own throat from ear to ear. Several other circumſtances were added, of which it is not eaſy to diſcover the truth. It was reported, that in the blood ſprinkled on the floor of the room, were diſcovered the marks of a ſtrange foot; and that after the deed was done, the razor was thrown out of the window, and picked up by a little girl. fore the coroners came to inſpect the body, care was taken to ſtrip and leave it naked, and to waſh the room. That the coroner demanding to ſee the cloaths, was anſwered, it was his buſineſs to examine the body, and not the cloaths. What has been moſt plauſibly urged, in vindication of the King and duke from this horrid action, is, that perſons of credit have teſtified their frequent hearing the earl of Eſſex declare, that ſelf-murder was no ſin. It is farther urged, that his counteſs, and ſir Henry Capel his brother, owned the juſtice of the coroner's verdict. But had they believed the contrary, this was no proper time to diſcover their ſuſpicions. I am very certain, the laſt earl of Eſſex, his ſon, was of another opinion, and have heard him ſay, he believed his father was murdered; and that a French footman, who then ſerved his father, was ſtrongly ſuſpected, and diſappeared immediately after the fact. However this be, the general opinion then was, and ſtill is, that this unfortunate nobleman fell a ſacrifice to the revenge of the King and the duke: this ſeems the leſs ſtrange, as among thoſe who declared moſt openly for their country, againſt the King and duke, the earl of Eſſex was not the only perſon who felt the effects of their reſentment. The King however publicly declared in print, that he was deeply afflicted for the earl of Eſſex's death, becauſe he was thereby deprived of an opportunity to exerciſe his clemency, and teſtify how highly he valued the memory of the lord Capel. But inſtead of convincing the public by this external demonſtration, it was by many imagined, that the King mentioned only the lord Capel, to inſinuate, how much the earl, his ſon, had deviated from his ſteps.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 689.

Idem. Kennet, p. 400.

Beſide the lord Ruſſel condemned for this plot, two others alſo met with the ſame fate, viz. Hone a joiner, and John Rouſe. This laſt had been indicted for treaſonable words, and eſcaped by an Ignoramus jury. But he was re-taken, and tried for the ſame crime, which did not properly belong to this plot, but to his having talked of the King in treaſonable terms. Hone and Rouſe were both condemned as traitors, and executed with Walcot, the twentieth of July. They confeſſed, they had heard of a plot in general, but deſcended not to particulars. At leaſt, it did not appear, that the lord Ruſſel had any correſpondence with them.

Walcot, Hone, and Rouſe executed.

Next day, the lord Ruſſel was alſo executed (1). he was ſo univerſally eſteemed, that it could not be thought, the King would refuſe his pardon, which was beged by ſo many powerful relations. It is even ſaid, the earl of Bedford his father, offered a hundred thouſand pounds for his life; but his offer was rejected. The King would not ſo much as grant a reprieve of ſix weeks to his lady, tho' daughter of the earl of Southampton, but made her this anſwer: "Shall I grant that man ſix weeks, "who, if it had been in his power, would not "have granted me ſix hours?" Every one however was perſuaded, that if there was a deſign to kill the King, the lord Ruſſel was not concerned in it. Beſide, that he denied it with his laſt breath, he was not condemned for that crine, and the witneſſes which depoſed againſt him ſaid nothing like it. And yet the King, to have an excuſe for refuſing a ſhort delay, ſuppoſed that this crime was fully proved. It cannot be denied, that tho' the lord Ruſſel had been guilty of the crime for which he was condemned, viz. of giving a tacit conſent to the deſign of an inſurrection, the King could never have had an opportunity of exerciſing his clemency with more applauſe, to a man of ſo known virtue, nearly related to the greateſt families in the kingdom. But all theſe conſiderations were weak, againſt the paſſion of revenge with which the King and the duke of York were actuated. The lord Ruſſel had been one of the warmeſt oppoſers of the duke of York, had joined the earls of Shaftſbury and Eſſex, and carried up the bill of excluſion to the houſe of lords. Theſe were crimes not to be forgiven by the King and his brother. But perhaps moſt of my readers, after having peruſed the tranſactions of this reign, will not think it ſo enormous a crime to indeavor to oppoſe an arbitrary power, which was begining to be introduced. He died with great reſolution, proteſting his innocence, and ignorance of any deſign againſt the King's perſon, or of any contrivance to alter the government. As it was expected that he would be interrupted, he ſpoke but little on the ſcaffold, leaving in the hands of the ſheriffs a paper in which he proteſted his innocence, and ſaid, "That he died "a true and ſincere Proteſtant, and in the com-"munion of the church of England, tho' he could "nevet yet comply with, or riſe up to all the "heights of ſome people."

Kennet, p. 400.

For a concluſion to this melancholy ſcene, it remains only to ſpeak of the condemnation and execution of colonel Algernoon Sidney, who was accuſed of the plot, and of the deſign to kill the King. He was brother to the earl of Leiceſter, and, in the late troubles, had been deeply ingaged in the republican party. At the reſtoration he thought not fit to accept perſonally of the indemnity, whether in diſtruſt of the King, or for ſome other reaſon. At length, in 1677, he obtained a particular pardon of the King, and returned to England, where he joined the country party, at which the King was highly offended.

Trial of Algernoon Sidney. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 697. State Trials, Vol. III p. 710.

Four witneſſes were produced againſt him, Rumſey, Weſt, Keeling, and the lord Howard of Eſcrick. The three firſt contented themſelves with giving a particular account of the plot, but ſaid nothing directly againſt the priſoner. He complained of it as a great hardſhip, as prepoſſeſſing the jury. The lord Howard depoſed, as before at the trial of the lord Ruſſel, that colonel Sidney was of the council of ſix, and had ſent Aaron Smith into Scotland, to ingage the Scots in a rebellion.

Depoſitions againſt him. Nov. 21. p. 715, 716.

His defenſe was, firſt a great improbability of erecting a council of ſix; and that perſons ſo little knowing one another, ſhould preſently fall into ſo great and intimate a friendſhip. As to the duke of Monmouth, he ſaid, he never ſpoke with him above three times in his life; and one time was, when lord Howard brought him to his houſe and cozened them both; for he told the duke, that colonel Sidney had invited him, and he told the colonel, that the duke invited himſelf, and neither of them was true. He inlarged upon the ill reputation of the lord Howard, and his deviating in his evidence with reſpect to the lord Ruſſel's, and the preſent trial. He alleged the lord Howard's indigence, and his owing him money, which debt might probably be cancelled by his conviction. He proved, by the teſtimonies of the earls of Clare and Angleſey, of mr. Philip and mr. Edward Howard, dr. Burnet, mr. Ducas, and mr. Blake, that the lord Howard had confeſſed, "That he could Partiality of the judges.

During this whole trial, the judges themſelves undertook to anſwer the reaſons of the accuſed, without leaving any thing for the King's counſel to do. But they anſwered not the objection drawn from the confeſſion of lord Howard, nor did he himſelf make any reply. So that the court's deſign to furniſh the jury with reaſons to condemn the priſoner, evidently appeared.

One of his own manuſcripts produced againſt him. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 719.

But the moſt urgent proof againſt him, was a manuſcript found among his papers. It was an anſwer to a book, compoſed by ſir Robert Filmer, to prove, that, by the laws of God and nature, Kings, and particularly thoſe of England, were inveſted with abſolute and unlimited power. Sidney, in his anſwer to this book, had aſſerted a quite contrary doctrine, and carried his Republican principles to a very great height.

p. 721, 723, 728.

He ſaid firſt, that the manuſcript was not writ by him, and he could ſee no reaſon why it ſhould be aſcribed to him. That tho' he was the author, it might be writ many years ago, in anſwer to Filmer's book, with no intention of publiſhing it, but diſputandi gratia, only for private diverſion, and the exerciſe of his pen. In fine, he inſiſted very much upon the neceſſity of two evidences to the ſame fact. The court, as I ſaid, anſwered all his objections, but it plainly appeared, it was with wretched cavils and ſubtilties. To the manuſcript it was anſwered, that ſcribere eſt agere, and that there was ſufficient in it to prove the malice of his heart, and his treaſonable deſigns. I know not whether the Engliſh lawyers are agreed in this maxim (1). However, he was brought in guilty by the jury. It is pretended, this was the firſt time a man was accuſed of treaſon, and condemned to die, for writing any thing without publiſhing it.

The ſeventh of December, he was beheaded without diſcovering the leaſt weakneſs. Inſtead of a ſpeech on the ſcaffold, he delivered a writing to the ſherif, in which he complained bitterly of the injuſtice done him. He repreſented the infamous life of the lord Howard, and the judges, as men corrupted, and only promoted to ſerve the deſigns of the court.

While theſe pretended conſpirators were vigorouſly proſecuted, the univerſity of Oxford diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a particular manner, among the advocates for the court, by a condemnation in form of twenty-ſeven propoſitions, collected out of ſeveral modern authors, concerning the Regal power. This decree was preſented to the King with great ſolemnity, and very graciouſly received. In the decree itſelf will appear the ſentiments of the univerſity at that time.

Marriage of the Princeſs Anne. Kennet, p. 407.

The marriage of the Princeſs Anne, ſecond daughter of the duke of York, with Prince George, brother to the King of Denmark, celebrated the twenty-eighth of July, gave ſome, but no long interruption to the proſecutions of the conſpirators.

The King revokes the conditions accepted by the city of London, and names a lord mayor and other magiſtrates. Phillips. Kennet, p. 407. Burnet, p. 568.

I have ſhewn that the city of London complied with the King's pleaſure in relation to their charter. But the King it ſeems repented his being ſo favorable. The election of a lord mayor, which is uſually on the twenty-ninth of September, having been defered to the ſixth of October, the King, on pretenſe that the city had not tendered him a formal ſubmiſſion, ordered the judgment upon the Quo Warranto to be entered. By this the city being without a charter, the government was ſeized by the King, who ſent a commiſſion to ſir William Pritchard to continue in the execution of his office during pleaſure. He confirmed likewiſe the two ſherifs with the ſame reſtriction, and diſplaced the recorder, naming another in his ſtead (1). Shortly after, on St. Simon and Jude's day, on which it is cuſtomary for the new lord mayor to take the oaths in the court of Exchequer, the King appointed a new lord mayor during his pleaſure. Thus the city of London ſaw itſelf without charter or privileges, and intirely dependent on the King's will.

The duke of Monmouth reconciles himſelf with the King. Sprat's Hiſt. p. 162, and Appendix, p. 201. Kennet, p. 406. Burnet, p. 573.

His Majeſty, as I ſaid, publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending all the conſpirators againſt his life, among whom was his natutal ſon, the duke of Monmouth. The duke had hitherto kept himſelf concealed. But at laſt weary of his uneaſy ſituation, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the King his father, wherein, after poſitively denying his ever having any deſign againſt his life, he owned however, that many people had made him believe his own was in danger, and thereby cauſed him to commit things contrary to his duty to the King and the duke of York, and aſked both their pardons with great earneſtneſs and ſubmiſſion. He added, that if his Majeſty would grant him his pardon, he would deliver himſelf into the hands of the duke, that he might introduce him into his preſenſe. This was accompanied with proteſtations and aſſurances of reſpect, ſubmiſſion, and fidelity for the future. He concluded with ſaying, " That " he would never aſk to ſee the King's face more, " if ever he did any thing againſt the duke, which " was the greateſt curſe he could lay upon him- " ſelf."

CHARLES II. AN' 1682.

The King could not diſſemble his joy at the receipt of this letter, for he tenderly loved the duke of Monmouth. Nevertheleſs, with his own hand he wrote the following anſwer: " If the duke of " Monmouth deſires to make himſelf capable of " my mercy, he muſt render himſelf to the ſecre- " tary, and reſolve to tell me all he knows, re- " ſigning himſelf intirely to my pleaſure."

This drew from the duke a ſecond letter more ſubmiſſive than the former; in which he confeſſed his offenſe againſt the King and the duke, but in general terms, and without mention of particulars (2). But in aſſuring the King of an unreſerved ſubmiſſion to his pleaſure, he intreated him, that he would not expoſe him to the ignominy of a trial, nor ſend him to the Tower, nor force him to be witneſs againſt any perſon.

Sprat's Hiſt. p. 162. and Appendix, p. 204.

His Majeſty, ſatisfied with this letter, very readily admited his beloved ſon to aſk forgiveneſs. He was introduced by ſecretary Jenkins, who withdrew, and left him alone with the King and the duke of York. What paſſed between them, can only be known from the report of the King and the duke his brother. It is however affirmed, that he threw himſelf at the King's feet, acknowleging his guilt (3), and aſking his pardon; that he confeſſed himſelf faulty to the duke, aſking his pardon alſo. All this is very probable, but what is added admits of ſome doubt, viz. that he confirmed whatever had been depoſed againſt the lord Ruſſel, and colonel Sidney, and thereby corroborated the lord Howard's evidence. It is alſo added, that he aſſured, all the conſiderable Nonconformiſt miniſters knew of the conſpiracy. As this could only come from the King, or duke of York, and as it was the intereſt of both, that the earl of Eſſex, lord Ruſſel, and colonel Sidney ſhould be thought guilty, all do not think themſelves obliged to credit their teſtimony.

and obtains pardon. Sprat. p. 166.

However this be, the King ordered his pardon to be diſpatched with all expedition. But afterwards, upon a report, " That the duke of Mon- " mouth had made no confeſſion, but had aſſerted " the innocency of ſome that had ſuffered," the King required him to write over, and ſubſcribe the following letter:

The King requires a letter from him. Sprat's Hiſt. p. 167. Appendix. p. 207.

" I Have heard of ſome reports of me, as if I " ſhould have leſſened the late plot, and gone " about to diſcredit the evidence given againſt " thoſe who have died by juſtice. Your Majeſty " and the duke know, how ingenuouſly I have " owned the late conſpiracy; and tho' I was not " conſcious of any deſign againſt your Majeſty's " life, yet I lament the having had ſo great a ſhare " in the other part of the ſaid conſpiracy. He demands it back; Sprat's Hiſt. p. 167, 169. Burnet, p. 575.

It is certain, the duke wrote, or at leaſt ſubſcribed this letter, which, as it appears, was expreſſed in general terms, without deſcending to particulars. And yet, ſhortly after, he repented of what he had done, and with great importunity preſſed the King to return him the paper he had ſubſcribed. His Majeſty anſwered him, he would not keep it againſt his will, that he might not have occaſion to ſay, he had been forced to write it. But withal, he warned him to conſider, what ill conſequences might follow upon this obſtinacy, and therefore gave him time till the next morning to deliberate with himſelf. The next day the duke demanded his letter with ſtill greater importunity, and the King reſtored it, but from that moment baniſhed him from his preſenſe at court.

has it reſtored and is baniſhed from the King's preſenſe. Dec. 7.

A conjecture upon this affair. Sprat's Hiſt. p. 168.

It is eaſy to perceive, that the motive which induced the duke to demand his letter again, is a ſubject for conjectures, and difficult to be diſcovered. Some pretend, the duke of Monmouth's friends repreſented to him, that by writing this letter, he had thrown himſelf upon an unavoidable precipice, ſince at ſome other time it might be turned to his ruin. Others maintain, that he was ſo troubled in conſcience, for having aſſerted in this letter a thing which he knew to be falſe, that he was not eaſy till it was returned him. Each follows the opinion which is moſt agreeable to his ſyſtem; but no proof is produced on either ſide. Laſtly, there are thoſe who pretend, it was a contrivance between the King and the duke of Monmouth, and that the King, not to diſoblige the duke of York, told, or ordered the duke of Monmouth to be told, to demand his letter again, in order to have an opportunity to reſtore it, for fear the duke of York might one day make an ill uſe of it. They confirm their conjecture from the King's behavior to the duke of Monmouth in his abſenſe. The duke withdrawing into Holland, and the Prince of Orange receiving him with great reſpect and civility, the King could not forbear teſtifying his ſatisfaction. He writ frequently to the duke of Monmouth, received letters from him, unknown to the duke of York, and privately ſupplied him with money.

A great froſt. Phillips. Echard, Vol. III. p. 705.

The winter of this year was very remarkable for a violent froſt, which began about the begining of December, and laſted till the fifth of February. The Thames was ſo frozen, that there was another city, as it were, on the ice, by the great number of booths erected between the Temple and Southwark, in which place was held an abſolute fair, for above a fortnight, of all ſorts of trades. An ox was likewiſe roaſted whole, bulls baited, and the like.

Tangier demoliſhed. Ibid. p. 706. Burnet, p. 592.

In September or October this year, the King commiſſioned the lord Dartmouth to go with about twenty ſail of ſhips, and utterly demoliſh the town, caſtle, and mole of Tangier. The mole had coſt the King vaſt ſums, but for want of money or for ſome other cauſe was left unfiniſhed. The lord Dartmouth had alſo orders to choak up the haven. Six months were ſpent in executing this commiſſion. The King was thereby freed from a conſiderable annual expenſe for the preſervation of this place, and moreover, the gariſon, moſtly conſiſting, as I obſerved, of Popiſh ſoldiers and officers, ſerved to augment the King's forces at home, and keep in awe thoſe who were impatient of the yoke.

The Siege of Vienna. Burnet, p. 563. Echard, Vol. III. p. 706.

This year 1683, was memorable for the famous ſiege of Vienna, formed by the Grand Viſier Kara Muſtapha, the ninth of July, with an army of an hundred and thirty thouſand men, and raiſed by the King of Poland, the ſecond of September, when the city was reduced to the laſt extremity.

Means to confirm the King's abſolute power.

The year 1684 was almoſt wholly ſpent in eſtabliſhing the King's acquired abſolute power. This was done chiefly by three expedients. The firſt was the augmentation of the forces by the gariſon of Tangier: The ſecond by the rigorous puniſhment of thoſe who were not only accuſed of the Proteſtant plot, but had, during the quarrels between the King and the late parliaments, taken the liberty to ſpeak of the King and the duke of York, with too much warmth and paſſion. Theſe ſpeeches, at a time when the King and the duke were obliged to diſſemble, for fear of farther exaſperating the parliament, were now remembered, when they were in a more favorable ſituation, and the authors made to ſuffer. The third expedient was, the perſuading indirectly all the corporations in the kingdom to ſurrender their charters to the King. I have already ſaid what I had to ſay concerning the gariſon of Tangier.

Condemnations of ſeveral perſons. State Trials, Vol. III.

As to the ſecond expedient, I mean, the proſecutions againſt the King's and duke's enemies, it would be tedious to enumerate all the trials and ſentenſes given againſt thoſe who were accuſed either of the laſt plot, or of having ſpoken too freely of the King and the duke. Nothing elſe almoſt occurs in the events of the year 1684. Since the city had loſt their privileges, the King had nominated ſheriffs (1) intirely devoted to him, who took care in all criminal trials to impannel juries, diſpoſed to follow the ſuggeſtions of the court. To facilitate the condemnation of thoſe whoſe proſecutions were reſolved, his Majeſty, in December laſt, had made ſir George Jefferies lord chief juſtice of the King's-Bench. He was a man fit for the purpoſes of the court, without honor or conſcience, impudent to the laſt degree, and ever ready to betray his duty and the intereſts of juſtice and the kingdom to recommend himſelf to thoſe who were in power. Theſe great qualities advanced him at laſt to the chancellorſhip of England. The King had alſo made other alterations among the judges; ſo that he was in a manner aſſured of the compliance of all the courts of juſtice. The court party had made a great noiſe ſome time before, concerning the Ignoramus returned by the London juries upon all bills prefered againſt the Whigs, and theſe complained no leſs of the rigor exerciſed this year by the Tories. Books were publiſhed to ſhew the paſſion, the partiality, and the crying injuſtices of the judges and juries, in favor of the court. But I cannot deſcend to theſe particulars, however proper they may be to demonſtrate, with what zeal the court promoted the execution of their deſigns, and to ſhow the characters of the perſons imployed. I ſhall therefore omit many trials of perſons little known, and confine myſelf to ſome particular caſes, by which of the reſt an idea may be eaſily formed.

The earl of Danby diſcharged. Feb. 12. Kennet, p. 405. Phillips. Burnet, p. 591.

Upon an impeachment from the commons, the houſe of lords had ſent the earl of Danby to the Tower. He had often demanded to be diſcharged upon bail; but the judges had always refuſed his requeſt, declaring that it was not in their power to admit to bail a peer of the realm impriſoned by parliament. This was the law of the kingdom. But the alterations among the judges had likewiſe produced great alterations in the maxims and principles of the courts of juſtice. The judges who had been in office ſome time, believed it lawful to releaſe the earl upon bail, which was accordingly taken, the earl being bound in a ten thouſand pound recognizance.

The Popiſh lords admited to bail. Feb. 12. Kennet, p. 406. Echard, Vol. III. p. 709.

The earl of Danby's releaſe was a precedent for the liberty of the Popiſh lords, priſoners in the Tower. The lord Petre one of thoſe lords, dying about a month before, on his death-bed ſent a letter to the King, diſowning, in his laſt words, and upon his ſalvation, the matters of which he ſtood accuſed. After a declaration ſo expreſs, the King not doubting the innocence of the other four, told the court by his attorney general, that he conſented to whatever the court ſhould think fit to be done with regard to the Popiſh lords. Whereupon they were admited to bail the ſame day with the earl of Danby. It muſt be that the former judges were very ignorant, not to know that an inferior court had power to releaſe men impriſoned by the ſupreme court of the kingdom, or that the preſent judges were more bold than their predeceſſors.

Kennet, p. 405. Echard, Vol. III. p. 709.

But the perſons accuſed of the laſt conſpiracy, and thoſe who had ſpoken diſreſpectfully of the King and the duke, did not meet with ſo great humanity. Among the great number proſecuted for theſe two offenſes, I ſhall only relate the trials of three or four.

The trial of mr. Hampden. Burnet. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 740, &c.

The ſixth of February, mr. Hampden was tried for a conſpirator. The lord Howard depoſed againſt him, That the council of ſix meeting at mr. Hampden's houſe, mr. Hampden made an introductory ſpeech to open the aſſembly, and that he was concerned in ſending Aaron Smith into Scotland. Mr. Hampden's counſel inſiſted upon lord Howard's ill reputation, and ſcandalous life, and repreſented him as little better than an Atheiſt. But ſuch objections were of force only againſt Oates and Bedloe. For how was it poſſible that the lord Howard ſhould be an ill man, ſince he only depoſed againſt Proteſtants? On the other hand, p. 753. mr. Hampden produced witneſſes who teſtified his virtue, his piety, his morality. But theſe teſtimonies were ineffectual. Jefferies, in a long ſpeech, ſpeaking of religion and virtue, turned it upon the p. 767. priſoner in theſe words, "was it not (ſaid he) under the ſhape of religion that the bleſſed martyr, "King Charles I, came to the block? Nay ſome "men were at a loſs to know which way they "ſhould put a ſpirit into the common people to "oppoſe the King; and ſome among them [mr. "Hampden the firſt] bid them 'be ſure to put "religion to be the pretenſe, and that would make "them run headlong to what they would have "them." By this excellent argument, to be virtuous and religious, was a ſign of a man's being ingaged in the plot. But an artifice made uſe of to caſt mr. Hampden is worthy remarking. It is certain, that, ſuppoſing the truth of lord Howard's teſtimony, mr. Hampden was not leſs guilty than lord Ruſſel or colonel Sidney. Nevertheleſs he could not be condemned as a traitor, ſince there was but one evidence againſt him, and all laws divine and human require two witneſſes to the taking away a man's life. He was therefore indicted of a miſdemeanor, and the jury finding him guilty on the teſtimony of lord Howard, the court was ſatisfied with fining him forty thouſand pounds, and obliging him to find ſureties for his good behavior during life. This was thought to be a very ſurpriſing and ſevere ſentence. But the King diſpelled all doubts concerning this affair, by aſſuring the public, in a large declaration, "That if he had not granted the "duke of Monmouth's requeſt, 'That he would "not make him a witneſs,' neither mr. Hampden, "nor ſcarce any one man of thoſe that were freed "upon bail, had eſcaped death."

CHARLES II. AN' 1683.

AN' 1684. Scandalum Magnatum brought againſt Dutton Colt. May 3. Kennet, p. 414.

John Dutton Colt, eſquire, a member of the three laſt parliaments, was accuſed of ſpeaking theſe words, "The duke of York is a Papiſt, and before "any ſuch Papiſt dog ſhall be ſucceſſor to the "crown of England, I will be hanged at my own "door." Theſe and other injurious words being proved againſt him, the jury brought in their verdict for the duke of York, and gave him for damages a hundred thouſand pounds.

And againſt Titus Oates. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 899. Kennet. Burnet.

The duke of York alſo brought his action of Scandalum Magnatum againſt Titus Oates, for directly calling him traitor. For this offenſe the court gave the duke of York a hundred thouſand pounds damages. Shortly after, he was indicted for perjury, in relation to father Ireland's being in London at the time Oates ſwore to, at his trial. Shortly after another indictment for perjury was prefered againſt him, relating to his being preſent at the ſuppoſed conſult of the jeſuits at the White-horſe tavern in 1678. But theſe indictments not being tried this reign, Oates continued in priſon.

Hollaway executed. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 855. Burnet, p. 576. Kennet, p. 413. Echard, Vol. III. p. 713.

Theſe three, and ſome others (1), omited for brevity ſake, eſcaped with life, tho' properly condemned to perpetual impriſonment, as not being able to pay their exorbitant fines. But two others, who were out of the kingdom, did not come off ſo eaſy. James Holloway having ſeen his name in the Gazette among the conſpirators, who were to be apprehended by the King's proclamation, fled to the Weſt-Indies. Upon his flight, he had ſuffered an outlawry for high-treaſon, and this year the court hearing he was in the Weſt-Indies, cauſed him to be apprehended and brought to London, where he was executed upon the attainder of outlawry for treaſon. April 30.

and ſir Thomas Armſtrong. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 895. Kennet, p. 414. Burnet, p. 577.

The ſame thing happened to ſir Thomas Armſtrong, who had been conſidered as one of the principal authors of the laſt plot, and named in the King's proclamation with a reward of five hundred pounds. He had made his eſcape into Holland, and was outlawed as well as Holloway. The court hearing he was at Leyden, obtained an order from the States to apprehend him, and accordingly before he had notice, was apprehended and brought to Rotterdam, and from thence to London. When he appeared at the King's Bench-bar, he alleged that he was beyond ſea at the time of the outlawry, and begged that he might be tried. But his requeſt was abſolutely rejected, and the rather, as the attorney general told the court, from the King, that Armſtrong was one of the peſons who were to aſſaſſinate his Majeſty on his return from Newmarket, which the priſoner poſitively denied. He was executed the twentieth of June, and his head and quarters ſet up in ſeveral parts of the city. Only one was reſerved to be ſent down to Stafford, for which town he had been a burgeſs in parliament.

I do not think it needful to mention the trials, this year, of a great number of libellers, and perſons who had ſpoken againſt the King, the duke of York, or the government. In Echard's hiſtory I

(1) February 7, Laurence Braddon and Hugh Speke were tried for a miſdemeanor in ſuborning witneſſes to prove the earl of Eſſex was murdered by his keepers, for which the firſt was fined two thouſand pounds and the latter one thouſand pounds. —— February 14, ſir Samuel Barnadiſton was fined ten thouſand pounds for writing ſome letters about the plot. find thirty-two condemned in great fines, and ſome put in the pillory. The hiſtory of this year properly conſiſts of ſuch tranſactions only.

The King prevails to have the charters of the principal boroughs ſurrendered to him. Kennet, p. 415. R. Coke, p. 317. Echard, Vol. III. p. 720.

The whole nation being ſtruck with terror, the King believed he ought to improve it, to the eſtabliſhment of his abſolute power, ſo as to have nothing to fear from any future oppoſition. This was by depriving at once all the corporations, and conſequently all his ſubjects of their privileges. It was not proper to uſe abſolute power, but to proceed in a manner more politic and more dangerous to the people, by ingaging them to make a voluntary ſurrender of their charters in order to receive ſuch new ones as the King ſhould pleaſe to grant. To this end, courtiers and emiſſaries were ſent to the more conſiderable corporations, to inſpire them with terror, and intimate to them, that ſcarce one could eſcape, ſhould the King exerciſe ſtrict juſtice. This chiefly concerned the Whigs and Non-conformiſts, for the Tories were generally willing blindly to obey the pleaſure of the court. Jefferies particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his northern circuit at the ſummer aſſizes. He neglected nothing capable of terrifying the people, aſſuring them, that a ſurrender of their charters was the only way to avert the miſchiefs which hung over their heads. Other judges and emiſſaries did the ſame, and at length, the larger corporations being thus gained, the leſſer neceſſarily followed. So, a ſudden and great change was ſeen in England, viz. the Engliſh nation without rights or privileges, but ſuch as the King would vouchſafe to grant; and what is more ſtrange the Engliſh themſelves ſurrendered to Charles II, thoſe very rights and privileges which they had defended with ſo much paſſion, or rather fury, againſt the attempts of Charles I.

The King muſters his army. Octob. 1. p. 716.

To make the people in ſome meaſure ſenſible of their new ſlavery, the King affected to muſter his forces, which from one regiment of foot, and one troop of horſe guards (raiſed by himſelf, with the murmurs of many of his ſubjects) were increaſed to four thouſand compleatly trained and effective men. It might then be perceived that the members of parliament who oppoſed the raiſing, or at leaſt the eſtabliſhment of theſe guards, were not altogether in the wrong. But the zeal of the Tory party was now arrived to ſuch a pitch, that they looked on every thing which contributed to render the King abſolute, as a ſure means to ruin the Whigs, and conſequently as a triumph for them. They prepoſterouſly imagined, that the court only aimed at the deſtruction of that odious party, and was ſolely laboring for the Tories. Accordingly, we find ſtill ſome authors of this laſt party who repreſent the year 1684 as the moſt peaceable, the moſt quiet, and, in a word, the happieſt year England had ſeen for ſome ages. Nothing was capable to open the eyes of theſe paſſionate men, who, againſt all probability, believed the court well-affected both to the ſtate and the Proteſtant religion.

The Tories in raptures on the elevation of the King's power. Id. p. 721.

The King vacates the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion. p. 716. Phillips.

Nevertheleſs, the King did a thing this year by which they had reaſon to be undeceived. He diſſolved the commiſſion, granted in the year 1681, for the diſpoſal of all eccleſiaſtical preferments. As the eſtabliſhing this commiſſion was in order to perſuade his ſubjects, that he had the intereſt of the Proteſtant religion at heart, he could not avoid appointing ſuch commiſſioners as were believed to have the ſame ſentiments. But finding himſelf at length in the ſituation he had wiſhed for, this commiſſion was too great a reſtraint, and therefore he revoked it to fill the vacant benefices agreeably to his own inclinations.

Charles II. An' 1684.

It muſt not be concealed, that moſt hiſtorians aſcribe all the rigors exerciſed this year, and all the meaſures taken by the King for the advancement of his abſolute power, to the counſels of the duke his brother. That Prince had gained ſo great an aſcendant over his Majeſty, that he held him in a kind of ſubjection, and led him into meaſures productive of others, and ſo hurried him farther than the King intended. Beſide, that the King was naturally indolent, and loved his eaſe too much to ingage in any affairs capable of diſturbing his repoſe, he knew the genius and temper of the Engliſh, much better than the duke of York, and was ſenſible of the great difficulty in long preſerving a power acquired in ſo extraordinary a manner. But, on the contrary, after ſo many proceedings to ſecure this power, he knew not how to retreat, and could not alter his conduct, without breaking intirely with the duke, which muſt have extremely imbaraſſed him. He could not change his principles and maxims, without an intire alteration in his court and council, and without puting himſelf into the hands of men of very different principles. Beſide, his inclination did not lead him to it, and it was only this fear of doubting his quiet, which cauſed him to conſider the danger of his preſent proceedings. Mean time, as this danger was not yet near, and as all the kingdom appeared ſubmiſſive, he kept off the evil day, and delayed coming to any determination.

The duke of York blamed for the King's actions. Burnet, p. 582. Kennet, p. 415.

A ſtatute erected to the King. Stryp's Survey of London. The inſcription.

However this be, the Hamborough company, to gain the good will of a Prince, inveſted with ſuch power, erected a marble ſtatue to him in the middle of the Royal Exchange, with this pompous inſcription on the pedeſtal:

" CAROLO II, Cæſari Britannico, Patriæ " Patri, Regum Optimo, Clementiſſimo, Auguſt- " iſſimo, Generis humani Deliciis, Utriuſque For- " tunæ Victori, Pacis Europæ Arbitro, Maris " Domino & Vindici, Societas Mercatorum Ad- " ventur. The King abſolute.

Almoſt the whole month of January of the new year 1685, was ſpent either in proſecuting delinquents againſt the King and the duke, or in receiving the charters of the corporations, not yet ſurrendered, or in granting new ones on ſuch conditions as the court thought moſt proper. It may well be imagined, that theſe conditions were not prejudicial to the power acquired by the King. All complaints were ſuppreſſed, and the whole kingdom intirely ſubdued, the city of London not excepted, which had always oppoſed deſpotic power.

In a declaration he thanks the corporations for the ſurrender of their charters. Echard, Vol. III. p. 721.

The King now finding himſelf at the height of his wiſhes, was willing to do a popular act, and publiſhed a declaration, drawn up by dr. Sprat, in which, " he affectionately thanked his ſubjects for " their great confidence in him, chiefly for their ſo " freely reſigning their local immunities and charters " into his hands, leſt the abuſe of any of them " ſhould hereafter prove dangerous to the juſt pre- " rogatives of the crown. This, he declared, he " eſteemed as the peculiar honor of his reign, being " ſuch as none of the moſt popular of all his late " Royal predeceſſors could ever have hoped for. " Wherefore he thought himſelf more than ordi- " narily obliged to continue, as he had hitherto be- " gun, to ſhew the greateſt moderation and be- " nignity, in the exerciſe of ſo great a truſt: reſolv- " ing upon this occaſion, to convince the higheſt

He forms new projects. Burnet, p. 604. Welwood, p. 416.

Notwithſtanding all this, it is inſinuated, he had formed a project for an extraordinary change in the government: that he deſigned to recall the duke of Monmouth, to ſend the duke of York beyond ſea, and call a free parliament. This ſeems to have been founded on ſome paſſages in the duke of Monmouth's pocket book, ſeized with his perſon in the following reign. We are farther told, that the King had intimated, that if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himſelf eaſy for the reſt of his life (1). But he lived not to execute this deſign. He died the ſixth of February, fifty-four years of age, and twenty-five ſince his reſtoration. The cauſe of his death being variouſly reported, ſome thinking it natural, others violent, I believe what dr. Welwood ſays of it, is moſt inſtructive to the reader, who ſeems to have ſpoken of it with moſt impartiality.

He dies.

Extract out of dr. Welwood upon this ſubject, p. 121, &c.

" It is confeſſed, few Princes come to die a " ſudden death, but the world is apt to attribute " it to foul play; eſpecially if attended with un- " uſual circumſtances in the time and manner of " it.

" King Charles had a healthful conſtitution " beyond moſt men, and took great care to pre- " ſerve it, by diet and exerciſe, which naturally " promiſe a long life: and it was more extraordi- " nary to ſee ſuch a man die before threeſcore, " than another in the bloom of youth. Now, if " he died a natural death, it is agreed by all, that " it muſt have been an apoplexy. This diſeaſe " ſeizes all the vital faculties at once; and yet, for " the moſt part, does not only give ſome ſhort " warnings of its approach, by unuſual affections of " the head, but many times is occaſioned by ſome " evident preceding cauſe. In King Charles's " caſe, there appeared no viſible cauſe, either near " or remote, to which, with any certainty of " reaſon, his diſeaſe could be aſcribed; and the " fore-runners of it were rather to be found in his " ſtomach and bowels, than in the head. For, " after he was a bed, he was overheard to groan " moſt of the night: and both then, and next " morning, before he fell into the fit, he com- " plained firſt of a heavy oppreſſion in his ſtomach " and about his heart, and afterwards of a ſharp " pain in thoſe parts; all which ſymptoms had but " little relation to an apoplexy. That morning, " there appeared to every body about him, a ghaſt- " lineſs and paleneſs in his looks: and when he ſat " down to be ſhaved, juſt before the fit took him, " he could not ſit ſtrait, as he uſed to do, but " continued in a ſtooping poſture, with his hand " upon his ſtomach, till the fit came. After he " had been brought out of it, by opening a vein, " he complained of a racking pain in his ſtomach, " and of no indiſpoſition any where elſe: and " during the whole time of his ſickneſs, and even " when he ſeemed moſt inſenſible, he was ob- " ſerved to lay his hand, for the moſt part, upon " his ſtomach, in a moaning poſture, and conti- " nued ſo to his death: and ſo violent was the " pain, that when all hopes were gone, the phyſi- " cians were deſired to uſe all their art to procure " him an eaſy death. CHARLES II. AN' 1684.

" So much for the diſtemper itſelf. There re- " mains ſome things to be taken notice of, that fell " out before and after his death. A few days be- " fore he was taken ill, King Charles being in " company where the preſent poſture of affairs was " diſcourſed of, there eſcaped him ſome warm " expreſſions, about the uneaſy circumſtances he " was plunged into, and the ill-meaſures had been " given him: and how, in a certain particular " affair, he was pleaſed to mention, 'He had been " abuſed', adding in ſome paſſion, 'That if he " lived but a month longer, he would find a way " to make himſelf eaſy for the reſt of his life.' " This paſſage was whiſpered abroad next day; " and the rumor of recalling the duke of Mon- " mouth, and ſending away the duke of York, " came to take air about the ſame time. Indeed, " all things were making ready, to put the latter " in execution; and there is reaſon to believe, the " King had intimated as much to the duke himſelf; " for ſome of his richeſt furniture was put up, and " his chief ſervants ordered to be in readineſs to " attend their maſter upon an hours warning; and " yachts were waiting, to tranſport ſome perſons " of quality, without mentioning who it was, or " whither bound. The Romiſh party that ma- " naged about court, were obſerved to be more " then ordinary diligent and buſy up and down " Whitehall and St. James's, as if ſome very im- " portant affair was in agitation; and a new and " unuſual concern was to be ſeen on their counte- " nances. Nor was it any wonder, for in this ſuſ- " ſpected change, they were like to be the only " loſers, and all their teeming hopes were in a fair " way to be diſappointed. How far the principles " of ſome of that party might leave them at liberty " to puſh on their revenge for this deſigned affront, " as well as to prevent the blow that threatened " them, tho' without the privity, much leſs the " conſent of the duke of York, is left to the reader " to judge.

" There was a foreign miniſter, that ſome days " before the King fell ill, ordered his ſteward to " buy a conſiderable parcel of black cloth, which " ſerved him and his retinue after for mourning: " and the late embaſſador Don Pedro Ronquillo, " made it no ſecret, that he had a letter from Flan- " ders the week before King Charles died, that " took notice of his death, as the news there. But " both theſe might fall out by mere accident.

" There remain two things more that deſerve " ſome conſideration in this matter. When his body " was opened, there was not ſufficient time given " for taking an exact obſervation of his ſtomach and " bowels; which, one would think, ought chiefly " to have been done, conſidering the violent pains " he had there: and when a certain phyſician " ſeemed to be more inquiſitive than ordinary about " the condition of thoſe parts, he was taken aſide,

(1) Of this new ſcheme Burnet gives this account. There was at this time a new ſcheme formed, that very probably would have for ever broken the King and duke.——It was laid at the lady Portſmouth's. Barillon, lord Sunderland, and lord Godolphin were in it. The duke of Monmouth came over ſecretly. And tho' he did not ſee the King, yet he went back very well pleaſed with his journey.——The deſign was to begin with the ſending the duke of York to Scotland.——The King ſpoke to the duke concerning his going to Scotland: and he anſwered, there was no occaſion for it. Upon which the King replied, that either the duke muſt go, or that he himſelf muſt go thither.——The King was obſerved to be colder and more reſerved to the duke than ordinary. But what was under all this was ſtill a deep ſecret. Lord Hallifax was let into no part of it. He complained in council againſt lord Rocheſter, that there were many razures in the books of the treaſury, and moved the King to go to the treaſury chamber. So the King named the next Monday And mr. May was ſent for from Windſor, to come to court that day, which it was expected would prove a critical day. And it proved ſo indeed, tho' in a different way; the King being taken ill in the mean while. p. 604, 606.

" and reproved for his needleſs curioſity. In the " next place, his body ſtunk ſo extremely, within " a few hours after his death, notwithſtanding the " coldneſs of the ſeaſon, that the people about " him were extremely offended with the ſmell: " which is a thing very extraordinary, in one of " his ſtrong and healthful conſtitution; and is not " a proper conſequence of a mere apoplectical diſ- " temper.

" There was ſome weight laid upon an accident " that fell out at Windſor ſome years before his " death: for the King drinking more liberally than " uſual, after the fatigue of riding, he retired to " the next room, and wrapping himſelf up in his " cloak, fell aſleep upon a couch. He was but a " little time come back to the company, when a " ſervant belonging to one of them, lay down upon " the ſame couch in the King's cloak, and was " found ſtabbed dead with a poynard. Nor was " it ever known how it happened, but the matter " huſhed up, and no inquiry made about it.

" To conclude, dr. Short, who was a man of " great probity and learning, and a Roman Ca- " tholic, made no ſcruple to declare his opinion to " ſome of his intimate friends, that he believed " King Charles had foul play done him: and " when he came to die himſelf, expreſſed ſome " ſuſpicion that he had met with the ſame treat- " ment, for opening his mind too freely in that " point.

" So much for the circumſtances of King " Charles's death, that ſeem to have an ill aſpect; " there are others, that ſeem to deſtroy all ſuſpi- " cion of treachery in the matter.

" As, firſt, He had lived ſo faſt, as might ener- " vate, in a great meaſure, the natural force of " his conſtitution, and exhauſt his animal ſpirits; " and therefore he might be more ſubject to an " apoplexy, which is a diſeaſe that weakens and " locks up theſe ſpirits from performing their uſual " functions. And tho', in his later years, he had " given himſelf up more to the pleaſures of wine, " than of women; that might rather be the effect " of age than of choice.

" Next it is known, he had been once or twice " attacked before, with fits that much reſembled " thoſe of which he afterwards died: and yet, as " the manner of them is told, they look rather to " have been convulſive motions, than an apoplexy; " ſeeing they were attended with violent contor- " ſions of his face, and convulſions of his whole " body and limbs. This is the more confirmed, " by a paſſage, that happened during the heat of " the Popiſh plot. King Charles had ſome ſecret " matters to manage at that time, by the means " of a Romiſh prieſt then beyond ſea, whom he " ordered to be privately ſent for: and the gentle- " man imployed betwixt the King and him (from " whom I had the ſtory) was directed to bring him " in a diſguiſe to Whitehall. The King and the " prieſt were a conſiderable time together alone " in the cloſet, and the gentleman attended in the " next room: at laſt, the prieſt came out, with " all the marks of fright and aſtoniſhment in his " face; and having recovered himſelf a little, he " told the gentleman, that he had run the greateſt " riſque ever man did; for while he was with the " King, his Majeſty was ſuddenly ſurpriſed with " a fit, accompanied with violent convulſions of " his body, and contorſions of his face, which " laſted for ſome moments; and when he was " going to call out for help, the King held him " by force till it was over, and then bid him not " be afraid, for he had been troubled with the like " before; the prieſt adding, what a condition he " ſhould have been in, conſidering his religion, " and the preſent juncture of affairs, if the King " had died of that fit, and no body in the room " with him beſide himſelf. Charles II. An' 1684.

" But leaving this ſtory to the credit of the " prieſt, there might be another natural cauſe " aſſigned for King Charles's falling into ſuch a fit " as that of which he died, which is this; he had " for ſome time an iſſue in his leg, which ran " much, and conſequently muſt have made a great " revulſion from his head; upon which account, it " is probable, it was made. A few weeks before " his death, he had let it be dried up, contrary to " the advice of his phyſicians, who told him it " would prejudice his health. Their prognoſtic " was partly true in this, that there came a pain- " ful tumor upon the place where the iſſue had " been, which proved very obſtinate, and was not " thoroughly healed up when he died.

" In fine, it is agreed on all hands, that King " Charles expreſſed no ſuſpicion of his being poi- " ſened, during all the time of his ſickneſs: tho' " it muſt be alſo obſerved, that the fits were ſo " violent, that he could not ſpeak while they were " upon him, and ſhewed an averſion to ſpeaking " during the intervals. And there was not any " thing to be ſeen, upon opening his body, that " could reaſonably be attributed to the force of " poiſon. Yet, to allow theſe conſiderations no " more weight than they can well bear, this muſt " be acknowleged, that there are poiſons which " affect originally the animal ſpirits, and are of ſo " ſubtle a nature, that they leave no concluding " marks upon the bodies of thoſe they kill."

Let us now ſee what dr. Burnet ſays upon this ſubject, in his Hiſtory of his own Times. As this hiſtory is not yet tranſlated, or at leaſt publiſhed in French, I believe it will not be unacceptable to foreigners, to inſert here that famous prelate's account of the death of Charles II.

" All this winter the King looked better than " he had done for many years. He had a humor " in his leg, which looked like the begining of the " gout: ſo that for ſome weeks he could not " walk, as he uſed to do generally, three or four " hours a day in the park; which he did com- " monly ſo faſt that as it was really an exerciſe " to himſelf, ſo it was a trouble to all about him " to hold up with him. In the ſtate the King was " in, he not being able to walk, ſpent much of his " time in his laboratory, and was runing a proceſs " for the fixing of Mercury. On the firſt of Fe- " bruary, being a Sunday, he eat little all day, and " came to lady Portſmouth at night, and called for " a porringer of ſpoon meat. It was made too " ſtrong for his ſtomach; ſo he eat little of it: " and he had an unquiet night. In the morning " one dr. King, a phyſician and a chymiſt, came, " as he had been ordered, to wait on him. All " the King's diſcourſe to him was ſo broken, that " he could not underſtand what he meaned. And " the doctor concluded, he was under ſome great " diſorder, either in his mind, or in his body. " The doctor, amazed at this, went out, and " meeting with lord Peterborough, he ſaid, the " King was in a ſtrange humor, for he did not " ſpeak one word of ſenſe. Lord Peterborough " deſired he would go in again to the bed-chamber, " which he did. And he was ſcarce come in, " when the King, who ſeemed all the while to be in " great confuſion, fell down all of a ſudden in a fit " like an apoplexy: he looked black, and his eyes " turned in his head. The phyſician, who had " been formerly an eminent ſurgeon, ſaid, it was " impoſſible to ſave the King's life, if one minute " was loſt: he would rather venture on the rigor " of the law, then leave the King to periſh; and " ſo he let him blood.——The King came out " of that fit, yet the effects of it hung ſtill upon " him Extract of dr. Burnet's Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 606. &c.

" him, ſo that he was much oppreſſed. And the " phyſician did very much apprehend the return of " another fit, and that it would carry him off: ſo " they looked on him as a dead man. The biſhop " of London ſpoke a little to him, to diſpoſe " him to prepare for whatever might be before " him; to which the King anſwered not a word. " But that was imputed partly to the biſhop's " cold way of ſpeaking, and partly to the ill opi- " nion they had of him at court, as too buſy in " oppoſition to Popery. Sancroft made a very " weighty exhortation to him; in which he uſed " a good degree of freedom, which he ſaid was " neceſſary, ſince he was going to be judged by " one who was no reſpecter of perſons. To him " the King made no anſwer neither; nor yet to " Ken, tho' the moſt in favor with him of all " the biſhops. Some imputed this to an inſenſibi- " lity, of which too viſible an inſtance appeared, " ſince lady Portſmouth ſat in the bed, taking " care of him as a wife of a huſband. Others " gueſſed truer; that it would appear he was of " another religion. On Thurſday a ſecond fit re- " turned. And then the phyſicians told the duke, " that the King was not like to live a day to an end.

" The duke immediately ordered Hudleſton, " the prieſt that had a great hand in ſaving the " King at Worceſter fight (for which he was ex- " cepted out of all ſevere acts that were made " againſt prieſts) to be brought to the lodgings " under the bed chamber: and when he was told " what was to be done, he was in great confuſion, " for he had no Hoſtie about him. But he went " to another prieſt that lived in the court, who gave " him the Pix with an Hoſtie in it. But that poor " prieſt was ſo frightened, that he ran out of " Whitehall in ſuch haſte, that he ſtruck againſt a " poſt, and ſeemed to be in a fit of madneſs with " fear. As ſoon as Hudelſton had prepared every " thing that was neceſſary, the duke whiſpered " the King in the ear, upon that the King ordered, " that all who was in the bed chamber ſhould with- " draw, except the earls of Bath and Feverſham; " and the door was double locked. The company " was kept out half an hour: only lord Feverſham " opened the door once, and called for a glaſs of " water. Cardinal Howard told me at Rome, " that Hudelſton, according to the relation that he " ſent thither, made the King go thro' ſome acts " of contrition, and, after ſuch a confeſſion as he " could then make, he gave him abſolution, and " the other ſacraments. The Hoſtie ſtuck in his " throat: and that was the occaſion of calling for " a glaſs of water. He alſo gave him Extreme Un- " ction. All muſt have been performed very ſuper- " ficially, ſince it was ſo ſoon ended. But the " King ſeemed to be at great eaſe upon it. It was " given out, that the King ſaid to Hudelſton, " that he had ſaved him twice, firſt his body and " now his ſoul; and that he aſked him, if he " would have him declare himſelf to be of their " church. But it ſeems, he was prepared for this, " and ſo diverted the King from it; and ſaid, he " took it upon him to ſatisfy the world in that " particular. But tho' by the principles of all re- " ligions whatſoever, he ought to have obliged him " to make open profeſſion of his religion; yet, it " ſeems, the conſequence of that was apprehended; " for, without doubt, that poor prieſt acted by the " directions that were given him. The company " was ſuffered to come in. And the King went " thro' the agonies of death, with a calm and a " conſtancy, that amazed all who were about him, " and knew how he had lived. This made ſome " conclude, he had made a will, and that his quiet " was the effect of that. Ken applied himſelf " much to the awaking the King's conſcience.

" He ſpoke with a great elevation, both of " thought and expreſſion, like a man inſpired, as " thoſe who were preſent told me. He reſumed " the matter often, and pronounced many ſhort " ejaculations and prayers, which affected all that " were preſent, except him that was the moſt " concerned, who ſeemed to take no notice of " him, and made no anſwer to him. He " preſſed the King ſix or ſeven times to receive " the ſacrament; but the King always declined it, " ſaying, he was very weak. A table with the " elements upon it, ready to be conſecrated, was " brought into the room, which occaſioned a " report to be then ſpread about, that he had re- " ceived it. Ken preſſed him to declare, that he " deſired it, and that he died in the communion " of the church of England. To that he anſwered " nothing. Ken aſked him, if he deſired abſolu- " tion of his ſins. It ſeems the King, if he then " thought any thing at all, thought that would do " him no hurt. So Ken pronounced it over him: " for which he was blamed, ſince the King ex- " preſſed no ſenſe, or ſorrow for his paſt life, nor " any purpoſe of amendment. It was thought to " be a proſtitution of the peace of the church, to " give it to one, who, after a life led as the King's " had been, ſeemed to harden himſelf againſt every " thing that could be ſaid to him. Ken was alſo " cenſured for another piece of indecency: he " preſented the duke of Richmond, lady Portſ- " mouth's ſon, to be bleſſed by the King. Upon " this, ſome that were in the room cried out, the " King was their common father. And upon that " all kneeled down for his bleſſing, which he gave " them. The King ſuffered much inwardly, and " ſaid, he was burnt up within; of which he com- " plained often, but with great decency. He ſaid " once, he hoped he ſhould climb up to heaven's " gates, which was the only word ſavoring of re- " ligion that he was heard to ſpeak.

" He gathered all his ſtrength to ſpeak his laſt " words to the duke, to which every one heark- " ened with great attention. He expreſſed his " kindneſs to him, and that he now delivered all " over to him with great joy. He recommended " lady Portſmouth over and over again to him. " He ſaid, he had always loved her, and he loved " her now to the laſt; and beſought the duke, in " as melting words as he could fetch out, to be " very kind to her and to her ſon. He recom- " mended his other children to him: and con- " cluded, let not poor Nelly ſtarve, that was mrs. " Gwyn. But he ſaid nothing of the Queen nor " any one word of his people, or of his ſervants: " nor did he ſpeak one word of religion, or concern- " ing the payment of his debts, tho' he left behind " him about ninety thouſand guineas, which he had " gathered either out of the privy purſe, or out of " the money which was ſent him from France, or " by other methods, and which he had kept ſo ſe- " cretly, that no perſon whatſoever knew any " thing of it.

" He continued in the agony till Friday about " eleven o'clock, being the ſixth of February " 1684-5; and then died in the fifty-fourth year " of his age, after he had reigned, if we reckon " from his father's death, thirty-ſix years and " eight days; or if we reckon from his reſtoration, " twenty-four years, eight months, and nine days. " There were many very apparent ſuſpicions of his " being poiſoned: for tho' the firſt acceſs looked " like an apoplexy, yet it was plain in the progreſs " of it, that it was no apoplexy. When his body " was opened, the phyſicians, who viewed it, " were, as it were, led by thoſe, who might ſuſ- " pect the truth, to look upon the parts that " were certainly ſound. But both Lower, and

Charles II. An' 1684.

" Nedham, two famous phyſicians, told me, they " plainly diſcerned two or three blue ſpots on the " out ſide of the ſtomach. Needham called twice " to have it opened, but the ſurgeon ſeemed not " to hear him. And when he moved it the ſecond " time, he, as he told me, heard Lower ſay to " one that ſtood next him, Needham will undo " us, calling thus to have the ſtomach opened; for " he may ſee they will not do it: they were di- " verted to look to ſomewhat elſe: and when they " returned to look upon the ſtomach it was carried " away: ſo that it was never viewed. Le Fevre " a French phyſician, told me, he ſaw a blackneſs " in his ſhoulder: upon which he made an inciſion, " and ſaw it was all mortified. Short, another " phyſician, who was a Papiſt, but after a form of " his own, did very much ſuſpect foul dealing. And " he had talked more freely of it, than any of the " Proteſtants durſt do at that time. But he was " not long after taken ſuddenly ill, upon a large " draught of wormwood wine, which he had drank " in the houſe of a Popiſh patient that lived near " the Tower, who had ſent for him, of which " he died; and, as he ſaid to Lower, Millington, " and ſome other phyſicians, he believed that he " himſelf was poiſoned for his having ſpoken ſo " freely of the King's death.

" The King's body was indecently neglected; " ſome parts of his inwards, and ſome pieces of " the fat, were left in the water in which they " were waſhed: all which were ſo careleſly looked " after, that the water being poured out at a ſcul- " lery hole, that went to a drain, in the mouth of " which a grate lay, theſe were ſeen lying on the " grate many days after. His funeral was very " mean. He did not lie in ſtate; no mournings " were given: and the expenſe of it was not equal " to what an ordinary nobleman's funeral will riſe " to. Many upon this ſaid, that he better deſerved " from his brother, than to be thus ungratefully " treated in ceremonies that are public, and that " make an impreſſion on thoſe who ſee them, and " who will make ſevere obſervations and inferences " upon ſuch omiſſions.

" But ſince I have mentioned the ſuſpicions of " poiſon as the cauſe of his death, I muſt add, that " I never heard any lay thoſe ſuſpicions on his " brother. But his dying ſo critically, as it were " in the minute in which he ſeemed to begin a turn " of affairs, made it to be generally the more be- " lieved, and that the Papiſts had done it, either " by the means of ſome of lady Portſmouth's ſer- " vants, or, as ſome fancied, by poiſoned ſnuff: " for ſo many of the ſmall veins of the brain were " burſt, that the brain was in great diſorder, and " no judgment could be made concerning it. To " this I ſhall add a very ſurpriſing ſtory, that I " had in November 1709, from mr. Henly of " Hampſhire. He told me, that when the ducheſs " of Portſmouth came over to England in 1699, " he heard, that ſhe talked as if King Charles had " been poiſoned; which he deſiring to have from " her own mouth, ſhe gave him this account of " it: ſhe was always preſſing the King to make " both himſelf and his people eaſy, and to come to " a full agreement with his parliament: and he " was come to a final reſolution of ſending away " his brother, and of calling a parliament; which " was to be executed the next day after he fell " into that fit of which he died. She was put upon " the ſecret, and ſpoke of it to no perſon alive but " to her confeſſor: but the confeſſor, ſhe believed " told it to ſome, who ſeeing what was to follow, " took that wicked courſe to prevent it. Having " this from ſo worthy a perſon, as I have ſet it " down, without adding the leaſt circumſtance to it: " I thought it too important not to be mentioned " in this hiſtory. It diſcovers both the knavery " of confeſſors, and the practiſes of Papiſts ſo evi- " dently, that there is no need of making any far- " ther reflections on it."

Charles II. An' 1683.

Theſe two accounts of the death of King Charles II, agree in the principal circumſtances, particularly in the ſuſpicion of his being poiſoned. Several other relations have been given of his death, in which are inſerted circumſtances not to be met with here, and others omited which are here ſpecified. It is ſaid, that at the perſuaſion of biſhop Ken, the King at length reſolved to diſmiſs the ducheſs of Portſmouth, and ſending for the Queen, aſked her pardon for the injury he had done her. It is added, that he received the ſatisfaction of her particular forgiveneſs. This directly contradicts dr. Burnet's account of the ducheſs of Portſmouth. Some ſay, Hudleſton was not brought to the King till he had loſt all ſenſe, and that he received the ſacrament of Extreme Unction, without giving the leaſt ſign either of his approbation or refuſal. It is pretended, he adviſed the duke his brother, not to think of introducing Popery into England, becauſe it was an undertaking impracticable. Laſtly, ſome ſay only, that the phyſicians and ſurgeons inſpecting the body, diſcovered no marks of poiſon, and intirely omit the circumſtances of the ſtomach, mentioned in the two foregoing relations, tho' they own the ſuſpicion of the King's being poiſoned, but repreſent this ſuſpicion as coming from the enemies of the duke, and of the Papiſts.

Remark.

It is univerſally agreed, that no man had the boldneſs to accuſe the duke of poiſoning his brother: but it is not to be concluded from thence, that no man believed it. Thoſe who might have entertained this ſuſpicion, took care not to expoſe themſelves to a danger ſo great as that of accuſing the ſucceſſor, without being able to prove it. The Papiſts in general are accuſed, but this is ſo undeterminate a word, that one knows not to whom to apply it, when they are ſeparated from the duke of York their head. Beſide, the inſpection of the dead body was managed in a proper way to diſpel all ſuſpicions of poiſon; but who directed the phyſicians or ſurgeons is a ſecret, at leaſt the brother of the deceaſed does not appear to have concerned himſelf much in this inſpection, tho' the ſuſpicions of poiſon were very violent. All this creates ſuch an obſcurity which leaves every man room to judge as he pleaſes. Thus much is certain, there is no formal proof that King Charles II was poiſoned; or if he was, the authors of his death remain hitherto concealed.

A remark on the character of Charles II.

It is not very ſurpriſing that the hiſtorians, or others, ſhould diſagree in their character of Charles II, when it is conſidered, that he was the head and protector of one of the two parties, and the perſecutor of the other. This muſt have neceſſarily produced a diverſity of characters, according as they are given by Tories or Whigs. When we read ſucceſſively the writers of the two parties, who have ſpoken of this Prince in general, or given his character, we are almoſt apt to think, they ſpeak of two different Kings bearing the ſame name. The one by ſeveral omiſſions indeavor to cover all his faults, or, if they are mentioned, it is very ſlightly, and never without ſome addition or inſinuation tending to juſtify them. The others inſiſt chiefly upon what may blacken his character, and ſhow, that he acted on very ill motives, and on principles directly contrary to the good of the kingdom. If they ſpeak of his good qualities, it is only to render him more criminal, and demonſtrate that he tranſgreſſed not thro' ignorance, but with premeditation. Which way ſoever I take to draw the character of this Prince, I cannot avoid the cenſure of one or the other party, if I ſpeak as from myſelf; and I ſhould not gain much in going upon the teſtimony of either party. However, as the reader, doubtleſs, expects to know ſomething more of the character of this King, than could be learned from the hiſtory of his reign, I chuſe to inſert dr. Burnet's account in the Hiſtory of his own Times. I own this, of all the characters of Charles II, ſeems to me, in the whole, to be moſt like, and moſt agreeable to the hiſtory of his life. I could wiſh however, this illuſtrious prelate had omited, or at leaſt ſoftened ſome ſtrokes, which appear to me a little over-charged, and ſeem to diſcover ſome paſſion in the author. However that be, he concludes the hiſtory of this Prince in the following manner:

Vol. I. p. 611.

"Thus lived and died King Charles the ſecond. "He was the greateſt inſtance in hiſtory of the va- "rious revolutions of which any one man ſeemed "capable. He was bred up the firſt twelve years "of his life with the ſplendor that became the heir "of ſo great a crown. After that he paſſed thro' "eighteen years in great inequalities, unhappy in "the war, in the loſs of his father, and of the "crown of England. Scotland did not only re- "ceive him, tho' upon terms hard of digeſtion, "but made an attempt upon England for him, tho' "a feeble one. He loſt the battle of Worceſter "with too much indifference: and then he ſhewed "more care of his perſon than became one, who "had ſo much at ſtake. He wandered about "England for ten weeks after that, hiding from "place to place. But under all the apprehenſions "he had then upon him, he ſhewed a temper ſo "careleſs, and ſo much turned to levity, that he "was then diverting himſelf with little houſhold "ſports, in as unconcerned a manner as if he had "made no loſs, and had been in no danger at all. "He got at laſt out of England. But he had "been obliged to ſo many, who had been faith- "ful to him and careful of him, that he ſeemed "afterwards to reſolve to make an equal return to "them all. And finding it not eaſy to reward "them all as they deſerved, he forgot them all "alike. Moſt Princes ſeem to have this pretty "deep in them; and to think that they ought ne- "ver to remember paſt ſervices, but that their "acceptance of them is a full reward. He of all "in our age, exerted this piece of prerogative "in the ampleſt manner: for he never ſeemed to "charge his memory, or to trouble his thoughts "with the ſenſe of any of the ſervices that had been "done him. While he was abroad at Paris, "Colen, or Bruſſels, he never ſeemed to lay any "thing to heart. He purſued all his diverſions "and irregular pleaſures in a free career; and "ſeemed to be as ſerene under the loſs of a crown "as the greateſt philoſopher could have been. Nor "did he willingly hearken to any of thoſe pro- "jects, with which he often complained that his "chancellor perſecuted him. That in which he "ſeemed moſt concerned was, to find money for "ſupporting his expenſe. And it was often ſaid, "that if Cromwell would have compounded the "matter, and have given him a good round pen- "ſion, that he might have been induced to reſign "his title to him. During his exile he de- "livered himſelf ſo intirely up to his pleaſures, that "he became incapable of application. He ſpent "little of his time in reading, or ſtudy, and yet "leſs in thinking. And in the ſtate his affairs "were then in, he accuſtomed himſelf to ſay to "every perſon, and upon all occaſions, that which "he thought would pleaſe moſt: ſo that words "or promiſes went very eaſily from him. And "he had ſo ill an opinion of mankind, that he "thought the great art of living and governing was, "to manage all things and all perſons, with a depth "of craft and diſſimulation. And in that, few "men in the world could put on the appearances "of ſincerity better than he could: under which "ſo much artifice was uſually hid, that in con- "cluſion he could deceive none, for all were be- "come miſtruſtful of him. He had great vices, "but ſcarce any virtues to correct them. He had "in him ſome vices that were leſs hurtful, which "corrected his more hurtful ones. He was, during "the active part of his life, given up to ſloth and "leudneſs to ſuch a degree, that he hated buſineſs, "and could not bear the ingaging in any thing "that gave him much trouble, or put him under "any conſtraint. And tho' he deſired to become "abſolute, and to overturn both our religion and "our laws, yet he would neither run the riſk, nor "give himſelf the trouble, which ſo great a de- "ſign required. He had an appearance of gentle- "neſs in his outward deportment: but he ſeemed "to have no bowels nor tenderneſs in his nature: "and in the end of his life he became cruel. He "was apt to forgive all crimes even blood itſelf: "yet he never forgave any thing that was done "againſt himſelf, after his firſt and general act of "indemnity, which was to be reckoned as done "rather upon maxims of ſtate, than inclinations "of mercy. He delivered himſelf up to a moſt "enormous courſe of vice, without any ſort of "reſtraint, even from the conſideration of the "neareſt relations; the moſt ſtudied extravagan- "cies that way ſeemed to the very laſt to be much "delighted in, and purſued by him. He had the "art of making all people grow fond of him at "firſt, by a ſoftneſs in his whole way of converſa- "tion, as he was certainly the beſt bred man of "the age. But when it appeared how little could "be built on his promiſe, they were cured of the "fondneſs that he was apt to raiſe in them. When "he ſaw young men of quality, who had ſome- "thing more than ordinary in them, he drew them "about him, and ſet himſelf to corrupt them both "in religion and morality; in which he proved "ſo unhappily ſucceſsful, that he left England much "changed at his death, from what he had found "it at his reſtoration. He loved to talk over all the "ſtories of his life to every new man that came "about him. His ſtay in Scotland, and the ſhare "he had in the war of Paris, in carrying meſſages "from the one ſide to the other, were his com- "mon topics. He went over theſe in a very grace- "ful manner; but ſo often, and copiouſly, that all "thoſe who had been long accuſtomed to them "grew weary of them: and when he entered on "thoſe ſtories, they uſually withdrew: ſo that he "often began them in a full audience, and before "he had done, there were not above four or five "left about him; which drew a ſevere jeſt from "Willmot earl of Rocheſter. He ſaid, 'He "wondered to ſee a man have ſo good a memory, "as to repeat the ſame ſtory without loſing the "leaſt circumſtance, and yet not remember that he "had told it to the ſame perſons the very day be- "fore.' This made him fond of ſtrangers; for "they hearkened to all his often repeated ſtories, "and went away as in a rapture, at ſuch an un- "common condeſcenſion in a King.

"His perſon and temper, his vices as well as his "fortune reſemble the character that we have given "us of Tiberius, ſo much, that it were eaſy to "draw a parallel between them. Tiberius's ba- "niſhment, and his coming afterwards to reign, "makes the compariſon in that reſpect come pretty "near. His hating of buſineſs, and his love of "pleaſures; his raiſing of favorites, and truſting "them entirely, and his pulling them down, and "hating them exceſſively; his art of covering "deep deſigns, particularly of revenge, with an "appearance of ſoftneſs, brings them ſo near a "likeneſs,

" likeneſs, that I did not wonder much to obſerve " the reſemblance of their face and perſon. At Rome " I ſaw one of the laſt ſtatues made for Tiberius " after he had loſt his teeth. But, bating the al- " teration which that made, it was ſo like King " Charles, that Prince Borgheſe and Signior " Dominico to whom it belonged, did agree with " me in thinking that it looked like a ſtatute made " for him.

" Few things ever went near his heart; the duke " of Gloceſter's death ſeemed to touch him " much. But thoſe who knew him beſt thought " it was, becauſe he had loſt him, by whom only " he could have balanced the ſurviving brother, " whom he hated, and yet imbroiled all his affairs " to preſerve the ſucceſſion to him.

" His ill conduct in the firſt Dutch war, and " thoſe terrible calamities of the plague, and fire " of London, with that loſs and reproach which " he ſuffered by the inſult at Chatham, made all " people conclude, there was a curſe upon his go- " vernment. His throwing the public hatred at " that time upon lord Clarendon, was both unjuſt " and ungrateful. And when his pleople had " brought him out of all his difficulties, upon his " entering into the triple alliance, his ſelling that " to France, and his entering on the ſecond Dutch " war with as little color as he had for the firſt; " his begining it with the attempt on the Dutch " Smyrna fleet; the ſhuting up the Exchequer; " and his declaration for toleration, which was a " ſtep for the introduction of Popery; make ſuch " a chain of black actions flowing from blacker " deſigns, that it amazed thoſe who had known " all this, to ſee with what impudent ſtrains of " flattery addreſſes were pened during his life, and " yet more groſly after his death. His contri- " buting ſo much to the raiſing the greatneſs of " France, chiefly at ſea, was ſuch an error, that it " could not flow for want of thought or of true " ſenſe. Rouvigny told me, he deſired that all " the methods the French took in the increaſe and " conduct of their naval force might be ſent him. " And, he ſaid, he ſeemed to ſtudy them with " concern and zeal. He ſhewed what errors they " commited, and how they ought to be corrected, " as if he had been a viceroy to France, ra- " ther than a King that ought to have watched " over, and prevented the progreſs they made, as " the greateſt of all the miſchiefs that could hap- " pen to him or to his people. They that judged " the moſt favorable of this, thought it was done " out of revenge to the Dutch, that, with the " aſſiſtance of ſo great a fleet as France could " join to his own, he might be able to deſtroy " them. But others put a worſe conſtruction on " it; and thought, that ſeeing he could not quite " maſter or deceive his ſubjects by his own ſtrength " and management, he was willing to help for- " ward the greatneſs of the French at ſea, that by " their aſſiſtance he might more certainly ſubdue " his own people; according to what was gene- " rally believed to have fallen from lord Clifford, " 'That if the King muſt be in a dependence, it " was better to pay it to a great and generous " King, than to five hundred of his own inſolent " ſubjects.' No part of his character looked " wickeder as well as meaner, than that he, all " the while that he was profeſſing to be of the " church of England, expreſſing both zeal and " affection to it, was yet ſecretly reconciled to the " church of Rome: thus mocking God, and de- " ceiving the world with ſo groſs a prevarication. " And his not having the honeſty or courage to " own it at the laſt: his not ſhewing any ſign of " the leaſt remorſe for his ill led life, or any ten- " derneſs either for his ſubjects in general, or for " the Queen and his ſervants: and his recommend- " ing only his miſtreſſes and their children to his " brother's care, would have been a ſtrange con- " cluſion to any other life, but was well enough " ſuited to all the other parts of his.

Charles II. An' 1684.

" The two papers found in his ſtrong-box con- " cerning religion, and afterwards publiſhed by his " brother, looked like ſtudy and reaſoning. Ten- " niſon told me, he ſaw the original in Pepy's " hand, to whom King James truſted them for " ſome time. They were interlined in ſeveral " places. And the interlinings ſeemed to be writ " in a hand different from that in which the papers " were writ. But he was not ſo well acquainted " with the King's hand, as to make any judgment " in the matter, whether they were writ by him or " not. All that knew him when they read them, " did, without any ſort of doubting, conclude, that " he never compoſed them: for he never read the " ſcriptures, nor laid things together, further " than to turn them to a jeſt, or for ſome lively " expreſſion. Theſe papers were probably writ " either by lord Briſtol, or lord Aubigny, who " knew the ſecret of his religion, and gave him " thoſe papers, as abſtracts of ſome diſcourſes " they had with him on thoſe heads, to keep him " fixed to them. And it is very probable, that " they apprehending their danger, if any ſuch pa- " pers had been found about him writ in their " hand, might prevail with him to copy them out " himſelf, tho' his lazineſs that way made it cer- " tainly no eaſy thing to bring him to give him- " ſelf ſo much trouble. He had talked over a " great part of them to myſelf: ſo that as ſoon as " I ſaw them, I remembered his expreſſions, and " perceived that he had made himſelf maſter of " the argument, as far as thoſe papers could carry " him. But the publiſhing them ſhewed a want of " judgment, or of regard to his memory in thoſe " who did it: for the greateſt kindneſs that could " be ſhewn to his memory, would have been, to " let both his papers and himſelf be forgotten."

After ſeeing in this character, all that can be ſaid to the diſadvantage of Charles II, the reader doubt- leſs will not be diſpleaſed to behold the picture of the ſame Prince, drawn a little differently by a very able hand, I mean * the earl of Mulgrave, who was no enemy to the King, or Royal family. He has labored this deſcription with all poſſible care, I omit a ſhort introduction concerning the author, to come at once to the character of the King.

* John Sheffield.

" As to the King's religion, it was more Deiſm " than Popery; which he owed more to the live- " lineſs of his parts and careleſſneſs of his temper, " than either to reading, or much conſideration; " for his quickneſs of apprehenſion, at firſt view, " could diſcern thro' the ſeveral cheats of pious " pretenſes; and his natural lazineſs confirmed " him in an equal miſtruſt of them all, for fear " he ſhould be troubled with examining which re- " ligion was beſt. If in his early travels, and late " adminiſtration, he ſeemed a little biaſſed to one " ſort of religion; the firſt is only to be imputed " to a certain eaſineſs of temper, and a com- " plaiſance for that company he then was forced " to keep; and the laſt was no more than his be- " ing tired (which he ſoon was in any difficulty) " with thoſe bold oppoſitions in parliament, which " made him almoſt throw himſelf into the arms of " a Roman Catholic party, ſo remarkable in Eng- " land for their loyalty, who imbraced him glad- " ly, and lulled him aſleep with thoſe enchanting " ſongs of abſolute Sovereignty, which the beſt " and wiſeſt of Princes are often unable to reſiſt. " And tho' he ingaged himſelf on that ſide more " fully, at a time when it is in vain and too late " to diſſemble, we ought leſs to wonder at it, than

" to conſider that our very judgments are apt to " grow in time as partial as our affections: and " thus, by accident only, he became of their opinion " in his weakneſs, who had ſo much indeavored " always to contribute to his power. He loved " eaſe and quiet; to which his unneceſſary wars " are ſo far from being a contradiction, that they are " rather a proof of it, ſince they were made chiefly " to comply with thoſe perſons, whoſe diſſatisfac- " tion would have proved more uneaſy to one of " his humor, than all that diſtant noiſe of cannon, " which he would often liſten to with a great deal " of tranquillity. Beſide, the great and almoſt " only pleaſure of mind he appeared addicted to, " was ſhiping and ſea affairs; which ſeemed to be " ſo much his talent both for knowlege as well as " inclination, that a war of that kind was rather an " entertainment, than any diſturbance to his " thoughts. If he did not go himſelf at the head " of ſo magnificent a fleet, it is only to be imputed " to that eagerneſs of military glory in his brother; " who, under the ſhew of a decent care for preſerv- " ing the Royal perſon from danger, ingroſſed all " that ſort of honor to himſelf, with as much jealou- " ſy of any other's interpoſing in it, as a King of an- " other temper would have had of his, tho' without " reaſon———It is certain, no Prince was ever " more fited by nature for his country's intereſt, " than he was in all his maritime inclinations; " which might have proved of ſufficient advantage " to this nation, if he had been as careful in depreſ- " ſing all ſuch improvements in France, as of ad- " vancing and incouraging our own: but it ſeems " he wanted jealouſy in all his inclinations, which " leads us to conſider him in his pleaſures: where " he was rather abandoned than luxurious; and like " our female libertines, apter to be debauched for " the ſatisfaction of others, than to ſeek with choice " where moſt to pleaſe himſelf. I am of opinion " alſo, that in his latter time, there was as much " of lazineſs as of love, in all thoſe hours he paſſed " among his miſtreſſes; who after all, ſerved only " to fill up his ſeraglio, while a bewitching kind of " pleaſure, called Santering, and talking without " any conſtraint, was the true Sultana Queen he " delighted in.

" He was ſurely inclined to juſtice; for nothing " elſe would have retained him ſo faſt to the ſucceſ- " ſion of a brother, againſt a ſon he was ſo fond of, " and the humor of a party which he ſo much " feared. I am willing alſo to impute to his juſtice, " whatever ſeems in ſome meaſure to contradict the " general opinion of his clemency; as his ſuffering " always the rigor of the law to proceed, not only " againſt all highwaymen, but alſo ſeveral others, " in whoſe caſes the lawyers (according to their " wonted cuſtom) had uſed ſometime a great " deal of hardſhip and ſeverity. His underſtand- " ing was quick and lively in little things, and " ſometimes would ſoar high enough in great ones, " but unable to keep it up with any long attention " or application. Witty in all ſorts of converſa- " tion; and telling a ſtory ſo well, that not out " of flattery, but for the pleaſure of hearing it, we " uſed to ſeem ignorant of what he had repeated to " us ten times before, as a good comedy will bear " the being ſeen often. Of a wonderful mixture; " loſing all his time, and till of late ſeting his " whole heart on the fair ſex, yet neither angry with " rivals, nor in the leaſt nice as to their being be- " loved; and while he ſacrificed all things to his " miſtreſſes, he would uſe to grudge and be uneaſy " at their loſing a little of it again at play, tho' " never ſo neceſſary for their diverſion: nor would " he venture five pounds at Tennis to thoſe ſer- " vants, who might obtain as many thouſands,

" either before he came thither, or as ſoon as he " left off. Not falſe to his word, but full of diſſi- " mulation, and very adroit at it, yet no man " eaſier to be impoſed on; for his great dexterity " was in cozening himſelf, by gaining a little one " way, while it coſt him ten times as much an- " other; and by careſſing thoſe perſons moſt, " who had deluded him the oftener; and yet the " quickeſt in the world at ſpying ſuch a ridicule in " another. Familiar, eaſy, and good natured; " but for great offenſes ſevere and inflexible: alſo " in one week's abſenſe, quite forgeting thoſe ſer- " vants, to whoſe faces he could hardly deny any " thing. In the midſt of all his remiſſneſs, ſo " induſtrious and indefatigable on ſome particular " occaſions, that no man would either toil longer, " or be able to manage it better.

Charles II. An' 1684.

" He was ſo liberal, as to ruin his affairs by it; " for want in a King of England, turns things juſt " upſide down, and expoſes a Prince to his peoples " mercy. It did yet worſe in him, for it forced " him alſo to depend on his great neighbor of " France; who played the brother with him ſuffi- " ciently in all thoſe times of extremity. Yet this " profuſeneſs of his did not ſo much proceed from " his over valuing thoſe he favored, as from his " under valuing any ſums of money which he did " not ſee; tho' he found his error in this, but I " confeſs a little of the lateſt. He had ſo natural " an averſion to all formality, that with as much " wit as moſt Kings ever had, and with as majeſtic " a mein, yet he could not on premeditation act " the part of a King for a moment, either at par- " liament, or at council, either in words or geſture; " which carried him into the other extreme, more " inconvenient of the two, of leting all diſtinction " and ceremony fall to the ground, as uſeleſs and " foppiſh. His temper, both of body and mind, " was admirable, which made him an eaſy generous " lover, a civil obliging huſband, a friendly bro- " ther, an indulgent father, and a good natured " maſter. If he had been as ſollicitous about im- " proving the faculties of his mind, as he was in " the management of his bodily health; tho', alas! " the one proved unable to make his life long, the " other had not failed to have made it famous. " He was an illuſtrious exception to all the com- " mon rules of phyſiognomy: for, with a moſt " Saturnine harſh ſort of countenance, he was both " of a merry and merciful diſpoſition; and in the " laſt thirty years of his life, as fortunate, as thoſe " of his father had been diſmal and tumultuous.

" If his death has been by ſome ſuſpected of " being untimely, it may be partly imputed to his " extreme healthy conſtitution, which made the " world as much ſurpriſed at his dying before three- " ſcore, as if nothing but an ill accident could " have killed him. I would not ſay any thing on " ſo ſad a ſubject, if I did not think ſilence itſelf " would in ſuch a caſe ſignify too much; and there- " fore, as an impartial writer, I am obliged to " obſerve, that the moſt knowing, and moſt " diſcerning of his phyſicians* did not only be- " lieve him poiſoned, but thought himſelf ſo too " not long after, for having declared his opinion a " a little too boldly. But here I muſt needs take " notice of an unuſual piece of juſtice, which yet " all the world has almoſt unanimouſly agreed in; " I mean, in not ſuſpecting his ſucceſſor of the leaſt " connivance in ſo horrid a villany; and perhaps " there was never a more remarkable inſtance of " the wonderful power of truth and innocence: " for it is next to a miracle, that ſo unfortunate a " Prince, in the midſt of all thoſe diſadvantages he " lies under, ſhould be yet cleared of this, even by " his greateſt enemies; notwithſtanding all thoſe

"circumſtances that uſe to give a ſuſpicion, and "that extreme malice which has of late attended "him in all his other actions." (1).

A compariſon between the two foregoing characters.

After reciting theſe different characters of King Charles II, drawn by ſuch able hands, I think myſelf obliged to make a ſort of parallel, in order to aſſiſt the reader in the diſcovery of the truth. Dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, was a Scotſman. He had been educated among the Epiſcopalians, but however, was always accuſed of preſerving a tincture of Preſbyterianiſm, the religion of his country, when free to purſue his inclination. He is likewiſe accuſed of having been intirely in the Whig party. In fine, he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with either Charles II, or James II, and therefore we muſt read with caution whatever he ſays, not reconcileable with the known actions of Charles II, or by others expreſly contradicted.

It is eaſy to perceive, that Burnet's picture of Charles II is very much charged. The painter has ſtrongly drawn all the lines, which he thought might beget a likeneſs between the picture and the original, without any regard to the reputation of this Prince. It is even ſeen, that poſſibly he ſpoke with prejudice, and by this prejudice, was led to credit too lightly what he had received upon hearſay to the King's diſadvantage. For inſtance, what he affirms, that Charles, after the battle of Worceſter, ſhewed a temper ſo careleſs, that he was then diverting himſelf with trifles in as unconcerned a manner, as if he had ſuſtained no loſs, and been in no danger at all, appears to me a little aggravated. It is not even probable, that the biſhop could be informed of the King's actions at that time, by eye witneſſes. When he ſays, the King had great vices, but ſcarce any virtues to correct them, this plainly appears to be the language of paſſion and prejudice. When he ſays again, the King never forgave any thing that was done againſt himſelf, this muſt be aggravated: for if he was mercileſs to the lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, and ſome others, it cannot from thence be infered, that he never forgave. Such expreſſions excepted, which diſcover ſome paſſion in the author, the reſt of Charles II's character is true in general. This I believe, becauſe I find it agreeable to the hiſtory of his reign, and becauſe the earl of Mulgrave has in his picture drawn the ſame lines with dr. Burnet, to expreſs his likeneſs. All the difference between theſe two authors, is, that in the biſhop's picture, the principal lines are ſtrongly expreſſed, and much ſoftened in the earl's.

The earl of Mulgrave, afterwards marquis of Normandy, and then duke of Buckinghamſhire, was intirely in the Tory party, and if any regard may be had to common report, his religion, like that of Charles II, was Deiſm. In his deſcription of this Prince, he denies not the general ſuſpicion of his being poiſoned. Burnet ſays alſo the ſame thing. The earl inſiſts that the duke of York was not ſuſpected of the leaſt connivance at ſo horrid a villany. The ſame is likewiſe to be found in Burnet. If the laſt ſays, King Charles was a Papiſt, this is not denied by the earl. He only imputes it to two cauſes, firſt, to a complaiſance for the company he was forced to keep in his exile; and ſecondly, to the oppoſition he met with in parliament, which threw him into the arms of the Papiſts. If the firſt of theſe cauſes be true, the ſecond cannot be ſo, ſince the King was not twice a Papiſt. Beſide, the oppoſitions in parliament were partly owing to a belief, that he deſigned to introduce Popery.

CHARLES II. AN' 1684.

Burnet ſays, Charles was incapable of any application. The earl ſays the ſame. The biſhop ſays, the King was for rendering himſelf abſolute. If the earl ſays it not in expreſs terms, he ſufficiently intimates it, by ſaying, "That the Roman Catholic "party lulled him aſleep with the inchanting ſong of "Sovereignty and Prerogative." Burnet ſays, the King was apt to forgive all crimes, but never forgave any thing that was done againſt himſelf. The earl praiſes his clemency, and ſays, "he was "eaſy and good natured in trifles, but in great "affairs ſevere and inflexible." This may be the biſhop's meaning expreſſed in other words.

The ſtories which the King loved to talk over, are in both characters. The only difference is, that Burnet ſays, the company grew weary of them, and the earl ſays, the hearers were pleaſed with the repetition. But the raillery of the earl of Rocheſter turns the balance for the biſhop.

Burnet ſays, Charles ingaged in two wars againſt Holland, without any color, and the earl calls theſe wars unneceſſary.

Burnet ſays he contributed to the raiſing of the greatneſs of France at ſea, and the earl ſays, he was not ſufficiently careful to "depreſs the maritime "improvements of France," and that here he wanted jealouſy. Is not this much the ſame thing?

In ſhort, let theſe two pictures be compared with all poſſible exactneſs, and they will both be found very like; but that the two painters had different views, and purſued different methods. The one propoſed to expreſs ſtrongly the lines which might moſt contribute to a reſemblance with the original, without regarding the beauty of the picture in itſelf. The other, without omiting the ſame lines, which could not be done and the likeneſs preſerved, has taken all poſſible care to ſoften them, in order to hide, as much as lay in his power, the deformities of the original. In fine, the one has given us an ugly, and the other a beautiful likeneſs. This doubtleſs, induced the earl to ſuppreſs ſeveral ſtrokes of his pencil, which might have improved the reſemblance, but would have been prejudicial to the end he propoſed in his work. (2)

Coke ſays, That King Charles left the nation more vitiated and debauched in their manners, than ever it was by any other King; having not only ſquandered away the ancient revenues of the crown, which were eſteemed ſacred, and which ſhould have ſupported it againſt foreign force and inteſtine diſcord, but left ſuch debt upon it as never before was heard of, nor contracted by ſuch means. JAMES II, TWENTY-SEVENTH King of ENGLAND ſince the Conqueſt.

JAMES II. AN' 1684.

The duke of York is proclaimed King. Feb. 6. Gazette No. 2006. Echard.

CHARLES had not reſigned his breath many hours, before his brother the duke of York was proclaimed King in London, by the name of JAMES the ſecond. Having ſeen how the government was ſetled for ſome years paſt, we muſt not think it ſtrange, there was no indeavors, either in London or any other part of the kingdom, to oppoſe the new King. Of the two parties in England, that againſt the bill of excluſion was triumphant, and the other intirely broken and oppreſſed. The acceſſion of James II to the crown, was a freſh motive of triumph to the former, and notwithſtanding the fears expreſſed by the other party, about a Catholic ſucceſſor, they who had ſupported his intereſt, indeavored to repreſent the late change, as the greateſt of bleſſings to the Engliſh nation. The King, on his part, omited nothing that lay in his power to confirm the good opinion his friends had of his virtue and ſincerity. As ſoon as the lords were returned to Whitehall, from proclaiming the King, he aſſembled the privy council, and made the following ſpeech:

The King's declaration to the council. Gazette No. 2006. Kennet, p. 420.

My Lords,

"BEfore I enter upon any other buſineſs, I think fit to ſay ſomething to you. Since it hath pleaſed Almighty God to place me in this ſtation, and I am now to ſucceed ſo good and gracious a King, as well as ſo very kind a brother, I think it fit to declare to you, that I will indeavor to follow his example, and moſt eſpecially in that of his great clemency and tenderneſs to his people. I have been reported to be a man of arbitrary power; but that is not the only ſtory has been made of me; and I ſhall make it my indeavor to preſerve this government both in church and ſtate, as it is now by law eſtabliſhed. I know the principles of the church of England are for Monarchy, and the members of it have ſhewed themſelves good and loyal ſubjects, therefore I ſhall always take care to defend and ſupport it. I know too, that the laws of England are ſufficient to make the King as great a Monarch as I can wiſh; and as I ſhall never depart from the juſt rights and prerogative of the crown, ſo I ſhall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defenſe of this nation, and I ſhall ſtill go as far as any man in preſerving it in all its juſt rights and liberties."

JAMES II. AN' 1684.

Every body is pleaſed with the ſpeech. Gazettes. Kennet. Burnet.

This ſpeech being addreſſed to a council wholly compoſed of perſons devoted to the King, was received with great applauſe. His Majeſty was deſired that it might be printed, and diſperſed among the people, which was immediately done. Moreover, great care was taken to extol the King's extreme affection for his ſubjects; and above all, his ſtrict obſervance of his word and faith was ſo induſtriouſly propagated, that ſome counting it impoſſible for the King to promiſe what he did not intend to perform, began to give him the name of JAMES THE JUST, as if to ſay and to do, were in him one and the ſame thing.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 729.

Every one retains his place. Gazette No. 2006. Kennet. Burnet.

Next day, the King publiſhed a proclamation, declaring, that all perſons who, at the late King's deceaſe, were poſſeſſed of any office, ſhould be continued in the ſame, till the King's pleaſure was farther known. He declared, moreover, that all orders and directions given by the late King's privy council, ſhould be obeyed and performed, as if he was ſtill alive. This is a clear evidence of the great influence that the King, when duke of York, had in the counſels of the King his brother. Upon his his coming to the crown, he made no changes, either in the council, or in the chief places of truſt, a plain ſign he looked on the poſſeſſors as his creatures. And indeed, ſince his return from Scotland, he had properly governed the kingdom in the name his brother. This being known to all, might have demonſtrated with what intention he promiſed to preſerve the Proteſtant religion, and the rights of the ſubject, ſince no man could be ignorant, that he was the principal author of the plots in the late reign, againſt religion, and the liberties of the nation. But the Tories, who were then highly exalted, willingly ſhut their eyes, and would not ſee the danger to which the Proteſtant religion was expoſed, under a King who was ſo zealous a Papiſt. His Majeſty's bare word was ſufficient to calm all their uneaſineſs on that account As for arbitrary power, which began to be introduced in the late reign, far from being frighted at it, they rather conſidered it as effectual means to keep their adverſaries, the Whigs, in ſubjection. Had they known or foreſeen to what height James was reſolved to carry his power, they would, doubtleſs, have imployed their thoughts otherwiſe; but they imagined, things would always remain as they were, that is, in a ſituation to them very advantageous.

The King makes no alterations.

The Tories conceive a great opinion of the King.

He goes publicly to maſs. Echard, Vol. III. p. 731. R. Coke, p. 326.

Moſt of the hiſtorians ſpeak of the King's going publicly to maſs two days after his acceſſion to the crown as of a thing very ſurpriſing: but I cannot ſee any reaſon for it. Since the year 1670, no man had been ignorant, that the duke of York was a Catholic. On this account he had reſigned the office of lord high admiral, and in the following years, the bill of excluſion, which cauſed three parliaments to be diſſolved, had ſufficiently taught the Engliſh this truth. Where then could the wonder be, to ſee him go to maſs, being King, ſince, for the laſt fourteen years, he had not concealed his religion, tho' he had run the riſque of forfeiting his right to the crown?

Cuſtoms and duties continued before they are granted. Febr. 16. Gazette No. 2009. Welwood. Burnet, p. 621. R. Coke.

But what gave more juſt cauſe of aſtoniſhment was his requiring by proclamation the ſame week, that the cuſtoms, and other duties which had been granted to the King his brother, only for life, ſhould be continued to be collected (1). This was a manifeſt invaſion of the rights and liberties of the nation (2). He could not be ignorant, that an incroachment of the ſame nature had occaſioned a great conteſt between the King his father and the parliament, and that this conteſt produced the petition of right. And yet, he not only undertook the ſame thing, but uſed alſo the ſame reaſons with Charles I, which were ſo little ſatisfactory to the parliament. His proceedings were the more ſurpriſing, as he affected to take by authority, what he knew would not be refuſed by the parliament, conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of the kingdom. Tho' his friends indeavored to excuſe this conduct, it made impreſſion upon many of both parties, who had no good opinion of a reign which began in ſuch a manner. This gave occaſion to fear, that the new King's promiſes were not ſo firmly to be relied on, as was pretended.

James II. An' 1684.

The King at the ſame time took another ſtep, and, as it ſeems, without any neceſſity, which was to cauſe it to be publiſhed, and atteſted by father Huddleſton a prieſt, that Charles II died a Catholic, and that the ſame prieſt gave him the Euchariſt and Extreme Unction. Huddleſton publiſhed withal a little treatiſe, called "a ſhort and plain way to "the faith and church;" which treatiſe, the author affirms, made great impreſſions upon the mind of King Charles, in the year 1651, immediately after the battle of Worceſter, ſo that he declared, "he "had not ſeen any thing more plain and clear upon "the ſubject; and the arguments drawn from ſuc-"ceſſion were ſo concluſive, he did not conceive "how they could be denied." Moreover, at the ſame time, James ordered two papers to be publiſhed, found in the King his brother's ſtrong box, writen with his own hand, both tending to prove the neceſſity of a viſible church and guide, in matters of faith (3). To confirm that Charles II was really a Catholic, mr. William Chaffinch, keeper of the King's cloſet, made no ſcruple to ſhew a little chapel annexed to the cloſet, where the King went ſecretly to maſs. It is hard to conceive, what great advantage it could be to James, to divulge ſuch a ſecret, conſidering the injury he did the late King's reputation, who had ſo frequently and ſolemnly affirmed in full parliament that he was a good Proteſtant, and had poſitively promiſed to maintain the Proteſtant religion to the utmoſt of his power. As James thereby manifeſtly ſhewed his brother's inſincerity, he ſhould, it ſeems, have feared, it would be infered, that there was as little reaſon to rely on what he himſelf had promiſed.

He publiſhes that the late King was a Papiſt. Kennet, p. 423. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 731.

p. 732.

The funeral of Charles II was ſolemniſed on the fourteenth of February at night. It may eaſily be judged, it was not very expenſive, ſince eight days were ſufficient for the preparations. It is obſervable, that Charles II had neglected, after his reſtoration, to ſolemniſe his father's funeral, on pretenſe that his body could not be found in Windſor chapel, the place where it was intered, as the lord Clarendon ſays in his hiſtory. But as it would have been eaſy to ſearch the whole chapel, it is more likely, the reaſon of that neglect was the charges of a funeral, tho' Charles II had received for that purpoſe from the parliament the ſum of ſeventy thouſand pounds. For the ſame reaſon, probably, James cauſed his brother to be buried with little ſplendor, tho' Charles left him ninety thouſand guineas in a box.

James fills the vacant places. Feb. 9, 16. Gazettes. Kennet, p. 421.

Two days after the King ordered the privy counſellors and great officers of the crown and houſhold to be ſworn, and at the ſame time filled the vacant places. The office of lord treaſurer, vacant ſince the year 1679, by the reſignation of the earl of Danby, was confered on Laurence Hyde, earl of Rocheſter, the King's brother in law; Henry earl of Clarendon elder brother to the earl of Rocheſter, was made lord privy ſeal; and George Savil, marquiſs of Hallifax, preſident of the council (4).

(1) Another proclamation was put out for levying the additional exciſe, which had been given to the late King only for life. There was a clauſe in this act, that impowered the treaſury to make a farm of it for three years, without adding a limiting clauſe, in caſe it ſhould be ſo long due. And it was thought a great ſtretch of the clauſe, to make a fraudulent farm, by which it ſhould continue to be levied three years after it was determined, according to the letter and intent of the act. A farm was now brought out, as made during the King's life, tho' it was well known, that no ſuch farm had been made, for it was made after his death, but a falſe date put to it. Burnet, p. 622.

tory addreſſes to the King, upon his acceſſion to the crown. Theſe addreſſes, for the moſt part, took notice of the King's poſitive declaration to the privy council, to maintain the church of England and the liberties of the nation. But there were two among others very remarkable. The firſt from the bariſters and ſtudents of the Middle-Temple, wherein, "with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude they "acknowleged his Majeſty's great goodneſs, in "extending his Royal care of the government to "the preſervation of the cuſtoms, which had been "continually received by his Royal predeceſſors "for ſome hundreds of years, and never queſtioned "by any parliament, unleſs in that wherein were "ſown the ſeeds of rebellion againſt the King his "father (1)." They concluded with ſaying, "May there never want millions as loyal as we "are, to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in defenſe "of your ſacred perſon and prerogative in its full "extent:" And promiſed that they would indeavor the choice of ſuch repreſentatives for the inſuing parliament, as would not only concur in ſetling a revenue to ſupport the government as formerly, but alſo ſhew an intire confidence in his Majeſty. The addreſs from the county of Suffolk had theſe words: "We are every day making ſteps towards your Majeſty's grandeur, by our care for "ſending fit repreſentatives to a parliament, that "we hope will no more indure Excluders than a "late one did Abhorrers." The Quakers alſo preſented an addreſs to the King, wherein they ſaid: "Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God (by whom "Kings reign) to take hence the late King Charles "the ſecond, and to preſerve thee peaceably to ſuc-"ceed; we thy ſubjects heartily deſire, that the "giver of all good and perfect gifts, may pleaſe "to indue thee with wiſdom and mercy in the uſe "of thy great power, to his glory, the King's "honor, and the kingdom's good. And it being "our ſincere reſolution, according to our peace-"able principles and converſations (by the aſſiſ-"tance of Almighty God) to live peaceably and "honeſtly, as becomes true and faithful ſubjects, "under the King's government, and a conſcien-"tious people that truly fear and ſerve God: we "do humbly hope, that the King's tenderneſs will "appear and extend with his power to expreſs the "ſame (2)."——

AN' 1685. The King and Queen crowned. Gazette No. 2028. Echard. Vol. III. p. 734. Kennet. Burnet, p. 628.

The King's and Queen's coronation was celebrated the twenty-third of April, St. George's day, patron of the Order of the Garter. Tho' ſuch a ceremony cannot be ſolemniſed without pomp, it was obſerved, the King retrenched ſeveral things which cauſed a needleſs expenſe, as for inſtance, the cavalcade from the Tower to Weſtminſter, which was wont to be performed the day before the coronation, ſaving thereby a charge of ſixty thouſand pounds. But if ſome authors are to be credited, the moſt conſiderable retrenchment was in the words of the coronation oath, out of which, they pretend, ſeveral material things were ſtruck, without ſpecifying the particulars. Others maintain, it is an aſperſion on archbiſhop Sancroft, who is ſuppoſed, without foundation, to have conſented to the abridging of the oath. As I have ſeen no proof of either, I forbear to decide. Thus much is certain, the crown not being fit for the King's head, was often in a tottering condition and like to fall off. Mr. Henry Sidney ſupporting it once with his hand, pleaſantly told the King, "This is not the firſt "time our family has ſupported the crown (3)." The people reckoned this an ill omen to the King, as well as another thing which happened the ſame day. In one of the churches in London, the King's arms, painted in a glaſs window, ſuddenly fell down and broke in pieces, while the reſt of the window was ſtanding, without a poſſibility of diſcovering why that part ſhould fall ſooner than the reſt (4).

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 734.

The ſame day that the King was crowned at London, the parliament of Scotland met at Edinburg, William Douglaſs, duke of Queenſborough being lord high commiſſioner. This lord was intirely in the King's party, but not in ſuch a manner as to ſacrifice to him the Proteſtant religion and his country's liberties. Before he left London, in order for Scotland, he told the King plainly, he could not ingage to ſerve him in any thing but what ſhould be agreeable to the laws; whereupon the King proteſted to him, he had no intention to make any breach either in the eſtabliſhed religion or the laws.

The King's letter to the Scotiſh parliament ran, "That the many experiences he had of the loyalty "and exemplary forwardneſs of that ancient king-"dom, by their repreſentatives aſſembled in par-"liament in the reign of his brother, made him de-"ſirous to call them together in the begining of his "reign, to give them an opportunity not only of "ſhewing their duty, but alſo to be exemplary to "others in their demonſtrations of their affection "to his perſon, and compliance with his deſires. (2) This is the true addreſs from Sewell's Hiſtory of the Quakers. Rapin has wrongly followed Echard, and given it as follows, "We are come to teſtify our ſorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for thy being made our governor. "We are told thou art not of the perſuaſion of the church of England no more than we; therefore we hope that thou wilt grant "us the ſame liberty which thou alloweſt thyſelf."

But to take ſuch things for omens is ridiculous. Turner preached the coronation ſermon, in which he ſet forth that part of Conſtantinus Chlorus's hiſtory, wherein he tried who would be trueſt to their religion, and reckoned that thoſe would be faithfulleſt to himſelf who were trueſt to their God. The King and Queen reſolved to have all done in the Proteſtant form, and to aſſiſt in all the prayers: only the King would not receive the ſacrament. In this certainly his prieſts diſpenſed with him, and he had ſuch ſenſes given him of the oath, that he either took it as a ſin, with a reſolution not to keep it, [or he had a reſerved meaning in his own mind. The lord commiſſioner's ſpeech. Gazette, No. 2031.

The high commiſſioner ſeconded the King's letter with a ſpeech, wherein he gave them aſſurance of his Majeſty's reſolutions to protect and maintain the religion and government of their church as by law eſtabliſhed (1); and alſo the ſubjects rights and properties, in ſuch manner, that no perſon ſhould be injured by any arbitrary oppreſſions of ſoldiers, or others; and he would condeſcend as much in the buſineſs of the exciſe and militia as could be juſtly expected. And, on the other ſide, his Majeſty expected from them, to aſſert the rights and prerogatives of the crown, and to eſtabliſh the revenue as amply upon him and his ſucceſſors, as it was injoyed by the King his brother. In the laſt place, the lord commiſſioner deſired in very pathetic terms, that effectual means might be found to deſtroy the fanatical party, who were wretches of ſuch monſtrous principles and practices, as paſt ages never heard, nor thoſe to come will ſcarcely believe.

Theſe fanatical murderers and aſſaſſins could be no other than the Preſbyterians of Scotland, who were properly the body of the nation, to whom was imputed the murder of the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, as if it had been commited by the determination of the whole Preſbyterian party.

Ibid. James Drummond, earl of Perth, lord chancellor, made a ſpeech likewiſe, in which he inlarged on the King's great virtues. I do not know whether he was yet a Papiſt, but at leaſt, preſently after, he imbraced the Catholic religion, and by that infallible means ſupplanted the duke of Queenſborough.

Ibid. The parliament returned a very humble and ſubmiſſive anſwer to the King, promiſing to do whatever he had deſired. To perform which promiſe they forthwith paſſed the three following acts:

No. 2032. By the firſt act were ratified all ſtatutes paſſed in the late reign for the ſecurity of religion as at preſent profeſſed within the kingdom.

By the ſecond, they annexed the exciſe of foreign and inland commodities to the crown of Scotland for ever.

By the third, they ordained, that all ſuch perſons, as being cited in caſe of high treaſon, field or houſe conventicles, or church irregularities, ſhould refuſe to give teſtimony, ſhould be liable to be puniſhed as guilty of thoſe crimes reſpectively, in which they refuſed to be witneſſes.

Trial of Titus Oates. State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 1. Burnet, p. 637. Echard. R. Coke. Kennet, p. 437.

Before the meeting of the parliament of England, which was called for the nineteenth of May, three perſons odious to the King, the Papiſts, and the prevailing party, were brought to their trials. The firſt was the notorious Titus Oates, diſcoverer of the Popiſh plot, and one of the witneſſes againſt the condemned jeſuits. He was accuſed of perjury on two points of his evidence, viz. for affirming on oath, that he was preſent at the grand conſult held at London the twenty-fourth of April 1678, where, as he pretended, the reſolution of killing the King was taken. Secondly, for ſaying, that father Ireland, an executed jeſuit, was at London ſuch a day. To convict him of theſe two real or pretended crimes, he was brought before chief juſtice Jefferies at the King's-bench bar, the eighth and ninth of May 1685. As I have amply ſpoken of this matter in the reign of Charles II, I ſhall not repeat here what has been already ſaid, but confine myſelf to ſhew the partiality wherewith Oates was tried and condemned.

State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 1.

In the firſt place, immediately after the indictment was read, and before any witneſs was heard, the attorney general * made a ſpeech declaring, "Oates was one of the greateſt impoſtors that ever "did appear upon the ſtage, either in this king-"dom or any other nation." It muſt be obſerved, this attorney general had been one of the counſel for the King in 1678, to ſupport and improve Oates's evidence.

* Sir Robert Sawyer.

2. Twenty witneſſes from St. Omers were produced, who ſwore, that Oates was at that place the twenty-fourth of April 1678, at the very time that he ſaid he was preſent at the grand conſult. It is obſervable, that theſe very witneſſes had depoſed the ſame thing in 1678, and that the jury had not regarded their evidence. But in 1685, there was not the leaſt reaſon to reject their depoſitions.

3. Oates deſired it might be obſerved, that the King's counſel who were now againſt him, had been for him in the trials of the five jeſuits, and particularly the attorney and ſollicitor general: That lord chief juſtice Jefferies, before whom his cauſe was pleading, was among the King's counſel in 1678, and did then expreſly declare, "That the verdict "againſt the five jeſuits was a juſt verdict." As he laid great ſtreſs upon the verdicts given upon his depoſitions, he was told, that theſe verdicts had been diſbelieved ſeveral times, as well as believed. Moreover, the records of the trials of ſir George Wakeman and the earl of Caſtlemain were produced, who being accuſed of the pretended plot, had been acquited, and depoſed upon oath, that Oates had not ſaid one word of truth. p. 26, &c. p. 29.

4. Oates demanded, whether a 'Papiſt in caſe 'of religion might be believed?' It was replied, 'He might.' And as if the queſtion had been impertinent and foreign to the purpoſe. Juſtice Withens aſked him, 'Whether he was come there 'to preach?' p. 50. Ibid.

5. Oates urged the lord Coke's practiſe, who would not allow of a Popiſh recuſant for a witneſs, even between party and party. To which it was anſwered in general, that this practiſe was contrary to law.

6. He ſaid, that the witneſſes againſt him were brought up in a ſeminary, againſt law. Jefferies replied, ſo was a Diſſenter. p. 51.

7. He inſiſted upon the ſtatute of the twenty-ſeventh year of Elizabeth againſt ſeminary prieſts and jeſuits. Whereupon Jefferies aſked him, 'whether the witneſſes owned themſelves to be prieſts 'and jeſuits?' Ibid.

8. He pleaded the ſtatute of the third of Charles I, to which Jefferies anſwered, 'It was nothing to 'the purpoſe.' Ibid.

9. Laſtly, he repreſented, that the lord Shaftſbury, upon his trial, moving that he might have liberty to bring an indictment of perjury againſt the witneſſes that accuſed him, the court over-ruled the motion, and would not ſuffer the King's evidence to be indicted of perjury, nor the Popiſh plot called in queſtion. He infered from thence, that having been himſelf evidence for the King, he could not for that reaſon be indicted of perjury. Jefferies told him, all this was nothing to the purpoſe. Then ſumming up the evidence, he concluded with theſe words: "There does not re-"main the leaſt doubt, but that Oates is the "blackeſt and moſt perjured villain that ever ap-"peared upon the face of the earth." p. 52.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

The jury withdrawing about a quarter of an hour, brought him in guilty of the perjury he was accuſed of.

State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 66.

Next day, he was tried upon the ſecond indictment of perjury concerning father Ireland. Above forty witneſſes were produced againſt him, nine of whom were Proteſtants, who ſwore, that Ireland was in Staffordſhire when Oates ſaid he was in London (1), and he was alſo found guilty of this indictment. What is moſt ſurpriſing, ſome pretend, there is not the leaſt appearance of injuſtice or partiality in the verdict againſt Oates, but on the contrary, the partiality is evident in the verdict againſt the five jeſuits. I leave it to the unbiaſſed reader to compare them and judge. But it cannot be denied at leaſt, there was a great deal of paſſion in the ſentenſe againſt Oates, and much more in the execution of it. The ſentenſe was as follows:

May 16. p. 104.

1. That he ſhould pay for a fine one thouſand marks upon each indictment.

2. That he ſhould be ſtriped of all his canonical habits.

3. That he ſhould ſtand in the pillory before Weſtminſter-hall-gate on Monday next, for an hour's time, with a paper over his head (which he muſt firſt walk with round about to all the courts in Weſtminſter-hall) declaring his crime; and that on the firſt indictment.

4. That for the ſecond indictment he ſhould on Tueſday ſtand in the pillory at the Royal Exchange in London, for an hour, with the ſame inſcription

5. On Wedneſday he ſhould be whiped from Aldgate to Newgate.

6. On Friday he ſhould be whiped from Newgate to Tyburn.

7. And for annual commemorations, upon every twenty-fourth of April, as long as he ſhould live, he was to ſtand in the pillory at Tyburn, juſt oppoſite to the gallows, for an hour.

8. That, upon every ninth of Auguſt, he was to ſtand in the pillory at Weſtminſter-hall-gate, becauſe he had ſworn that Ireland was in town between the eighth and twelfth of Auguſt. The like on every tenth of Auguſt at Charing-Croſs, and over againſt the Temple-gate every eleventh of Auguſt. And upon every ſecond of September he was to do the ſame at the Royal-Exchange. All this he was to do every year during his life: and be commited a cloſe priſoner as long as he lived.

After pronouncing this ſentenſe, Jefferies added, that if it had been in his power, Oates ſhould have been condemned to die.

It muſt be obſerved, that ſtanding in the pillory, which only expoſes to ſhame, is in England ſomething more; for it is permited to pelt thoſe that ſtand there, with dirt, and all ſorts of naſtineſs, and it often happens that the mob abuſe this liberty, and throw rotten eggs and even ſtones at the priſoner.

But what was thought moſt barbarous in this ſentenſe was, the ordering a man to be whiped twice in three days. Some charitable perſons uſed their indeavors to beg off part of this wretched man's puniſhment, and made application to the Queen, intreating her to intercede for him, at leaſt with regard to the ſecond ſcourging. But in vain was all interceſſion. The ſentenſe was executed with all imaginable rigor and barbarity. The firſt day he was tied to a cart, and as the hangman no doubt was commanded not to ſpare him, he executed the order with ſuch cruelty, as was unknown to the Engliſh nation. Oates ſwooned away ſeveral times the firſt day, with the extremity of the anguiſh. We may judge what he indured the ſecond day, when his wounds were yet freſh. In ſhort, his ſuſtaining ſuch great torments, and eſcaping with life, was looked upon as ſomething miraculous. Every one was ſenſible, that, both in the ſentenſe and in the execution, revenge had a greater ſhare than juſtice, and that he was made a ſacrifice to the manes of the five jeſuits executed in the late reign.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 741.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

Trial of Dangerfield. Burnet, p. 537. Kennet, p. 438. Echard.

The next victim to the Catholics, not long after Oates, was Thomas Dangerfield, who diſcovered the pretended Meal-Tub-Plot, which he had laid to the charge of the Proteſtants. But afterwards, not being able to maintain before the council what he had depoſed, he confeſſed, he was perſuaded to invent it by the counteſs of Powis, and the Popiſh lords in the Tower. Moreover, he had publiſhed a narrative of all the ſecret practices uſed as well to corrupt him, as to render the plot probable. As he owned, he had received money from the late King and the duke of York, the laſt would never ſuffer ſuch an offenſe to go unpuniſhed, when he came to be King. Dangerfield therefore was commited to priſon, and indicted for publiſhing a ſcandalous libel. He was tried and brought in guilty by the jury, after which he received judgment at the King's-bench bar, "That he ſhould "ſtand twice in the pillory; that he ſhould be "whiped from Aldgate to Newgate on one day, "and from Newgate to Tyburn on another, and "ſhould pay a fine of five hundred pounds." The ſcourging was executed with rigor, tho' with leſs cruelty than on Oates. The ſecond day, Dangerfield, after the whiping was over, being in a coach againſt Hatton-Garden, Robert Frances, a barriſter of Grey's-Inn, came to the coach ſide, and uſing ſome inſulting expreſſions, Dangerfield returned a reproachful anſwer (2). Frances having a ſmall cane in his hand, thruſt it into his eye with all his force, which in two hours put an end to his life. Frances was condemned to be hanged, and was executed accordingly, the King, tho' ſtrongly ſollicited for a pardon, not thinking proper to leave ſuch a crime unpuniſhed (3).

He is condemned to be whiped.

He is killed.

Baxter's Trial. May 30. Kennet. p. 443. Echard, Vol. III. p. 743.

Richard Baxter, a Preſbyterian miniſter, famous for his voluminous writings during the troubles, in favor of his religion, againſt the church of England, was a third inſtance of the mildneſs of the new government. As he could not be proceeded againſt for his books publiſhed during the troubles, by reaſon of the act of indemnity, occaſion was taken to proſecute him for a late book, intitled, A Paraphraſe on the New Teſtament, wherein it was pretended, there was ſeveral ſeditious paſſages, and highly reflecting on the biſhops. Baxter being brought before Jefferies at the King's-bench bar, and moving, that farther time might be allowed him for his trial, Jefferies, with his uſual moderation, cried out, "I will not give him a minute's time more to "ſave his life: we have had to do with other ſort "of perſons, but now we have a ſaint to deal "with; and I know how to deal with ſaints as "well as ſinners. Yonder, ſays he, ſtands "Oates in the pillory, and ſays, he ſuffers for the "truth, and ſo ſays Baxter; but if Baxter did but "ſtand on the other ſide of the pillory with him,

James II. An' 1685.

" I would ſay there ſtood two of the greateſt rogues " and raſcals in the kingdom." After this manner did the judge prepare the jury, before any evidence was heard. It would be needleſs to inſert the particulars of the charge and Baxter's defenſe. The point was only to know, whether certain paſſages of his late book could be applied to the prelates of the church of England, or ſolely to thoſe of the church of Rome. Baxter's counſel (1) urged, that without a forced conſtruction, none of the paſſages could be applied to the biſhops of the church of England. The whole proceſs turned on this point. But it will not be improper to ſhew the paſſion and partiality of Jefferies in this, as in all other affairs. Baxter alleged in his defenſe, " That he had been " ſo moderate with reſpect to the church of Eng- " land, and had ſpoken ſo honorably of the bi- " ſhops, that he had incured the cenſure of many " of the Diſſenters upon that account." Jefferies, laying aſide on this occaſion the office of a judge to turn evidence, affirmed, " That Baxter was an " enemy to the name and thing, the office and " perſons of biſhops;" and ſeverely reprimanded the counſel, probably for defending their cauſe too well. Then, ſpeaking to Baxter, he ſaid, " Richard, " thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou " haſt writen books enough to load a cart, every " one as full of ſedition, I might ſay treaſon, as " an egg is full of meat. Hadſt thou been whip- " ped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, " it had been happy. Thou pretendeſt to be a " preacher of the goſpel of peace, and thou haſt " one foot in the grave; it is time for thee to " begin to think what account thou intendeſt to " give. But leave thee to thyſelf, and I ſee thou'lt " go on as thou haſt begun; but by the grace of " God I will look after thee. I know thou haſt a " mighty party, and I ſee a great many of the " brotherhood in corners, waiting to ſee what will " become of their mighty don; and a doctor of
* Dr. Bates. " the party * at your elbow; but by the grace of " Almighty God I will cruſh you all."

The chief juſtice in ſumming up the evidence ſaid; " It is notoriouſly known, that there has " been a deſign to ruin the King and the nation; " and this has been the main incendiary: he is " as modeſt now as can be; but time was, when " no man was ſo ready at binding your Kings in " chains, and your nobles in fetters of iron; and " to your tents, O Iſrael! Gentlemen, for God's " ſake do not let us be gulled twice in an age."

It evidently appears from theſe laſt words of Jefferies, that Baxter's book was only a pretenſe to puniſh him for what he had done during the troubles. However this be, ſuch was the impartial manner in which this judge directed the jury. There is ſcarce a man who will deny, that, as well during this reign, as in the latter part of the former, all the juries were packed, and had ingaged beforehand to be guided by the court. In concluſion, Baxter being found guilty, judgment was given againſt him, to be fined five hundred marks; to lie in priſon till he paid it; and to be bound to his good behavior for ſeven years.

On the nineteenth of May the parliament met, but the King was pleaſed that the commons ſhould firſt chuſe their ſpeaker, before he made his ſpeech to both houſes. The choice fell upon ſir John Trevor, who was recommended by * one of the ſecretaries of ſtate; after which, the King came to the parliament the twenty-ſecond of May, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes. As he had that morning received advice of the earl of Argyle's arrival in Scotland, it gave him occaſion to add ſomething to his ſpeech.

What I ſaid " to my privy council, at my firſt coming there, " I am deſirous to renew to you; wherein I fully " declared my opinion concerning the principles of " the church of England, whoſe members have " ſhewed themſelves ſo eminently loyal in the " worſt of times, in defenſe of my father, and " ſupport of my brother, of bleſſed memory, " 'that I will always take care to defend and " ſupport it: I will make it my indeavor to pre- " ſerve this government both in church and ſtate, " as it is now by law eſtabliſhed; and as I will " never depart from the juſt rights and prero- " gatives of the crown, ſo I will never invade any " man's property': And you may be ſure, that " having heretofore ventured my life in the de- " fenſe of this nation, I will ſtill go as far as " any man in preſerving it in all its juſt rights " and liberties.

There is one popular argument, " which I foreſee may be uſed againſt what I " aſk of you, from the inclination men may " have for frequent parliaments, which ſome may " think will be the beſt ſecured, by feeding me " from time to time, by ſuch proportions as they " ſhall think convenient: and this argument, it " being the firſt time I ſpeak to you from the " throne, I will anſwer once for all, that this " would be a very improper method to take with " me, and that the beſt way to ingage me to " meet you often, is always to uſe me well (2). Remarks on this speech.

I shall make three remarks on this speech, the importance whereof will hereafter appear. The first is, that when the King renewed to his parliament the promise he had made to the council, to preserve the government both in church and state, as by law established, nothing was farther from his thoughts than the performance of it. This will very clearly appear in the sequel. Wherefore this promise was only a lure used by the King to ingage the parliament to inable him to proceed without them. This happened accordingly, for this parliament, which had but two short sessions, was the only one the King called in his reign.

The second remark is, that when the King said, he would not suffer the government to be precarious (that is to depend upon the supplies the parliament should grant him from time to time) he plainly intimated, he meaned to govern in a different manner from his predecessors, since among all the Kings of England, there was never any whose government was not supported by the aids of the parliaments.

The third is, that the objection, which he foresaw would be made to his desire concerning his revenue, was so strong, that he could find no other reason to answer it than a menace, which ought rather to induce the parliament to guard against it. For if the King, in case of refusal, thought himself powerful enough to make the parliament repent, how much greater reason was there to fear, if he should be inabled to proceed without the parliament, and to execute his threat.

Various opinions of the present parliament. Echard, Vol. III. p. 744.

According to some historians, this parliament was better composed than any for many years past. All the members were rich; zealous for their country; good churchmen; averse to all Republican or Anti-monarchial principles; faithful to the King, and of so wonderful harmony among themselves, that the like had never been seen. The meaning of all which in short is, that they were Tories without any mixture of Republicans, Presbyterians, or Whigs. This parliament consisted indeed of persons prepossessed in favor of the King, who imagining, that, according to his promises, he would never meddle with the laws or religion, believed it a signal service to the kingdom, to inable the King to oppose effectually the attempts of the Whigs. They were mistaken in their supposition: but it cannot be infered from their conduct, that they intended to betray the nation's interests, as they plainly afterwards shewed.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

Other historians do not give the same idea of this parliament. They pretend, the members for the most part, being elected by the intrigues of the court, were Tories, and most violent for the doctrine of passive-obedience, and for that reason surrendered the liberties of the people, and paved the way for the King to become absolute, by granting him such a revenue as inabled him to govern without a parliament (1). Burnet, p. 625. R. Coke, p. 338.

Tho' these two assertions with respect to this parliament, seem to be opposite, it is however easy to reconcile them, on supposition of a thing which is very true, viz. the parliament was deceived by the King's promises. So, the only difference between these two opinions, is, that the Whigs accuse the Tories of betraying the interest of their country, with premeditated design; and the Tories, without denying that they acted indeed against the interests of the kingdom, maintain that they did so, thro' a too great confidence in the King's word, given from the throne in the most solemn manner. It will hereafter be seen, that the parliament had no such intention, as is imputed to them: but I cannot say their imprudence may be so easily vindicated.

Both houses thank the King.

His answer. Gazettes. Echard, Vol. III. p. 747.

However this be, both houses satisfied with the King's speech, waited on him the same day with an address of thanks; to which the King answered, " That he was very well pleased with their thanks; " and could repeat no more than what he had said " in the morning, and they should find that he " would be as good as his word."

Vote for granting the same revenue as Charles II injoyed.

This confirmation was so agreeable to the commons, that when they returned to their house, they voted immediately, nemine contradicente, " That " all the revenue injoyed by the late King at his " death, should be granted to his present Majesty, " and setled upon him during life." Thus the constant and ordinary revenue of the late King, which according to the intent of the first parliament, held in his reign, was to be twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, but which amounted to above double that sum; this revenue I say, which two parliaments had spent about two years in setling, was granted to James II, in the space of two hours. They who speak most moderately of this revenue, compute it at more than two millions. But an historian (2) pretends, that including the one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, injoyed by the King while duke of York, and annexed to the crown, the whole amounted to above two millions five hundred and fifty thousand pounds. This liberality was not founded on the services the King had done the nation when duke of York, but solely on his promises to support the government of the church and state. But, thro' extreme prejudice, the parliament was not aware, that by granting the King for life such an immense revenue, they inabled him R. Coke, p. 337.

(1) Burnet says of this parliament, that all arts were used to manage elections, so that the King should have a parliament to his mind. Complaints came up from all parts of England, of the injustice and violence used in elections beyond what had ever been practised in former times. In the new charters that had been granted, the election of the members was taken out of the hands of the inhabitants, and restored to the corporation men, all those being left out, who were not acceptable at court. In some boroughs they could not find a number of men to be depended upon: so the neighboring gentlemen were made corporation men: and in some places, persons of other counties, not so much as known in the borough, were named. This was practised in the most avowed manner in Cornwall by the earl of Bath, who put the officers of the guard's name in almost all the charters of that county; so that the King was sure of forty four votes on all occasions. There were not above forty but what were thus chosen. Burnet, p. 625.

(2) Roger Coke, who says that the customs, and other branches of the revenue, amounted to two millions and four hundred thousand pounds, beside the hundred and fifty thousand pounds. Vol. II. p. 337.

The Popiſh lords are diſcharged together with the earl of Danby. Echard, Vol. III. p. 747.

The commons having given the King ſo real a demonſtration of their zeal and affection, the lords were willing likewiſe to ſhew how much they were devoted to him in whatever lay in their power. To this purpoſe, the King having ſent a warrant to the attorney-general to enter a Noli Proſequi upon the indictments againſt the Popiſh lords, who had been priſoners in the Tower for the plot, and againſt the earl of Danby, the houſe of peers annulled their order of the nineteenth of March 1678-9, and intirely diſcharged thoſe lords who had been releaſed only upon bail.

Bill in the houſe of lords to reverſe the lord Stafford's attainder. Kennet, p. 441. Echard, Vol. III. p. 748.

Theſe proceedings in favor of the Popiſh lords, made way for a bill to reverſe the attainder of the lord viſcount Stafford in 1680. The ſole reaſon alleged in the bill for this reverſal was in theſe words: "Whereas it is now manifeſt, that the "ſaid William late viſcount Stafford was innocent "of the treaſon laid to his charge, and the teſti-"mony whereupon he was found guilty was falſe. "Be it inacted, &c." Thus, the preparers of the bill founded the lord Stafford's innocence upon Oates's being condemned for perjury, tho' in Oates's trial there was not a word of his teſtimony againſt Stafford. Nevertheleſs, the bill was paſſed by a majority of voices. But ſuch of the lords (1) as oppoſed it, entered their diſſents for the following reaſons:

1. Becauſe the aſſertion in the bill of its "being "now manifeſt, that the late viſcount Stafford "died innocent, and that the teſtimony by which "he was convicted was falſe," which are the ſole grounds and reaſons given to ſupport the bill, are deſtitute of all proof, warrant, or teſtimony, or matter of record before us.

2. That the record of the King's-bench read at the commitee, concerning the conviction, laſt term, of one of the witneſſes for perjury, in collateral points of prooſs, of no affinity to the lord Stafford's trial, and given ſeveral years before, it is conceived, can be no ground to invalidate the teſtimony upon which the ſaid viſcount was convicted, which could never legally be by one witneſs, and was in fact by the judgment of his peers, on the evidence of at leaſt three.

3. It is conceived, the ſaid judgment in the King's-bench was unprecedented, illegal, and highly derogatory to the honor, judicature, and authority of this court, who have power to queſtion and puniſh perjuries of witneſſes before them, and ought not to be impoſed upon by the judgments of inferior courts, or their attainder of a peer invalidated by implication; and the Popiſh plot, ſo condemned, purſued, and puniſhed by his late Majeſty and four parliaments, after public ſolemn devotion thro' the whole kingdom, by authority of church and ſtate, to be eluded to the arraignment and ſcandal of the government; and only for reſtoring the family of one Popiſh lord. And all this being without any matter judicially appearing before us to introduce the ſame; and the records of the trial not ſuffered to be read, for the information of the truth, before the paſſing of the bill.

4. For many other weighty reaſons, offered and given by diverſe peers in the two days debate of this bill, both at the commitee and in the houſe.

Kennet, p. 442.

Theſe reaſons plainly ſhew, in my opinion, that the lords, in paſſing this bill, deſigned rather to oblige the King than do juſtice to the memory of the lord Stafford. But the commons had not the ſame complaiſance, ſince it was droped after the ſecond reading, and never heard of more, they having no intention to ſtrengthen or incourage the Popiſh party (2).

Act of parliament in Scotland. Kennet, p. 426. Echard, Vol. III. p. 749.

The Scotiſh parliament was ſtill extremely zealous for the King's intereſt. Beſide the acts before mentioned, they paſſed one for granting the King, during life, the yearly ſum of two hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds; and another declaring, That the giving or taking the national covenant, or the ſolemn league and covenant, or owning them as lawful or obligatory, ſhould incur the crime of high treaſon.

Project of the earl of Argyle and the duke of Monmouth. Ibid. Burnet, p. 629.

Since the earl of Argyle's eſcape, after his condemnation in 1681, he had kept himſelf concealed at Amſterdam, very few perſons in Scotland knowing where he was. He waited there for a favorable opportunity either to make his peace with the King, or to raiſe an inſurrection in Scotland, where he thought he had many friends, and which would put him again in poſſeſſion of his eſtate. He believed a fair occaſion offered to put this project in execution after the death of Charles II, knowing that the duke of York, who was to ſucceed, was beloved neither in Scotland nor England. For tho', in both kingdoms, the government, and all the public offices were in the hands of the Tories, the earl of Argyle imagined, that if by his credit he could raiſe an army in Scotland, all the Preſbyterians would liſt under his banner, and then his party would be much ſuperior to the King's.

Ib. p. 624.

While he was full of theſe thoughts, the Prince of Orange foreſeeing, the King his father-in-law would ſpeedily deſire the States to deliver up the duke of Monmouth, adviſed him to retire elſewhere. The duke followed his advice and withdrew to Bruſſels. But fearing he was not ſafe there, and that the court of Spain would think proper to ſacrifice him to King James, he repaired privately to Amſterdam, where he had frequent conferences with Argyle. They had nothing in readineſs to make an attempt, which might have the leaſt appearance of ſucceſs. They were both without money, and not ſure of friends in England or Scotland to ſecond their projects. Mean time, the earl of Argyle, meeting at Amſterdam with a rich widow who lent him ten thouſand pounds, he was ſo incouraged by this unexpected ſupply, that he reſolved to make a deſcent in Scotland, where he hoped, that his name, his credit, and the cauſe he intended to ſupport, would procure him friends enough. But the duke of Monmouth was not in ſo favorable a ſituation. He flattered himſelf, that the enmity of the Whigs againſt the duke of York would revive, when they ſhould ſee one at the head of their party: but he had yet no private correſpondence with ſuch of the nobility and gentry, whoſe credit would be able to ſupport him, and moreover he he wanted money. However, the earl of Argyle perceiving how advantageous it would be to him, that the duke of Monmouth ſhould make an invaſion in England, while he himſelf ſhould do the like in Scotland, ſo managed that at length he perſuaded him to try the ſame fortune, tho' not till after the duke had long reſiſted his ſollicitations. Indeed, as the duke's affairs then ſtood it was a raſh undertaking, eſpecially as it was to be executed when the parliament was ſiting. But ſome of his friends, very unfit to manage ſuch a deſign, and who were tired with living in excile, did all they could to incourage him (1). He therefore promiſed Argyle, that as ſoon as he ſhould hear of his landing in Scotland, he would not fail to make a deſcent in England.

He lands in Scotland. Burnet, p. 631. Gazettes. Echard, Vol. III. p. 749.

On this poſitive promiſe, the earl of Argyle ſailed with three ſmall ſhips laden with arms for five thouſand men, having with him ſome German officers, and ſome ſoldiers liſted in Holland. He arrived the fifth of May before Orkney in the North of Scotland, and ſent his ſecretary on ſhore for intelligence how the country ſtood affected. But the ſecretary being ſeized and brought to Edinburg, the earl found nothing was to be done in thoſe parts. Wherefore he put to ſea again, and landed in the Weſt-Highlands, at a place called Dunſtafnage, a ruinous caſtle formerly his own. Here he left his arms and ammunition, and then publiſhed two declarations mentioned by the King in his ſpeech to both houſes. Whereupon the parliament of Scotland now ſiting, paſſed an act, That all the ſubjects of Scotland ſhould take the oath of allegiance anew, and aſſert the Royal prerogatives whenever they ſhould be required, upon pain of baniſhment or impriſonment.

He publiſhes two declarations. Kennet, p. 425, 426. Acts of the Scotiſh parliament. Echard, Vol. III. p. 751.

The King, as we have ſeen, communicated to the parliament of England but one of Argyle's declarations: however preſently after he imparted alſo the other. Whereupon both houſes came to this reſolution, That they would aſſiſt his Majeſty with their lives and fortunes, againſt the earl of Argyle and his adherents, and all other traitors whatſoever. The King very graciouſly thanked them, and in his anſwer to the lords, renewed his former promiſes.

The parliament of England reſolve to ſtand by the King. Kennet, p. 425.

The King confirmes his promiſes. p. 427.

The commitee appointed by the houſe of commons to manage religious affairs, and which, no doubt, conſiſted of the moſt zealous churchmen, conſidered the earl of Argyle's invaſion in Scotland, as an outrage commited by all the Preſbyterians of both kingdoms. Tho' the particulars of this invaſion could not yet be known, except only that the earl of Argyle was landed in Scotland, and had publiſhed two declarations, the commitee took occaſion to draw up two votes, viz. firſt, That it is the opinion of the commitee, that this houſe will ſtand by his Majeſty with their lives and fortunes, in defenſe of the reformed religion of the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed. Secondly, That an humble addreſs be preſented to his Majeſty, deſiring him to iſſue out a proclamation, to cauſe the penal laws to be put in execution againſt all Diſſenters whatſoever. This laſt vote was the pure effect of the commitee's prejudice, founded on the King's promiſe, that he would ſupport and preſerve the church of England to the utmoſt of his power. Probably, they imagined, the King, tho' a Papiſt, was ready to proceed with vigor againſt all the enemies of that church. But the previous queſtion being, whether the queſtion ſhould then be put for the houſe to agree with the commitee? it was carried in the negative. It was conſidered, it would not be agreeable to the King to cauſe the penal laws to be executed againſt all Diſſenters, and conſequently againſt thoſe of his own religion. On the other hand, it was not proper to confine the order to the Preſbyterians in particular, without mention of the Papiſts. For theſe reaſons, the houſe, after mature deliberation, came to the following reſolution, nemine contradicente, That this houſe doth acquieſce, and intirely rely, and reſt wholly ſatisfied on his Majeſty's gracious word, and repeated declaration, to ſupport and defend the religion of the church of England, as it is now by law eſtabliſhed, which is dearer to us than our lives.

Project of the commitee of religion againſt the Preſbyterians, is rejected. Echard, Vol. III. p. 751. May 27. Kennet, p. 441.

This vote cleary ſhews, that tho' the commons and Tories in general expreſſed a very great zeal for the King's intereſt, they had no intention to countenance the Romiſh religion, tho' ſome of their enemies have been pleaſed to draw ſuch an inference.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

Agreeably to this reſolution, when the revenue bill was ready, and the King come to the houſe of peers to give the Royal aſſent, the ſpeaker of the commons made the following ſpeech:

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

The ſpeaker's ſpeech to the King. May 30. Kennet, p. 427. Echard, Vol. III. p. 752.

"WE the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of "the houſe of commons aſſembled in par- "liament, do preſent to your Majeſty the revenue "you was pleaſed to demand at the opening of this "parliament, wherein we proceeded with as much "ſpeed, as the forms of paſſing bills of that nature "would admit. We bring not with it any bill for "the preſervation or ſecurity of our religion, which "is dearer to us than our lives. In that we ac- "quieſce intirely, and reſt wholly ſatisfied in your "Majeſty's gracious and ſacred word, repeated de- "clarations, and aſſurance to ſupport and defend "the religion of the church of England, as it is "now by law eſtabliſhed. We preſent this revenue "to your Majeſty, without the condition of any "additional, appropriating, or tacking clauſes what- "ſoever. And we humbly beſeech your Majeſty "to accept of it, and along with it our hearty "prayers, that God Almighty would bleſs you with "a long life, and happy reign to injoy it."

Upon the paſſing this bill, his Majeſty was pleaſed to make this ſpeech to both houſes: Gazette No. 2039.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Thank you very heartily for the bill you have "preſented me this day; and I aſſure you, the "readineſs and chearfulneſs that hath attended the "diſpatch of it, is as acceptable to me as the bill "itſelf. After ſo happy a begining, you may be- "lieve I would not call upon you unneceſſarily for "an extraordinary ſupply: but when I tell you, "that the ſtores of the navy and ordnance are ex- "tremely exhauſted; that the anticipations upon "ſeveral branches of the revenue are great and bur- "denſome; that the debts of the King my brother, "to his ſervants and family, are ſuch as deſerve "compaſſion; that the rebellion in Scotland, with- "out puting more weight upon it than it really "deſerves, muſt oblige me to conſiderable expenſe "extraordinary: I am ſure ſuch conſiderations will "move you to give me an aid to provide for thoſe "things, wherein the ſecurity, the eaſe, and the "happineſs of my government are ſo much con- "cerned. But above all I muſt recommend to "you the care of the navy, the ſtrength and glory "of this nation, that you would put it into ſuch a "condition, as may make us conſidered and re- "ſpected abroad. I cannot expreſs my concern "upon this occaſion more ſuitable to my own "thoughts of it, than by aſſuring you, I have a "true Engliſh heart, as jealous of the honor of the "nation as you can be; and I pleaſe myſelf with "the hopes, that by God's bleſſing, and your aſ- "ſiſtance, I may carry the reputation of it yet "higher in the world than ever it has been in the "time of any of my anceſtors. And as I will not "call upon you for ſupplies, but when they are of "public uſe and advantage, ſo I promiſe you, "that what you give me upon ſuch occaſions,

Remarks on this ſpeech.

If ever there was occaſion to repeat his promiſes concerning religion, and the nation's liberties, it was doubtleſs immediately after receiving from the houſe of commons ſo real a proof of their zeal, founded, as the ſpeaker ſaid, upon their confidence in the King's word. But it was by no means proper for the King to renew a promiſe he did not intend to perform. When this promiſe had procured him what he deſired, it was intirely forgot; and if it was ſometimes mentioned among the King's adherents, it was only to palliate the violation of it, as will appear hereafter.

The very moment the King thanked the commons for their noble preſent, they had occaſion to perceive their error, in not appointing the uſes to which ſuch an immenſe revenue ſhould be applied. It plainly appeared by the King's ſpeech, that he did not pretend to imploy this revenue ſolely in the uſual expenſes of the government, ſince, at that very time, he demanded a great and extraordinary aid, for all the other things enumerated by him, and even for the maintenance of the navy, as if his revenue had been too inconſiderable to ſupply his occaſions.

In fine, it muſt appear ſtrange, that James, for having gained one naval victory, ſhould affect to exalt himſelf above all his predeceſſors. This was a vanity which did not ſeem to become him. Beſide, it will hereafter be ſeen, that nothing was farther from his thoughts than the deſign of promoting the honor and reputation of the Engliſh nation. Nevertheleſs, the commons, highly pleaſed with the King's ſpeech, granted him an additional duty of exciſe upon wines and vinegar, with a further impoſition upon ſugar and tobacco.

Statute-b. 1 James II.

The earl of Argyle's proceedings. Burnet, p. 631, &c. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 753.

While theſe things paſſed in England, the earl of Argyle was indeavoring to ſtrengthen himſelf in Scotland, diſperſing declarations, and ſending letters upon letters to his relations and friends. But tho' he was in his own county of Argyle, and the inhabitants had been formerly his vaſſals, all he could do was to aſſemble two or three thouſand men. With this little army he croſſed over, and landed in the iſle of Bute. But within few days, having notice that a great number of forces, under the command of * the duke of Gordon, the marquiſs of Athol, the earl of Arran, and others, were advancing towards him from ſeveral parts, in order to ſurround him, he was forced to ſhift from iſland to iſland, to avoid them. This he could do without much difficulty, by means of his three ſhips, and ſeveral ſmall boats, till he heard that three men of war, and ſome frigates, would ſoon come and attack him. Then, he marched into Argyleſhire towards Inverary, ordering his veſſels and boats to come and join him. But they were hindered by contrary winds from doing it ſoon enough. So, finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, and conſidering that few came to join him, and that his troops began to deſert, he gave out that he intended to attack the marquiſs of Athol, who was at Inverary. But at the ſame time, he ordered the old caſtle of Ellengreg to be fortified in the beſt manner poſſible, and leaving his cannon there, with a gariſon of one hundred and eighty men, marched into Dumbartonſhire. The ſame day, the King's ſhips came up to the caſtle, with intent to batter it, but the caſtle ſurrendered upon firing of the firſt gun. By which the earl loſt five thouſand arms, five hundred barrels of powder, and all his cannon, beſide his three ſhips which were alſo then taken. This loſs ſo diſcouraged Argyle, as well as his officers, that from that moment they thought only of means to eſcape. But as, after the loſs of their ſhips, there was no way to fly out of Scotland, they retired from place to place with all poſſible ſpeed, even to the ſwimming of rivers. But they were ſo cloſely purſued, that they were obliged at length to diſperſe into ſmall parties (1), in order to ſave ſome, in caſe the reſt ſhould have the misfortune to be overtaken. At length, not to be tedious, I ſhall ſay in few words, the earl of Argyle having received a wound in his head, was obliged to quit his horſe, and run into the water up to his neck to ſave himſelf. In this poſture he was taken by a countryman, who threatened to knock him down if he would not ſubmit (2). This happened on the ſeventeenth of June, twenty-eight days after his firſt landing in Scotland. He was not ſuffered to languiſh long: for, being brought to Edinburg with great ignominy, his head was cut off in a few days, and placed on the Toll-Booth of the city (3). Rumbold, one of his friends and confidents, was likewiſe taken and executed with ſeveral others (4). Thus the King, without having contributed ſcarce any thing to it, ſaw himſelf delivered from the danger which threatened him from Scotland.

The duke of Monmouth ſails from Holland. Echard, Vol. III. p. 757. Kennet, p. 428. Burnet, p. 630, 640.

The duke of Monmouth, purſuant to his promiſe to Argyle, ſailed out of the Texel the twenty-fourth of May, with a ſmall man of war of thirty-two guns, and two other veſſels, He met with ſuch contrary winds, that he was nineteen days at ſea, tho' without being diſcovered by the King's ſhips which waited in the channel to intercept him, the King having had ſo early notice of his deſign, that Skelton, his Majeſty's envoy at the Hague, had obtained an order from the States to arreſt him: for which reaſon, the duke departed ſooner than he intended. At length, he landed the eleventh of June, with about eighty followers, in the Weſt of England, near Lyme, and the ſame day repaired to the town, where he was received without oppſition.

Lands at Lyme.

(1) It was then generally believed, that they were betrayed by ſir John Cockram, one of thoſe who came over with Argyle. For he undertaking to provide guides to conduct them ſafely into Galloway, and either miſtaking the way, or deſignedly miſleading them, he carried them into a bog, where they loſt their horſes and baggage. Kennet, p. 426.

(2) The earl preſented a piſtol to the countryman, but it miſſed fire. Whereupon the other gave him a blow on the head, which ſo ſtunned him that he fell, and in ſinking cried out, Unfortunate Argyle! Kennet, p. 427.

(3) Purſuant to the ſentenſe paſſed three years before, which made his death to be looked on as no better than murder. He juſtified all he had done; for he ſaid, he was unjuſtly attainted: and that had diſſolved his allegiance. He complained of the duke of Monmouth much, for delaying his coming ſo long after him, and for aſſuming the name of King, both which he ſaid was contrary to their agreement at parting. Burnet, p. 632.

(4) Ailoffe and Rumbold were taken, who, tho' Engliſhmen, had choſe rather to follow Argyle than Monmouth. Rumbold was the perſon that dwelt in Rye-Houſe, where it was pretended the plot was laid for murdering the late and preſent King. He denied the truth of that conſpiracy. He owned that he had heard many propoſitions at Weſt's chambers about killing the two brothers, and upon that he had ſaid, it could have been eaſily executed near his houſe; upon which ſome diſcourſe had followed how it might have been managed. But he ſaid, it was only talk, and that nothing was laid or ſo much as reſolved on. He ſaid he was for Kingly government, but did not believe that God had made the greater part of mankind with ſaddles on their backs, and bridles in their mouths, and ſome few booted and ſpurred to ride the reſt. When Ailoffe was brought to London and examined by the King, he refuſed to diſcover any thing. Whereupon the King ſaid, mr. Ailoffe, you know it is in my power to pardon you, therefore ſay that which may deſerve it. He anſwered, as it is ſaid, " Tho' it is in your power, it is not in your nature to pardon." He was nephew by marriage to the old earl of Clarendon. But that could not ſave him. Burnet, p. 633.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

Here he publiſhed a declaration againſt the King. As this declaration is well known, I ſhall only mention the moſt material things in it (1).

His declaration. Life of King James II. p. 102. Kennet, p. 428. Echard, Vol. III. p. 758.

In the preface he ſaid, "That government was "originally inſtituted by God, and this or that "form of it choſen and ſubmited to by men, for "the happineſs and ſecurity of the governed, and "not for the private intereſt, and perſonal great-"neſs of thoſe that rule. That the government of "England was, above all others, happy in its "primitive form, whereby the prerogatives of the "crown, and the privileges of the ſubjects were ſo "far from joſtling one another, that the peoples "rights tended to render the King great, and the "Prince's prerogatives were in order to the ſub-"jects protection and ſafety. But that all the "boundaries of the government had of late been "broken, and nothing left unattempted, for turn-"ing the limited Monarchy into an abſolute ty-"ranny"

Then the duke proceeded to impute to the King all the miſchiefs in the reign of Charles II, as, "the burning of London; the alliance with "France; the two wars with Holland; the Po-"piſh plot; Godfrey's murder; the Proteſtant "plot; the ſuborning witneſſes to ſwear the moſt "zealous patriots out of their lives; the hiring of "villains to aſſaſſinate the earl of Eſſex, and cau-"ſing others to be clandeſtinely cut off; the fre-"quent prorogations and diſſolutions of the par-"liaments."

Next he proceeded to what the duke of York had done ſince he aſſumed the title of King, as, "the "avowing himſelf of the Romiſh religion; his "publiſhing two proclamations, one whereof "required the collecting of the cuſtoms, and the "other continued that part of the exciſe which "was to expire at the King's death; his advancing "thoſe to the bench that were the ſcandal of the "bar, and conſtituting thoſe very men to declare "the laws who were branded in parliament for per-"verting them; his cauſing juries to be packed, "falſe returns to be made, and new illegal charters "to be granted, in order to have a parliament that "ſhould, inſtead of preſerving the peoples liber-"ties, eſtabliſh his arbitrarineſs, and confirm the "ſubjects thraldom." He declared moreover, "That he did not take up arms to revenge any "perſonal injuries, but ſolely for vindicating his "country's religion and laws." He did not fail however to affirm, "That his mother was lawful "wife of Charles II." In concluſion, he accuſed the King of poiſoning the late King his brother. The reſt of the declaration contained the uſual proteſtations and invitations in papers of this nature.

Tho' the facts contained in this declaration cannot be looked on as proofs that the King was guilty of what the duke of Monmouth laid to his charge, they may ſerve however to ſhew, that the King from that time was accuſed of them, at leaſt by ſome men, and that theſe accuſations were not invented after his being deprived.

Act of attainder againſt Monmouth. June 13. Gazette, No. 2042. Kennet. Echard. Burnet.

The King having communicated to both houſes the duke of Monmouth's landing at Lyme, they preſented an addreſs to him, aſſuring him of their zeal and aſſiſtance, and immediately after the commons proceeded to a bill of attainder againſt the duke of Monmouth (2). They alſo deſired his Majeſty at the ſame time to iſſue a proclamation, promiſing a reward of five thouſand pounds to any who ſhould bring in the duke dead or alive. The bill of attainder was diſpatched by the commons in two days, and in one by the lords.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

The ſixteenth of June the King came to the houſe of peers, and gave the Royal aſſent both to this bill and the money bills before mentioned. Two days after he ſent a meſſage to the commons, to acquaint them, that he judged it neceſſary for the members to be preſent in their reſpective counties, and therefore deſigned there ſhould be an adjournment in a few days; deſiring there might be a good fund for a preſent ſum of money, to anſwer the immediate charge his Majeſty muſt be at, on account of the duke of Monmouth's rebellion in the Weſt. Upon this meſſage the commons voted a ſupply of four hundred thouſand pounds for the King's preſent extraordinary occaſions.

The King demands money.

The two houſes were ſo expeditious to anſwer the King's deſires, that on the twenty-ſeventh of June there were twelve bills ready, moſt of them for the King's benefit; and on the ſecond of July, four more (3), beſide private bills. That day the parliament was adjourned to the fourth of Auguſt; but the lord keeper gave notice, that the King did not intend there ſhould be then a ſeſſion, but that the members about London ſhould meet and adjourn themſelves as there ſhould be occaſion, till winter, or till the King ſhould appoint the time by proclamation. Thus ended the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, having done in ſix weeks what no other ever did in many months.

Acts paſſed. Kennet, p. 430. Echard, Vol. III. p. 761.

The duke of Monmouth's followers, who were not above eighty-two when he landed at Lyme, increaſed to two thouſand in three or four days. This made him hope they would continually increaſe as he advanced into the country. Wherefore, he departed from Lyme the fifteenth of June, and the ſame day came to Axminſter. He thereby prevented Chriſtopher Monk duke of Albemarle, who with four thouſand of the militia, intended to go thither in order to beſiege him in Lyme. The duke of Monmouth being come to Axminſter, diſpoſed his troops in ſuch manner, that Albemarle, inſtead of attacking him, thought proper to retreat, perceiving his militia men had no inclination to do their duty. Albemarle's retreat inabled the duke of Monmouth to march to Taunton, where he arrived the eighteenth, and was received with loud acclamations. His army being conſiderably increaſed during a five or ſix days ſtay at Taunton, he imagined his affairs were in a proſperous way, and that all the country would join him. In this expectation he called a council, where it was reſolved he ſhould aſſume the title of King. He had already inſinuated in his declaration, that he was lawful ſon of Charles II, and thereby ſhown, that he pretended to the crown. But, in all appearance, he would not have taken the title ſo ſoon, had not thoſe about him (4) repreſented to him, that appearing in arms againſt a King actually on the throne, he muſt be accounted a rebel as long as that King's right was acknowleged: that therefore, neither the nobility nor people could have any pretenſe to join him; whereas by taking upon him the Royal ſtile, he would have the ſame advantage as James with regard to right. Probably, there was no occaſion to uſe many other arguments to prevail with him. What he had intimated in his declaration, plainly ſhows, that this was the end he propoſed to himſelf. The only thing therefore was to conſult about the moſt proper time for it. In ſhort, agreeably to the advice of thoſe he conſulted, he was proclaimed King at Taunton the twentieth of June by the name of James II.

He publiſhes three proclamations. Kennet, p. 431. Echard, Vol. III. p. 765.

He began his pretended reign with three proclamations. By the firſt, he promiſed the ſum of five thouſand pounds to any that ſhould bring the duke of York dead or alive. By the ſecond, he declared the parliament now ſiting a ſeditious aſſembly, and gave power to any that would to lay hold of the members as rebels and traitors, if they did not ſeparate before the end of June. The third was to declare the duke of Albemarle a traitor, who lay within ſix miles of Taunton with his militia men to attack him, if he found opportunity.

He marches to Bridewater,

The twenty-firſt of June the duke marched for Bridgewater. He was received there as at Taunton, eſpecially as his army was increaſed to five thouſand men, and might have been more numerous, had he been able to arm thoſe that offered their ſervice. Beſide arms, he wanted alſo good officers, ſcarce any but the meaneſt of the people having joined him. After cauſing himſelf to be proclaimed in Bridgewater, and his three proclamations to be read, he marched for Briſtol, where the inhabitants were inclined to receive him, had they not been awed by the duke of Beaufort their governor. He advanced however within three miles of the city, at the inſtance of ſome Briſtol men, who aſſured him, he would be received in ſpite of the governor and the gariſon. But in the mean time, he had notice that the King's forces were advancing, which made him alter his reſolution of attempting Briſtol to that of retreating to Bridgewater. He marched therefore towards Bath, and after vainly ſummoning that city to ſurrender, he beat up one of the King's quarters, * where lay a troop of horſe, which were intirely defeated (1). From thence he advanced to Frome, where he met with a chearful reception. But unhappily for him, the King's party had found means a few days before to diſarm all the inhabitants, ſo that he was diſappointed, his chief aim being to ſeize thoſe arms for ſuch of his men as wanted. At Frome he heard of the earl of Argyle's defeat, which threw him into a great conſternation. However, he reſolved to purſue his march, and return to Bridgewater.

The King makes ready.

During theſe tranſactions in the Weſt, the King was preparing at London, with all poſſible diligence, for his defenſe againſt an enemy who could not but make him extremely uneaſy: but he had not many regular troops, and thoſe were diſperſed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. This obliged him to raiſe the militia, particularly in the Weſtern counties, till the arrival of the ſix Engliſh and Scots regiments which were to come from Holland. On this occaſion, the Prince of Orange his ſon-in-law, ſent monſieur Bentinck, with an offer of his perſon to head his army; but the King did not think proper to accept it. Mean time, as he had no great confidence in the militia, he ſent down his guards, and all the regular troops he could aſſemble, and formed a little army of two thouſand foot, and ſeven hundred horſe and dragoons. He gave the command to Lewis Duras, earl of Feverſham, brother of the marſhals Duras and de Lorge, and nephew to the late mr. de Turenne. With theſe few forces, the earl of Feverſham incamped at a place called Sedgemore near Bridgewater, while ſeveral parties of the militia of the neighboring counties lay about him, under the command of the dukes of Beaufort, Somerſet, Albemarle, and the earl of Pembroke.

James II. An' 1685.

The duke of Monmouth, who was come to Bridgewater, looking upon himſelf as beſieged, and conſidering that the King's forces daily increaſed, while his own began to deſert, held a council of war, wherein it was reſolved to march in the night, and ſurprize the earl of Feverſham, who was incamped that day at Sedgemore, and according to the report of the ſpies, little expected to be attacked. Agreeably to this reſolution the duke began his march about eleven at night with profound ſilence, and within two hours fell in with Dunbarton's regiment, which, lying in an advanced poſt, gave the alarm to the Royal army, and by that they had time to draw up and receive their enemies. The particulars of the battle, which was fought about an hour after, are not well known. Thus much is certain, the duke of Monmouth's horſe commanded by the lord Grey behaved very ill (2), tho' ſuperior to the King's in number, and were routed at the firſt charge. The duke of Monmouth, in the head of the foot, long fought with great bravery. But being deſerted by his own, and attacked by the King's horſe, his army was at laſt forced to take to flight. The loſs of this battle was aſcribed to the little experience or cowardice of the lord Grey, who commanded the horſe, and was even ſuſpected of treachery. What confirmed this ſuſpicion was, that being made priſoner he eaſily obtained the King's pardon. It is ſaid moreover, that when he had ſo ill performed his duty, inſtead of indeavoring to rally the horſe, he rode up to the duke of Monmouth and told him, "all "was loſt, and it was more than time to ſhift for "himſelf (3)."

He is defeated. Kennet, p. 431, 432. Burnet, p. 644, 646.

This battle was fought at break of day on the ſixth of July. There were ſlain on the duke of Monmouth's ſide three hundred men on the ſpot, a thouſand in the purſuit, and as many taken priſoners. The duke retiring out of the fight, could ſcarcely rally fifty horſe to ſecure his retreat. But theſe being quickly diſperſed, he was obliged to fly on foot, accompanied only with a German count, whom he had brought with him from Holland. The lord Grey was taken on the morrow, and, the day after, the duke of Monmouth was found in a ditch covered with fern, with ſome green peaſe in his pocket. Probably he had eaten nothing elſe for two days. He was brought to the lord Lumley, who immediately conveyed him to London.

He is taken and ſent up to London. July 8.

The duke was no ſooner taken, but he believed himſelf loſt, and yet he retained ſome hopes that the King would be moved by his ſubmiſſion and repentance, and the Queen Dowager would intercede for him. In this belief, he wrote to the King for pardon, in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms he could deviſe, and which he thought moſt apt to move his compaſſion. He wrote alſo to the Queen Dowager, who really interceded for him, and prevailed with the King to ſee the unfortunate duke. She made no doubt, that ſince the King had conſented to ſee him, he intended to pardon him; but ſhe was miſtaken. The duke being brought to the King's preſenſe, threw himſelf at his feet, and begged his life in a very ſubmiſſive or rather abject manner.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

The King denies it.

The King, after aſking him ſome queſtions, made him ſign a declaration, whereby he owned, that the King his father aſſured him, he was never married to his mother. This done, the King told him, his crime was of too great a conſequence to be forgiven, and therefore he muſt prepare to die. The Queen, who was preſent, is ſaid to have inſulted his misfortune in an unmerciful manner. The duke ſeeing no hopes left, roſe from the King's feet with an air of bravery, which would have better become him when he firſt came into his preſenſe, and was carried to the Tower to prepare for death. The King's and Queen's behavior on this occaſion was thought very ſtrange; Princes not being uſed to admit criminals to their preſenſe, but when they deſign to grant them a pardon. I do not find in any hiſtorian, that the duke was proceeded againſt in the uſual forms; ſo probably, he was condemned by the King alone.

Welwood, p. 147.

Till his execution, the King ordered Turner biſhop of Ely to attend him, and prepare him for death. The duke wrote once more to the King for pardon, or at leaſt for a longer time, and deſired him to ſend him dr. Tenniſon (1) or any other divine. The King denied the two firſt articles of his requeſt, and appointed Ken biſhop of Bath and Wells, to go and acquaint him, that he muſt die the next morning.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 772. Burnet, p. 645.

He is prepared for death.

In the morning, July the fifteenth, dr. Tenniſon and dr. Hooper were brought to him, and attended him till the laſt hour of his life. By their exhortations they perſuaded him to give it in writing, that the King his father told him, he was never married to his mother. He confeſſed alſo that his invaſion was a ſin, but would never own it a rebellion. There was another point about which the two divines could not receive from him any ſatisfaction, viz. his living with the lady Herriot Wentworth, tho' he had a ducheſs of his own, and his pretending to be lawfully married to her before God, alleging, that his firſt marriage was null, as being too young when he gave his conſent. All the pains taken by the two divines to convince him of the falſhood of this opinion were fruitleſs; nay, he choſe rather to deprive himſelf of the communion, than own his ingagements with that lady to be unlawful.

He is executed.

When he was on the ſcaffold, he declared, he died a Proteſtant of the church of England. But Turner and Ken ſtoped him, and ſaid, that to be a member of the church of England he muſt believe the doctrine of Non-reſiſtance. He anſwered, he could not help it, but he could not believe it; yet he approved the doctrine of the church in all other things. At laſt, he laid his head on the block, which was not ſevered from his body till the fifth ſtroke. Thus died the duke of Monmouth, who had long been the peoples idol, and whom James always conſidered as a very formidable rival. Charles II died very ſeaſonably to free the duke his brother from the uneaſineſs created him by this competitor. But tho' James had mounted the throne, the duke of Monmouth indangered his crown. Neither the victory at Sedgemore, nor Argyle's defeat in Scotland could be aſcribed to the valor or conduct of the King, but to meer chance, or rather to the direction of providence, which, for the welfare of England, was pleaſed to uſe properer means to be more plainly diſtinguiſhed.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

The King takes a cruel revenge on his enemies. Jefferies and Kirk ſent into the Weſt. Bloody Aſſizes. Kennet. Echard.

The King being thus eaſed of his greateſt fears, gave himſelf over intirely to the paſſion of revenge on thoſe who directly or indirectly had aſſiſted the duke of Monmouth. To this intent, the lord chief juſtice Jefferies was ſent, with four judges aſſiſtants, into the Weſt, with a ſpecial commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, to try the late rebels; and major general Kirk was ordered to attend him with a body of troops to keep the people in awe. It was not poſſible for the King to find in the whole kingdom, two men more deſtitute of religion, honor, and humanity. They were two cruel and mercileſs tygers, that delighted in blood. I ſhall relate here but ſome few of their barbarous actions: for a particular account of all their proceedings would be too great a digreſſion.

Barbarous proceeding of Jefferies. Bloody Aſſizes. Burnet, p. 648, 650. State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 105. Sep. 2.

At Wincheſter, the widow of lord Liſle (2), one of King Charles I's judges, was brought before him to be tried. Her crime was the harboring and concealing mr. Hickes a Preſbyterian miniſter (3) of the duke of Monmouth's party, tho' his name was in no proclamation, and one Nelthorp who was a ſtranger to her. The Jury not ſatisfied with the evidence, brought her in not guilty. But Jefferies in great fury ſent them out again. They found her not guilty three times: but Jefferies threatening them with an attaint of jury, ſhe was brought in guilty, and executed accordingly, being above ſeventy years old (4).

Kennet. p. 433. R. Coke.

At Dorcheſter, Jefferies, to ſhorten his work, told thirty priſoners, that if they expected any favor they ſhould plead guilty. But as they did not care to take that method, he condemned twenty-nine, who were immediately executed.

In another place, two hundred perſons being indicted, Jefferies poſitively promiſed a pardon to ſuch as ſhould plead guilty, and of the two hundred, he ordered fourſcore to be hanged.

In fine, not to inlarge on ſuch a ſcene of horror, it ſuffices to ſay, that Jefferies condemned five hundred perſons, whereof two hundred and thirty were executed, according to the loweſt computation (5), and their quarters ſet up in the highways. Jefferies himſelf gloried in this barbarity, and boaſted, that he had hanged more men than all the judges of England ſince William the Conqueror. And yet he would have carried his cruelty farther, had not many purchaſed his favor with their eſtates. One mr. Prideaux (6) alone gave him fourteen thouſand pounds to ſave his life. As for thoſe that had not money enough to buy pardons at his price, they were either hanged, or cruelly whiped, or ſold for ſlaves into the American plantations.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 775.

And of Kirk. Ibid. Kennet, p. 434. Burnet, p. 647.

Kirk was not behind Jefferies either in cruelty or inſolence. Immediately after the duke of Monmouth's defeat, being ſent to Taunton, he cauſed nineteen perſons, by his own authority, without any trial or proceſs, and without ſuffering their wives or children to ſpeak with them, to be hanged with pipes playing, drums beating, and trumpets ſounding. It was this doubtleſs, that made him worthy to be an aſſiſtant to Jefferies.

In the ſame town of Taunton, Kirk having invited his officers to dinner, ordered thirty condemned perſons to be hanged while they were at table, viz. ten in a health to the King, ten in a health to the Queen, and ten in a health to Jefferies. But one action he commited in another town is beyond all imagination. A young girl throwing herſelf at his feet to beg her father's (1) life, he drew her in to proſtitute herſelf to him, with the promiſe of granting her requeſt. But having ſatisfied his brutal luſt, he was ſo inhuman, as out of the window, to preſent the credulous girl with the ſight of her father hanging on the ſign poſt. This ſad ſpectacle ſo affected the poor girl, that ſhe fell diſtracted.

Father Orleans refuted.

Father Orleans, who wrote from the mouth of James II, not being able to deny theſe barbarous executions, indeavors to excuſe them two ways. He ſays firſt, that the King was informed of them too late to prevent them, and that the great ſervices performed by Jefferies and Kirk, prevailed with him to ſpare them (2). He ſays, in the next place, that the King made amends for theſe injuſtices, as far as lay in his power, by the general pardon he afterwards granted. But it is eaſy to perceive, how vain theſe excuſes are, if it is conſidered, that when Kirk was charged with theſe cruelties, he anſwered, that Jefferies and himſelf acted far ſhort of the King's inſtructions. Again the King was ſo little diſpleaſed with Jefferies's conduct, that at his deſire he made him lord chancellor (3), the lord keeper North dying while the chief juſtice was exerciſing his cruelties in the Weſt. As for the general pardon, it was not publiſhed till ſeveral months after all theſe executions, when there were no more guilty to be found. The court muſt have believed, that very few could have the benefit of the pardon, ſince a company of young girls, from ten to twelve years old, were inſerted by name, who, with chaplets of flowers on their head, had preſented a bible to the duke of Monmouth, at his entry into Taunton.

Several executions in London.

It was not only in the Weſtern counties that the King gave ſenſible proofs of his revengeful temper. The city of London was witneſs alſo of ſeveral executions in October, among others, of Elizabeth Gaunt, who was publicly burnt for harboring one of the duke of Monmouth's adherents (4). Six men were hanged at Tyburn as traitors, for crimes of the like nature, and what is more ſuprifing without any previous trial.

Of alderman Corniſh. Ibid. Kennet, p. 438. Burnet, p. 651. Echard, Vol. III. p. 776.

But the execution that made moſt noiſe, was that of alderman Corniſh. This man, who was ſherif of London, at the time of the diſcovery of the Popiſh plot, had been very active on that occaſion, which was grown an unpardonable crime in the preſent reign. Corniſh, whoſe name had hardly been mentioned in the Rye-houſe-plot, not ſuſpecting any thing, and following his profeſſion, was ſeized on Tueſday the thirteenth of October, and hurried to Newgate without being allowed the uſe of pen, ink, and paper. The next Saturday evening, he had notice that he was indicted of high-treaſon, and that his trial was to be on Monday morning. On the morrow, he ſent to the King a petition for a longer time, alleging that he did not even know wherein conſiſted the treaſon he was accuſed of. The King refered his petition to the judges, who abſolutely denied his requeſt. He was charged with conſpiring againſt King Charles II, with the lord Ruſſel, and the reſt who had been executed for that affair, and condemned upon the evidence of the ſame witneſſes, tho' he ſhewed, in their depoſitions, manifeſt contradictions, and viſible improbabilities. But it was reſolved to revenge the death of thoſe who ſuffered for the Popiſh plot, upon ſuch as had been moſt active againſt the Papiſts. Corniſh was executed as a traitor, the twenty-third of October. But the parliament, in the year 1688, reverſed the ſentenſe, as well as thoſe of ſome others, who had unjuſtly ſuffered in the beginning of this reign.

Of Bateman the ſurgeon. Dec. 18. Id. p. 162. Echard, Vol. III. p. 780.

The laſt that died for the Proteſtant plot, was Charles Bateman, a noted ſurgeon, who was accuſed of holding ſeveral ſeditious diſcourſes at that time againſt the government. But many people believed, his chief crime conſiſted in his compaſſion to Titus Oates, having conſtantly attended him after his cruel ſcourgings, and uſed all his ſkill to cure his wounds. This man, who did not expect to be accuſed, grew diſtracted during his impriſonment, and the court was ſo well ſatisfied of it, that his ſon was permited to make his defenſe for him. But his condition did not prevent his being condemned and executed.

The King's flouriſhing condition.

The King was then in a flouriſhing ſtate. His two greateſt enemies were deſtroyed, and by his revenge upon thoſe that had offended him, as well in his own, as in his brother's reign, he had ſtruck ſuch a terror into the whole kingdom, that no man dared ſo much as to think of reſiſting. The Whigs were intirely humbled, the Tories were triumphant, and the doctrine of Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance was openly preached, as an eſſential article of the faith of the church of England. The King had a parliament, which ſought only to give him marks of their zeal, and ever ready to ſupply him with money for all extraordinary occaſions, without his being obliged to expend his revenue. His army greatly contributed to make him feared, and keep the people in awe. Scotland was intirely ſubdued, and the managers of the affairs of that kingdom ſeemed only to mind the inlarging of the prerogative Royal. As for Ireland, it will preſently be ſeen, that he had loſt no time in puting that kingdom into the ſtate he defired. In fine, the Princes of Europe conſidering him as a Monarch able to incline the balance to which ſide he pleaſed, made, as I may ſay, their court to him, either to gain him, or at leaſt to hinder him from being their enemy.

He forms new projects.

What therefore did James II want to render his happineſs complete? One thing, which affected him more than all the reſt, but which he could not hope to obtain, without hazarding all his other advantages. This was, to make all his ſubjects Papiſts, or at leaſt, oblige them to pretend to be ſo: but this was not a thing eaſy to be accompliſhed, by reaſon of the great ſuperiority of the Proteſtants in England and Scotland. Nevertheleſs, he attempted it, imagining, that the opportunity was too favorable to be neglected. But as at firſt he uſed very groſs artifices, obvious to all the world, he was obliged to ſupport them with force, and to that end, he was to ſet himſelf above the laws. Theſe two projects, of eſtabliſhing an arbitrary government, and deſtroying the Proteſtant religion, were not of a late date. Every one knew they had long been in hand. But the Engliſh did not expect, the King would violate his repeated promiſes to ſupport and defend the religion eſtabliſhed by law:

nay, ſome were ſo ſtrangely blind, as to think it impoſſible for the King to break his word. But they were afterwards too ſenſible of their error. All the reſt of this reign conſiſts only in the means uſed by the King to execute this deſign, and in the meaſures taken by the Engliſh at laſt to ſtop his career. Reaſons which ſhould have withheld the King from following them.

Many things ſhould have diverted the King from forming ſuch projects. Firſt, the difficulty of the execution, which might have been eaſily foreſeen. For if it be conſidered, that the Papiſts of England are not the thouſandth part of the nation, it muſt be thought ſtrange, that with this thouſandth part it is attempted to compel the reſt to change their religion. I ſay compel, for what likelihood is there that without compulſion, a whole nation ſhould be perſuaded to quit their religion and imbrace another, for which they have the utmoſt abhorence? It will, perhaps, be ſaid, that James had almoſt accompliſhed it, and that without a foreign aid, the Engliſh would have been forced to ſubmit to the yoke. But the inconſiderableneſs of this aid demonſtrates, he was yet very far from his ends.

Secondly, as to the abſolute power, which muſt have been eſtabliſhed, in order to introduce a religion contrary to that of the whole kingdom, he was much miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that France would lend him a powerful aid for that purpoſe. For it was not the intereſt of Lewis XIV, to render the King of England abſolute, but only to raiſe commotions in that kingdom, which, by keeping England imployed, ſhould facilitate the execution of his ambitious projects.

Welwood. p. 133, &c.

Thirdly, if the examples of Edward II, and Richard II, as too remote from his time, made no impreſſion on him, he ſhould have conſidered that of the King his father, who, for indeavoring to ſtretch the prerogative Royal, and for being only ſuſpected of intending to introduce Popery, loſt his head on the ſcaffold. It has been ſeen, that Charles I, in the time of his afflictions, wrote to the Prince his eldeſt ſon to take warning by him, not to aſſume more power than belonged to him. Moreover, when he was brought on the ſcaffold, he took off his George, and gave it to dr. Juxon ſaying, Remember. The council of State being willing to know the meaning of that expreſſion, Juxon anſwered, "That the King immediately before "his coming out to the place of execution, had "charged him to carry to the Prince his George, "with theſe his two laſt commands, That he "ſhould forgive his murderers; and, if ever he "came to the crown, he ſhould ſo govern, as not "to force them upon extremities." The Queen-Dowager, as ſhe was going into Somerſet-houſe, after the reſtoration of Charles II ſaid, "Had I "known the Engliſh ſome years ſince, as well as "I do now, I ſhould never have been forced to "leave this palace." In fine, Charles II, when at the point of death, told the duke his brother, "not to think of introducing the Roman Catholic "religion into England, it being a dangerous and "impracticable thing." Theſe warnings, which could not be ſuſpected by the King, ought to have made him ſeriouſly conſider what he was about to do.

Puffendorf's Life of the Elect. of Brandenb.

Fourthly, Don Pedro Ronquillo, the Spaniſh embaſſador, at his firſt audience after the King's acceſſion to the crown, told him, "That he ſaw "ſeveral Prieſts about him, who would importune "him to alter the eſtabliſhed religion; but wiſhed "his Majeſty not to hearken to their advice, for "if he did, he would have reaſon to repent of it "when it was too late." The King taking ill the embaſſador's freedom, aſked him, in a paſſion, "Whether, in Spain, the King adviſed with his "confeſſors? Yes, Sir (replied Don Pedro) and "that is the reaſon our affairs go ſo ill."

Ibid.

James II. An' 1685.

Fifthly, Pope Innocent XI, in a letter to the King on his coming to the crown, told him, "That he was highly pleaſed with his zeal for "the Catholic religion: but was afraid he would "carry it too far, and inſtead of contributing to his "own greatneſs, and the advancement of religion, "he would do both himſelf and the Catholic church "the greateſt prejudice, by attempting that which "could never ſucceed."

Ibid.

Laſtly, it was evident, that the King could not hope to ſucceed in his undertaking but by force, and that this force wholly lay in his army and fleet. But was it not a ſtrange project, to attempt to reduce by force a Proteſtant kingdom to the Catholic religion, with a Proteſtant army, and a fleet, whoſe commanders and mariners were Proteſtants? He had but too much reaſon to perceive his error, when it was too late to apply a remedy.

Theſe conſiderations, examples, and warnings, were ineffectual againſt the impetuous zeal of the King, and the importunities of thoſe who were admited to his ſecret counſels, and particularly the Queen. He attempted at once two things equally difficult, viz. to ſet himſelf above the laws, and to alter the eſtabliſhed religion. When I ſay he attempted it, I mean, openly and bare faced, for it was no new deſign. It had been formed long ſince, and, not to carry back its begining too far, it ſuffices to obſerve, that the execution of it had been privately laboring about twenty years; and that moreover, James did but purſue the ſcheme he had perhaps himſelf framed, when duke of York. It was not therefore the duke of Monmouth's defeat that inſpired James II with the thoughts of becoming abſolute, and altering the eſtabliſhed religion. His good fortune to conquer that rival, ſerved only to put him upon haſtening the execution of his projects. This manifeſtly appears, when it is conſidered, what paſſed in Ireland ſince the begining of his reign.

The King's procedings in Ireland. Kennet, p. 466. Burnet, p. 654. Echard.

About two months after the King's acceſſion to the crown, he recalled the duke of Ormond from Ireland, and appointed two lords juſtices to manage that kingdom (1). The duke of Ormond was not a proper inſtrument for the King's purpoſes. At the ſame time, the privy council of Ireland was diſſolved, and a new one appointed, into which were admited ſeveral known Papiſts. Soon after, their number was ſo increaſed, that they made the major part of the council, ſo that the Proteſtants no longer aſſiſted, that they might not authoriſe by their preſenſe, ſuch reſolutions as it was in vain to oppoſe. When the council was thus modelled, nothing was heard in Ireland, but impeachments againſt the Proteſtants, for being concerned in the Rye houſe-plot, and afterwards for holding correſpondence with the duke of Monmouth, or his adherents. The moment any perſon was accuſed, he was ſent to priſon by the council, without being admited to bail, or brought to a trial. The earl of Granard, one of the lord juſtices, and a good Proteſtant, weary of being an inſtrument to thoſe acts of injuſtice, deſired to be diſmiſſed. But the King denied him, and ſent him a letter under his own hand, aſſuring him, "That nothing ſhould be acted prejudicial to " the Proteſtant intereſt." But it ſoon appeared, that the King never meaned to perform this promiſe: for very ſhortly after, he reſolved to have a ſtanding army of Papiſts in Ireland, and to diſarm the Proteſtants. This laſt article was firſt put in practiſe. The King wrote to the lord juſtices, Kennet, p. 447.

" That there was reaſon to believe, that the rebellion of Monmouth had been of that ſpreading " contagion, as to reach Ireland, and therefore it " was not ſafe to have the arms of the militia diſperſed abroad; but they would be in greater " readineſs for the uſe of the militia, and the defenſe of the country, to have them depoſited in " the ſeveral ſtores of each county." Upon this order, the lords juſtices publiſhed a proclamation, agreeable to the King's deſire, and the city of Dublin having brought in their arms, their example was followed by all the country.

The Proteſtants being thus diſarmed, means were deviſed to turn the Proteſtant, into a Catholic army. To this end, colonel Richard Talbot, a virulent Papiſt, was impowered to caſhier ſuch officers and ſoldiers as he thought proper. He was the man of all others moſt odious to the Engliſh Proteſtants in Ireland. It is obſervable, that Titus Oates, in his narrative of the Popiſh plot, named him as deſigned for this very ſervice. So, when the event was ſeen to agree ſo well with what Oates had related, many could not help thinking, either that he had been well informed, or was a good prophet.

Talbot having received this commiſſion, broke many officers, on pretenſe that they had born arms againſt the King during the troubles, or were ſons and relations of thoſe who had ſerved the parliament of Cromwell. It muſt be obſerved, that all this paſſed in Ireland, before or immediately after the duke of Monmouth's defeat, at a time when the King had not yet manifeſted his deſigns in England. That I may not be obliged frequently to return to what was tranſacting in Ireland, I ſhall briefly add here, that about the end of the year, Talbot came into England, and was made earl of Tyrconnel, and lieutenant general of the Iriſh army, and ſhortly after, Henry earl of Clarendon was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland.

The parliament of England, after ſeveral adjournments, meeting at laſt on the ninth of November, the King made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

The King's ſpeech to both houſes. Gazette No. 2085.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" AFTER the ſtorm that ſeemed to be coming upon us when we parted laſt, I " am glad to meet you all again in ſo great peace " and quietneſs; God Almighty be praiſed, by " whoſe bleſſing that rebellion was ſuppreſſed; but " when I reflect what an inconſiderable number of " men began it, and how long they carried it on " without any oppoſition, I hope every body will " be convinced, that the militia, which hath " hitherto been ſo much depended on, is not ſufficient for ſuch occaſions; and that there is nothing but a good force of well diſciplined troops " in conſtant pay, that can defend us, from ſuch, " as either at home or abroad, are diſpoſed to " diſturb us. And in truth, my concern for the " peace and quiet of my ſubjects, as well as for " the ſafety of the government, made me think " it neceſſary to increaſe the number to the proportion I have done; this I owed as well to the " honor, as to the ſecurity of the nation, whoſe reputation was ſo infinitely expoſed to all our neighbors, by having lain open to this late wretched " attempt, that it is not to be repaired without " keeping ſuch a body of men on foot, that none " may ever have the thought again of finding us " ſo miſerably unprovided. It is for the ſupport " of this great charge, which is now more than " double to what it was (1), that I aſk your aſſiſtance, in giving me a ſupply anſwerable to the " expenſe it brings along with it; and I cannot " doubt, but what I have begun, ſo much for the " honor and defenſe of the government, will be " continued by you with all the chearfulneſs and " readineſs, that is requiſite for a work of ſo great " importance.

" Let no man take exception, that there are ſome " officers in the army not qualified, according to the " late teſt, for their imployments: the gentlemen, " I muſt tell you, are moſt of them well known " to me; and having formerly ſerved me on ſeveral " occaſions, and always approved the loyalty of " their principles by their practiſe, I think them " fit now to be imployed under me; and will deal " plainly with you, that after having had the benefit of their ſervices in ſuch time of need and " danger, I will neither expoſe them to diſgrace, " nor myſelf to the want of them, if there ſhould " be another rebellion to make them neceſſary to " me. I am afraid ſome men may be ſo wicked, " to hope and expect, that a difference may happen " between you and me upon this occaſion: But " when you conſider, what advantages have riſen " to us in a few months, by the good underſtanding we have hitherto had; what wonderful effects " it hath already produced in the change of the " whole ſcene of affairs abroad, ſo much more to " the honor of the nation, and the figure it ought " to make in the world; and that nothing can " hinder a farther progreſs in this way to all our " ſatisfactions, but fears and jealouſies among ourſelves; I will not apprehend that ſuch a misfortune can befal us, as a diviſion, or but a coldneſs " between me and you; nor that any thing can " ſhake you in your ſteadineſs and loyalty to me, " who, by God's bleſſing, will ever make you " all returns of kindneſs and protection, with " a reſolution to venture even my own life in " the defenſe of the true intereſt of this king" dom."

James II. An' 1685.

This ſpeech equally ſurpriſed both houſes of parliament, and the whole kingdom, when it came to be publiſhed. The Engliſh had often ventured their lives in the defenſe of their laws and liberties, of which they then believed themſelves ſecure, as well by the conſtitution of the government, as by the King's ſolemn promiſe; but they beheld their laws openly attacked in the moſt ſenſible part. Many of thoſe who had moſt warmly oppoſed the bill of excluſion, began to open their eyes, and perceive, that the jealouſies and fears of the Whig parliaments were too well grounded, and that it was difficult to reconcile the intereſts of a Roman Catholic King, with thoſe of a Proteſtant kingdom. This was what the Whigs had in vain declared in the late reign. Inſtead of duly weighing their reaſons, the Tories had run into the other extreme; nay, had expected to be gainers by ſeting the duke of York on the throne. But this firſt public ſtep of the King, made them proceed for the future with a little more circumſpection, tho' by their principles, they were not yet obliged to take ſuch meaſures as would have been neceſſary.

People's eyes begin to be opened. Echard, Vol. III. p. 781.

It was warmly debated in the houſe of lords, whether they ſhould give the King thanks for his ſpeech. Some were utterly againſt it; whereupon the marquis of Hallifax ſaid, " They had now

" more reaſon than ever to give thanks to his Ma-
" jeſty, ſince he had dealt ſo plainly with them,
" and diſcovered what he would be at." Nevertheleſs, it was reſolved by the majority, that they ſhould give his Majeſty thanks. But however, the biſhop of London moved, that his Majeſty's ſpeech might be debated, and tho' it was unuſual in the houſe, the twenty-third of the month was appointed to take the ſpeech into conſideration, at which the King was highly diſguſted.

The commons deſer it. Nov. 12. Life of James II. p. 120. Kennet, p. 435. Echard.

The commons returning to their houſe, the King's ſpeech was ordered to be read, which was followed with a long and profound ſilence. At length the earl of Middleton moved for an addreſs of thanks to the King for his ſpeech. This motion produced a ſecond ſilence, which was broke by the lord Caſtleton, who, more bold than the reſt, plainly declared againſt thanking the King. Wherefore, as there would probably be ſome difficulty in the matter, the debate was adjourned till the twelfth of the month. To give the reader a clear idea of the difficulties which occured in the King's demand, I ſhall make here ſome obſervations which perhaps will not be foreign to the purpoſe.

Obſervations on this matter.

The houſe of commons, as I ſaid, conſiſted then of Tory members, there being very few Whigs, or if any, their number was inconſiderable. Now the Tories had a very different notion of the Regal power, from that of the Whigs. They had, as we have ſeen, declared in the late reign for Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance, and the church made it an article of faith. Nevertheleſs it may be ſaid, when they introduced this doctrine without any limitation, they did not foreſee all the conſequences. It was properly to contradict the principles of the Whigs, who ran into the other extreme. As they imagined, that Charles II and James II, were for them, they fancied they could not ſtretch the Royal prerogative too far, in the belief, that theſe two Princes would exert it only againſt their adverſaries. According to this principle, King James's demand for a ſtanding army of fifteen thouſand men in time of peace, did not ſeem contrary to their intereſt, tho' the parliaments had ever been extremely averſe to a ſtanding army, which ſerved only to increaſe the Regal power. But what the King did by his ſole authority; in imploying Popiſh officers in this army, was a thing as much againſt the Tory as the Whig intereſt. It was eaſy to perceive, of what dangerous conſequences it might be to the Proteſtant religion in general, as well Epiſcopalian as Preſbyterian; and theſe conſequences were the more to be dreaded, as what paſſed in Ireland plainly diſcovered the King's intentions. Beſide, the power aſſumed by the King, to exempt the Popiſh officers from taking the teſt, was directly contrary to the liberties of the kingdom as well as to religion.

A ſupply voted. Life of James II, p. 120, &c. Kennet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 782. Burnet.

Therefore on the twelfth of November, when the King's ſpeech was debated in the houſe of commons, ſuch members as were not of the ſame principles with the rigid and violent Tories, ſpoke with great freedom, repreſenting the inconveniencies of a ſtanding army in time of peace (1), and moved for the new modelling the militia, ſo as to render them of uſe upon occaſion. They were permited to talk as much as they pleaſed, but when the queſtion was put for a ſupply to be given to the King, it was carried in the affirmative. It is true, ſome one having moved that theſe words might be added, ' towards the ſuppport of the additional forces,' they were rejected, that the houſe might not appear to approve of the augmentation of the regular troops, and inſtead thereof it paſſed, that ' the houſe be moved ' to bring in a bill to make the militia uſeful.' By this they would have had it believed, that the parliament reſerved to themſelves the power of breaking the regular troops, and eſtabliſhing a good militia in their room. But, doubtleſs, it was to hinder the people from being alarmed, if they ſaw the parliament approve of maintaining an army in time of peace. For, after all, a ſupply was given the King for the maintenance of this army.

JAMES II. AN' 1685.

The courtiers moved for a ſum to be granted of twelve hundred thouſand pounds. Others exclaimed againſt the exorbitancy of ſuch a demand, and were for reducing it to four hundred thouſand pounds, alleging, that it would be enough to maintain the additional forces two years, till the militia ſhould be made uſeful. They repreſented, that they had already given cuſtoms and exciſes for his Majeſty's life, which amounted to ſix millions (2), and that if they gave ſo much at once, they ſhould have nothing left to give; eſpecially as it was the nation's intereſt, that the King ſhould have frequent occaſion for his parliament. At length, after great debates it was reſolved, that a ſupply of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be granted to his Majeſty. It was evident therefore, that the maintenance of an army of fifteen thouſand men was not what moſt diſpleaſed the commons in the King's ſpeech.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 783.

Debates about Popiſh officers.

But the affair of the Popiſh officers was of ſuch a nature, that it no leſs concerned the Tory than the Whig party. It was eaſy to perceive the great danger of the Proteſtant religion, if the parliament, after having agreed to a ſtanding army, ſhould farther conſent to the King's imploying as many Papiſts as he pleaſed. The commons thought therefore, that on this occaſion it was neceſſary to ſet ſome bounds to Paſſive-obedience, tho' till now this doctrine had been maintained without any reſtriction, becauſe it was not imagined that the King would attack religion and the laws. One of the members ſpeaking on this ſubject, repreſented very ſtrongly,

The reſult was, the appointing a commitee to draw up the following addreſs, which was preſented to the King the ſeventeenth of November.

The commons addreſs. Kennet, p. 435. R. Coke. p. 349.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

" WE your Majeſty's moſt loyal and faithful " ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſ- " ſembled, do, in the firſt place, as in duty bound, " return your Majeſty our moſt humble and hearty " thanks, for your great care and conduct in ſup- " preſſing the late rebellion, which threatened the " overthrow of this government both in church " and ſtate, to the extirpation of our religion as " by law eſtabliſhed, which is moſt dear unto us, " and which your Majeſty hath been pleaſed to " give us REPEATED ASSURANCES you will al- " ways defend and maintain; which, with all " grateful hearts we ſhall ever acknowlege. We " farther crave leave to acquaint your Majeſty, " that we have, with all duty and readineſs, taken " into our conſideration your Majeſty's gracious " ſpeech to us: and as to that part of it relating " to the officers in the army, not qualified for their " imployments, according to an act of parliament " made in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of " your Royal brother, intitled, 'An Act for " preventing dangers which may happen from Po- " piſh recuſants;' we do, out of our bounden " duty, humbly repreſent unto your Majeſty, that " theſe officers cannot by law be capable of their " imployments; and that the incapacities they " bring upon themſelves that way, can no way be " taken off but by an act of parliament: there- " fore, out of that great reverence and duty we " owe unto your Majeſty, who have been gra- " ciouſly pleaſed to take notice of their ſervices to " your Majeſty, we are preparing a bill to paſs " both houſes, for your Royal aſſent, to indem- " nify them from the penalties they have now " incured: and becauſe the continuing them in " their imployments, may be taken to be a diſ- " penſing with that law, without an act of parlia- " ment, the conſequences of which is of the greateſt " concern to the rights of your Majeſty's ſubjects, " and to all the laws made for the ſecurity of their " religion; we therefore, the knights, citizens, " and burgeſſes, of your Majeſty's houſe of " commons, do moſt humbly beſeech your Ma- " jeſty, that you would be moſt graciouſly pleaſed " to give ſuch directions therein, that no appre- " henſions of jealouſies may remain in the hearts " of your Majeſty's moſt loyal ſubjects."

This addreſs being preſented to the King by the ſpeaker, attended by the whole houſe, his Majeſty gave them the following anſwer:

Gentlemen, " I did not expect ſuch an addreſs " from the houſe of commons: for having ſo lately " recommended to your conſideration the great ad- " vantage a good underſtanding between us had " produced in a very ſhort time, and given you " warning of fears and jealouſies amongſt our- " ſelves, I had reaſon to hope, that the reputation " God had bleſſed me with in the world, would " have ſealed and confirmed a good confidence in " you of me, and of all that I ſay to you. But " however you proceed on your part, I will be " ſteady in all my promiſes I have made you, and " be juſt in my word in this, and all my other " ſpeeches."

The commons ſeek to content the King. Kennet, p. 436. Life of James II, p. 134. Echard, Vol. III. p. 785. Burnet.

This anſwer, tho' pretty obſcure, ſo ſurprized the commons, that when it was read in the houſe, there was a profound ſilence for a conſiderable time. At length, it was moved by one of the members, that a particular day might be appointed to conſider of the King's anſwer. This was ſeconded by mr. Coke * who added, " He hoped " they were all true Engliſhmen, and not to be " frighted out of their duty by a few hard words." Tho' this ſpeech was very conſiſtent with the freedom of a houſe of commons, the majority however were pleaſed to look upon mr. Coke as an incendiary, who intended to ſow diſcord between the King and the commons, and voted him to be ſent to the Tower. Moreover the houſe, to attone in ſome meaſure for the offenſe they had given the King, proceeded to ways and means for raiſing the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds before voted. But they ſtoped not there. To ſhew the King that they ſought all poſſible ways to content him, beſide a bill to indemnify the Popiſh officers from the penalties they had already incured, they reſolved to offer another to the King, to qualify ſuch a number of thoſe officers to ſerve in the army as he ſhould think fit. All this demonſtrates, it was with regret that the houſe ſwerved from the principle of Paſſive-obedience and Non-reſiſtance.

Petitions from the lords priſoners. Nov. 9, 11. Kennet, p. 436.

In the mean time, the lords received petitions from † earl of Stanford and ‖ lord Delamere, repreſenting, that theſe two peers were commited to the Tower in July laſt, upon a general accuſation of treaſon, kept cloſe priſoners, and denied the uſe of pen, ink and paper. Theſe petitions obliged the lords to ſend to the King, to know the reaſon why theſe two peers were impriſoned. The King anſwered by the lord chancellor, that they were commited for high treaſon, and that he had given orders for a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer to try the lord Delamere in Cheſhire where the crime was commited. But as he had given no orders about the earl of Stanford's trial, the lords appointed him to be tried by his peers, to which the King conſented.

The King prorogues the parliament. Kennet, p. 437. Echard, Vol. III. p. 787.

A few days after, on the twentieth of November, the King finding it would be very difficult to obtain his deſires of the commons concerning the Popiſh officers, prorogued the parliament till the tenth of February, after a ſeſſion but of eleven days. The King loſt, by the prorogation, the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds voted by the commons. But he was under no neceſſity for it, conſidering the vaſt ſums they had liberally granted him. This prorogation, which was followed by ſeveral others, and at length by the diſſolution of the parliament, the laſt in this reign, is a clear demonſtration of two things. Firſt, that the King conſidered the affair of the Popiſh officers in the army, as of great moment, ſince he choſe rather to loſe ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, than ſee his pretended right to imploy them conteſted by the parliament. The ſecond is, the exceſſive compliance ſhown the King by the commons, in inabling him to maintain an army; imploy Popiſh officers, and, in a word, to have no occaſion for a parliament. From hence ſprung all the evils which afflicted England during the reſt of this reign.

positive againſt the lord Delamere. The ſecond witneſs was Ford lord Grey, at which every one was ſurprized, it not being known that he was pardoned. This gave occaſion to imagine he was in great favor with the King. But his evidence tended more to prove in general the duke of Monmouth's rebellion, than the guilt of the priſoner in particular. One Saxon was the only witneſs who ſwore to the lord Delamere's correſpondence with the duke of Monmouth. But as he was a perſon of very bad reputation, the lords took no notice of his teſtimony, and the priſoner was unanimouſly acquited.

The death of ſir John Marſham.

The perſon moſt known abroad, who died this year, was ſir John Marſham, eminent for his ſkill in ancient hiſtory and chronology. He departed this life in the eighty-third year of his age (1).

AN' 1686.

This year, 1686, to which we are now to proceed, was wholly ſpent, as well as the next, in the execution of the King's two grand projects, viz. of making himſelf abſolute, and eſtabliſhing Popery. Theſe two projects could not but keep equal pace. For the King being a Papiſt, his chief aim in rendering himſelf abſolute was to alter the religion of the kingdom, and, on the other hand, he could not introduce Popery, but by ſeting himſelf above the laws.

Proceedings of the parliament of Scotland. Kennet, p. 444. Burnet. Echard, Vol. III. p. 790.

Before things were carried to any greater height in England, he believed it proper to be aſſured firſt of Scotland and Ireland. As for Scotland, the managers there were intirely diſpoſed to comply with the King's will. The late parliament, beſide the acts before-mentioned, paſſed one (2) wherein it was declared, "That they owe all their bleſſings "to the ſacred race of their glorious Kings, and to "the ſolid, abſolute authority wherewith they "were inveſted by the firſt and fundamental laws "of their monarchy: ——— And therefore they "again declared to the world, that they abhor and "deteſt not only the authors and actors of all pre-"ceding rebellions againſt their Sovereign, but "alſo all principles and poſitions which are con-"trary or derogatory to the King's ſacred, ſu-"preme, ſovereign, abſolute power and authority, "which none, whether particular perſons or col-"lective bodies, can participate of, any manner of "way; or upon any pretext, but in dependence on "him, and by commiſſion from him, &c." They paſſed another act, "To confirm and approve "whatever had been done by his Majeſty's privy "council, juſtice court, and thoſe commiſſionated "by them, in baniſhing, impriſoning, or fining "ſuch as refuſed to take and ſwear the oath of "allegiance; and to aſſert the Royal prerogative "in the utmoſt extent of them." JAMES II. AN' 1686.

If it be remembered what paſſed in Scotland in the reign of Charles I, and during the Interregnum, it will be eaſily perceived, this was not the general ſenſe of the Scots, but only the opinion of a parliament devoted to the King, and which viſibly abuſed their authority, to eſtabliſh a form of government directly contrary to the old conſtitution.

Life of James II. p. 140.

Incouraged by theſe great advances, the King ſummoned the parliament of Scotland, to aſſemble the twenty-ninth of April this year, and wrote a letter to them, wherein, "He recommends to "their ſpecial care, his innocent Roman Catholic "ſubjects, who had always been aſſiſtant to the "crown in the worſt of rebellions and uſurpations, "tho' they lay under diſcouragements hardly "to be named. Theſe he moſt heartily recom-"mended to them; to the end, that as they had "given good experience of their true loyalty and "peaceable behavior, ſo, by their aſſiſtance, they "might have the protection of his laws, not ſuffer-"ing them to lie under obligations, which their "religion could not admit of; by doing of "which, they would give a demonſtration of their "duty and affection towards him, and do him "moſt acceptable ſervice. And this love he ex-"pected they would ſhow to their brethren, as "they ſaw him an indulgent father to his peo-"ple."

Gazette, No. 2135.

The earl of Murray, lord high commiſſioner, ſeconded this letter, with a particular account of the many advantages the King intended to procure his realm of Scotland, chiefly with reſpect to trade. He alſo indeavored to perſuade them, that what the King deſired, tended as much to the honor and welfare of his ſubjects of Scotland, as to his own ſatisfaction. He concluded with ſaying, "By this "you will ſhew yourſelves the beſt and moſt af-"fectionate ſubjects, to the beſt, the incompara-"ble, and moſt heroic Prince in the world."

Kennet, p. 445.

When his Majeſty's letter, and the lord commiſſioner's ſpeech came to be conſidered in parliament, ſome members, without farther ſcrutiny, were for complying with the King's deſires. But others, in greater numbers, moved and prevailed to have a commitee appointed, to examine the ſtatutes againſt the Papiſts. The commitee finding, the ſtatutes prohibited only the public exerciſe of the Popiſh religion, drew up a bill to allow them the exerciſe of their religion in private. But when this bill was preſented to the parliament, it met with ſuch great oppoſition, that the lord commiſſioner thought fit to adjourn the debate to another time, till he had received inſtructions from court. The King ſent him orders to diſſolve, or at leaſt prorogue the parliament, and ſome months after, by his ſole authority, he eſtabliſhed liberty of conſcience in Scotland.

Affairs of Ireland. King's ſtate, &c. Kennet, p. 447.

Affairs in Ireland were upon another foot. The King's will met with no oppoſition there; and tho' the lord lieutenant was a Proteſtant, his credit and authority were inſufficient to put a ſtop to the acts of injuſtice commited againſt thoſe of his religion. The new earl of Tyrconnel was no ſooner returned to Dublin with the title of lieutenant general of the army, but he began again to break the Proteſtant officers and ſoldiers, and put Roman Catholics in their places; without vouchſafing to aſk for the lord lieutenant's order (1). This occaſioned a quarrel between them, wherein Tyrconnel behaved very haughtily, ever ſaying, he did nothing but by the King's expreſs order. When he had modelled the army according to the King's mind, he went over into England, where, by means of the Queen and father Petre the jeſuit, he ſupplanted the earl of Clarendon, and was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland. Upon his arrival at Dublin, he indeavored, by a proclamation, to diſpel the fears of the Proteſtants, who ſaw themſelves, to their great trouble, in ſubjection to a Catholic. But his actions correſponded not with his promiſes. Wherefore, a great number of Proteſtants, choſe rather to quit their eſtates in Ireland, and withdraw into England, than remain under the government of one ſo juſtly odious to them. On the other hand, the Engliſh merchants who traded in Ireland, withdrew their effects, and by that the kingdom was reduced to great extremities. But all theſe diſadvantages were compenſated by the hopes of rooting out the Proteſtant religion in that country.

Feb. 12. Kennet, p. 448.

But it was chiefly in England that the King deſired to eſtabliſh Popery and arbitrary power. For, as I ſaid, one of thoſe things could not advance without the other. If he had only aimed at abſolute power, without medling with religion, in all likelihood, he would have eaſily ſucceeded, ſince paſſive-obedience was in a manner eſtabliſhed, and now reckoned an eſſential doctrine of the church of England; the members whereof made the body of the nation, and were poſſeſſed of all the offices and places of truſt. But as he had already diſcovered, that his attempts to be freed from the yoke of the laws, was chiefly to eſtabliſh Popery, the parliament, however devoted to him in all other reſpects, had not been ſo compliant as to abandon the intereſt of religion. Notwithſtanding this refuſal, he hoped to attain his ends, firſt, by cauſing the judges to give it as their opinion, that he had a power to diſpenſe with the laws. Secondly, by gaining the members of parliament by degrees, being reſolved to have no ſeſſion till he had accompliſhed that deſign. In England, as in other places, there are men always ready to ſacrifice the public to their private intereſt, and there were but too many, on the preſent occaſion, even among the clergy themſelves. Dr. Cartwright, dean of Rippon, ſpeaking, in a ſermon, of the King's promiſes made to the parliament, which were then the common topic of diſcourſe and complaint, ſaid, "That "the King's promiſes were free donatives, and "ought not to be too ſtrictly examined or urged; "and that they muſt leave his Majeſty to explain "his own meaning in them." The King was ſo delighted with this gloſs, that he rewarded the author with the biſhopric of Cheſter, as an incouragement to other clergymen to follow ſo good an example.

As for the judges, the King took care to ſend for them one by one, and talk with them privately in his cloſet (2), in order to perſuade them to declare for his diſpenſing power, telling them, he would have twelve judges of his opinion (3). Four abſolutely refuſed to comply, and were immediately diſplaced. The King appointed four others of more pliable and ſubmiſſive underſtandings, among whom there was one Papiſt (4).

Alterations among the judges. April 21. Kennet, p. 449. Echard, Vol. III. p. 797. Burnet, p. 667, 669. A call of Serjeants. Kennet.

At the ſame time, the King made a call of ſerjeants at law, among whom were ſeveral Catholics, one of whom was knighted (5), and a little after, another lawyer of the ſame religion was made a judge (6).

The privy council alſo underwent the like alteration, the King having received into it five zealous Catholics, viz. * the lord Arundel of Wardour, and the lord Bellaſis (who had been long confined in the Tower, being accuſed of the Popiſh plot) the lord Dover †, and the earl of Tyrconnel. He likewiſe admited the new biſhop of Cheſter, and dr. Parker, biſhop of Oxford, a reputed Papiſt. All theſe changes clearly diſcovered the King's deſign.

† Henry Jermyn.

But it was not long before he gave more ſignal marks of his intentions. It has been remembered, that he aſſumed a power to diſpenſe with the obſervation of the teſt act in his Catholic officers. The parliament's refuſal of their conſent to this innovation, only exaſperated the King and made him reſolve to exempt from the penal laws all his ſubjects in general, and conſequently the Papiſts. But as this was directly againſt law, he undertook to ſhew, by the means of his corrupt judges, "That "a power in the King to diſpenſe with law, was "law." To this end, he took care firſt to have papers diſperſed thro' the kingdom, to prove this pretended right, and to prepare the people for his deſigns (7). At laſt in a particular caſe (8), all the judges, except one, gave their opinions for the King, and made it a general rule in law: 1. That the laws of England are the King's laws. 2. That therefore it is an incident, inſeparable prerogative of the Kings of England, as of all other ſovereign Princes, to diſpenſe with all penal laws, in particular caſes, and upon particular neceſſary reaſons. 3. That of theſe reaſons and neceſſities the King is the ſole judge; conſequently, 4. That this is not a truſt inveſted in and granted to the King, but the ancient remains of the ſovereign power of the Kings of England, which never was yet nor ever can be taken from them.

The Papiſts, in conſequence of this deciſion, with the King's permiſſion, ſet up every where in the kingdom, the free and open exerciſe of their religion. The jeſuits erected colleges and ſeminaries in all the conſiderable towns; and at the ſame time, four Popiſh biſhops were publicly conſecrated in the King's chapel, and ſent down to exerciſe their functions in their reſpective dioceſes, under the title of Vicars Apoſtolical. Their paſtoral letters addreſſed to the lay Catholics, were printed at the King's printing houſe, and diſperſed thro' the kingdom. Monks appeared in the habits of their order at Whitehall and St. James's, and ſcrupled not to tell the Proteſtants, "That they hoped in a little "time, to walk in proceſſion thro' Cheapſide." And, as many converts were expected, that ſo plentiful a harveſt might not want laborers, a great number of prieſts and monks were ſent from foreign parts. From this time, the only way to preferment was to be a Papiſt, or a promoter of Popery. All affairs of the council were managed by Catholics, or ſome others who had but little regard to religion. Thus, by the deciſion of ten or twelve judges, nominated or corrupted by the King before their admiſſion, the laws of England were given up, and the conſtitution intirely altered. By a like practiſe it was, that Charles I cauſed his judges to decide, that he had a right to impoſe taxes in caſe of neceſſity, of which neceſſity himſelf was ſole judge. Hence it may be perceived, that the laws of England would be ill maintained, had they no firmer foundation than the deciſions of judges appointed by the King. But it is ſurpriſing, that the precedent of ſhip money, eſtabliſhed by Charles I, and in effect, the principal cauſe of his ruin, made ſo little impreſſion on James II. The violence of his zeal for his religion, made every thing eaſy or poſſible to him, and, at all events, he was reſolved to run the riſk of the undertaking.

So finding he could not bring the majority to a compliance, he diſſolved the parliament: of whom, Burnet ſays, in all England it would not have been eaſy to have found five hundred men ſo weak, ſo poor, and ſo devoted to the court. JAMES II. AN' 1686.

The clergy forbid to preach upon controverted points; Welwood, p. 173. Kennet, p. 452. Echard, Vol. III. p. 799.

His Majeſty uſed another expedient for the advancement of his religion. He ſent a circular letter to the biſhops, with an order, prohibiting all the inferior clergy from preaching upon controverted points of Divinity, for fear, as was pretended, of raiſing animoſities among the people. It was thus that the perſecution began in Queen Mary's reign, and it ought not to ſeem ſtrange, that a Popiſh King ſhould imitate ſo zealous a Popiſh Queen. However, on this occaſion, the clergy of the church of England clearly diſcovered their averſion to Popery, of which they had hitherto ſtood accuſed by their enemies, on pretenſe of a ſcrupulous attachment to ſome modes and ceremonies, which the firſt reformers had not thought fit to retrench. For many of the dignified clergy, and the moſt diſtinguiſhed for their piety and learning, far from prevaricating in the diſcharge of their office, preached openly on controverted points, or rather made them the chief ſubject of their diſcourſes. They ſaw the tendency of this extraordinary inhibition, at a time when the Proteſtant religion was openly attacked, as well in ſermons, as writings printed with licenſe, and induſtriouſly diſperſed thro' the nation. It is juſtice to do honor to theſe faithful miniſters of the Goſpel, by tranſmiting to poſterity the names of the moſt diſtinguiſhed among them. Theſe were Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Tenniſon, Wake, Patrick, Sharp, Sherlock, all famous for their writings, and all afterwards promoted to the firſt dignities of the church.

The King erects an eccleſiaſtical commiſſion. Kennet, p. 452. Echard, Vol. III. p. 800. Burnet, p. 675.

The King and his Popiſh council were extremely offended with this boldneſs, and therefore, to force the Proteſtant clergy to ſubmiſſion, a new court for eccleſiaſtical affairs was erected, compoſed of various members, among whom were ſeveral Catholics. A nomination of Papiſts to be judges of a Proteſtant clergy in matters of doctrine and diſcipline, ſhowed the King would no longer keep any meaſures. Among theſe commiſſioners were three biſhops, viz. William Sancroft of Canterbury, Crew of Durham, and Sprat of Rocheſter. The reſt were all laymen, of which the principal were Jefferies, lord chancellor; the earl of Rocheſter, lord treaſurer; the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate and preſident of the council; and the lord chief juſtice Herbert. The commiſſion was directed to any three of them, whereof the lord chancellor was always to be one, for a reaſon very obvious.

JAMES II. AN' 1686.

By this commiſſion they had a power to exerciſe and execute all manner of juriſdictions and pre-eminences, concerning any ſpiritual or eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions; to viſit, reform, redreſs, and amend all abuſes, offenſes, contempts, and enormities whatſoever, which by the ſpiritual or eccleſiaſtical laws of the realm might be lawfully corrected. They were alſo to inquire of all offenſes, contempts and miſdemeanors commited, or hereafter to be commited; that they might be corrected and puniſhed by the cenſure of the church; they were to ſearch for, and call before them all eccleſiaſtical perſons of what degree or dignity ſoever, and to puniſh the offenders, by excommunications, ſuſpenſions, deprivations, or other eccleſiaſtical cenſures: they were impowered to ſend for all ſtatutes, rules, letters patents of univerſities, colleges, grammar ſchools, and all other eccleſiaſtical corporations, and the ſaid ſtatutes to correct, amend, and alter as they ſaw convenient, &c.

Power of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners Kennet, p. 452. R. Coke, p. 356. Life of James II. p. 146.

Many of the beſt lawyers thought this commiſſion illegal, and contrary to the act paſſed in the ſeventeenth year of Charles I, for aboliſhing the high commiſſion court. Others pretended, there was nothing in it contrary to that act. It ſeems however, that the court was conſcious of its illegality, ſince, tho' it was granted in April, it was not opened till Auguſt. Beſide, the archbiſhop would never act in it.

Soon after, dr. Sharp, in a ſermon, vindicated the church of England in oppoſition to the errors of Popery. The King being informed of it, pretended, that the preacher's intention was to beget an evil opinion of himſelf and his government in the minds of the hearers, and to lead them into diſobedience and rebellion. On this ſuppoſition he ſent a letter to the biſhop of London *, commanding him forthwith to ſuſpend dr. Sharp from farther preaching in any pariſh church or chapel in his dioceſe, till he had given him ſatisfaction, and his farther pleaſure was known therein. On receit of this order, the biſhop wrote to the earl of Sunderland, and prayed him to communicate his letter to the King. He repreſented, that he was to proceed according to law, and as a judge; and by the law no judge condemns a man before he has knowlege of the cauſe, and has cited the party. Dr. Sharp himſelf carried the letter, but could obtain no anſwer. Two days after, he waited on the King at Windſor, with a very humble petition, but without any effect. The King and his council had already reſolved to imbrace this occaſion to puniſh the biſhop of London, who was odious to the court, becauſe he had moved in the houſe of lords to examine the King's ſpeech: beſide, by ſo great an example, they were reſolved to eſtabliſh the authority of their new eccleſiaſtical court. The biſhop was therefore cited to appear before the commiſſioners the fourth of Auguſt, where he was treated in a manner unbecoming his birth (1) and dignity, by Jefferies the chancellor, who uſed him with his wonted inſolence. The biſhop demanded a copy of the commiſſion, or at leaſt to hear it read. But this was refuſed, and he was anſwered by Jefferies, that the commiſſion might be had in every coffee houſe for a penny. At length, with great difficulty, he obtained a delay of five days. The ninth of Auguſt he appeared a ſecond time before the court, and † diſowned its juriſdiction, alleging, that as a biſhop he had no other judge than his Metropolitan: but his plea was rejected. However, after two or three adjournments of the court, he was ſuſpended from the function and execution of his epiſcopal office, for his diſobedience and contempt: and the biſhops of Durham, Rocheſter, and Peterborough, were appointed commiſſioners within the dioceſe of London, during the biſhop's ſuſpenſion. Dr. Sharp was likewiſe ſuſpended, tho' it was only for a few days.

Who is ſuſpended. Sept. 6.

The world was convinced by this affair, that the court was reſolved to ſilence all the Proteſtant miniſters, to prevent their maintaining the Proteſtant religion in their ſermons. It was alſo perceived, that the King was reſolved to keep no more meaſures, ſince, in a time of profound peace, he had formed a camp of fifteen thouſand men upon Hounſlow-heath, under the command of the earl of Feverſham. In this camp was a public chapel, where maſs was ſaid every day.

Echard, Vol. III. p. 806. Burnet.

Tho' there were but very few Popiſh officers and ſoldiers in the army, it was feared, that the whole would be ſubſervient to the King in the execution of his deſigns, in conſequence of that blind obedience uſually profeſſed by them. To obviate this danger, Samuel Johnſon a Clergyman (1), addreſſed a writing to the Proteſtant officers and ſoldiers of the army, wherein he laid before them the reaſons which ought to prevent their being the inſtruments of the court, for the deſtruction of their religion, and the ſubverſion of the government. This writing was too oppoſite to the King's deſigns to eſcape unpuniſhed. Wherefore the author being tried at the King's-bench, was ſentenſed to ſtand three times in the pillory, to be whiped from Newgate to Tyburn, and to pay a fine of five hundred marks. The ſentenſe, after Johnſon's ſolemn degradation, was executed with great rigor. But his writing made a ſtrong impreſſion upon the minds of both officers and ſoldiers, and very much promoted the great defection in the army, which happened two years after.

for which he is ſentenſed to be whiped, pilloried, and fined.

About this time, Miles Prance the goldſmith who had been a witneſs againſt the perſons tried for the murder of ſir Edmundbury Godfrey, and had taken away three lives by his evidence, was tried upon an information exhibited againſt him for perjury, and ſentenſed to pay a fine of a hundred pounds, to ſtand three times in the pillory, and to be whiped from Newgate to Tyburn. But becauſe he at firſt pleaded guilty, the whiping part of the ſentenſe was remited. Some ſay, he was ſo intimidated by the example of Oates, that he pleaded guilty merely to eſcape puniſhment. Others again pretend to confirm his confeſſion from a declaration publiſhed by him afterwards, wherein he diſowned his depoſitions in 1678. But as he was a Papiſt, ſome have ſuſpected he was induced by religious motives to publiſh this declaration. In caſes of this nature every man is at liberty to form his own conjectures.

Miles Prance proſecuted. Kennet, p. 449. Echard, Vol. III. p. 807.

It was not difficult to perceive from the King's whole conduct, that he had intirely pulled off the maſk, and was deſirous to have it thought, he intended to introduce the Roman Catholic religion. Accordingly, this was not doubted. His promiſe to the council and parliament to preſerve the Proteſtant religion was intirely forgot, and there was no man ſo bold as to remind him of it. It was even dangerous to ſpeak of it in public converſations, for fear of ſome miſchievous conſequence. Nor was the King contented with acting openly in favor of his religion, but even privately uſed all poſſible indeavors to make proſelytes, chiefly among his courtiers, and perſons of the firſt rank. He ſucceeded with reſpect to the earl of Sunderland*, who was willing to give him this proof of his devotion for him, tho' for ſome private reaſons he refuſed to make a public abjuration.

* Robert Spencer. The earl of Sunderland turns Papiſt.

But he was not ſo ſucceſsful in his attempt upon his brother-in-law the earl of Rocheſter. For tho' the earl conſented to be preſent at a conference held by divines of both religions (2), the diſpute, it ſeems, only attached him more firmly to the Proteſtant religion, ſince he bravely refuſed forſaking it. The King, mortified by his firmneſs, removed him from the treaſury, which was put in commiſſion, but withal aſſigned him a yearly penſion of five thouſand pounds upon the poſt-office. The earl of Clarendon, his elder brother, felt likewiſe the effects of the King's diſpleaſure on the ſame account. Being recalled from his government of Ireland before the time, he was deprived, about the end of the year, of the privy ſeal, which was given to the lord Arundel a Papiſt (3).

The earl of Rocheſter refuſing to become a Papiſt, Kennet, Burnet, p. 684. is removed from being treaſurer.

The earl of Clarendon diſplaced.

At length, the King gave an unqueſtionable proof of his zeal for the Popiſh religion, by ſending the earl of Caſtlemain in embaſſy to the Pope, "To reconcile the three kingdoms of England, "Scotland, and Ireland, to the Holy See, from "which, for more than an age, they had fallen off "by hereſy." The embaſſador was received at Rome with a coldneſs which gave the King a ſenſible mortification. Innocent XI, not ſuffering himſelf to be impoſed on by this outward ſhew, conſidered that embaſſy was too much precipitated, ſince the converſion of the three kingdoms was yet far from being finiſhed, and therefore he reſolved to be no actor in a farce which would only render him ridiculous. And indeed to pretend to reconcile three kingdoms to the church of Rome, on pretenſe of a few late converſions, was it not expoſing the Pope, the King, and the Catholic religion to the mirth and inſults of their enemies. This embaſſy was owing, it is ſaid, to the influence of the jeſuits, who would have all Europe believe, they had converted the three kingdoms. But Innocent XI was not ſo fond of the jeſuits, as to give them this ſatisfaction at the expenſe of his own honor. Beſide, being then ingaged in a quarrel with France, and not ignorant of the cloſe union between Lewis XIV and James II, he was pleaſed with giving ſome mortification to Lewis, in the perſon of his friend and brother of England. To this was owing his treatment of the embaſſador with ſo much coldneſs, not to ſay, incivility. Whenever he granted him an audience, his Holineſs had a fit of coughing at command, which ſpoiled the embaſſador's harangue, and obliged him to withdraw. This he ſo often repeated, that the earl of Caſtlemain at length threatened to be gone. The Pope with his uſual coldneſs ſent him word, "That "ſince he would be gone, he adviſed him to riſe "early in the morning, that he might reſt himſelf

All the favor the embaſſador could obtain from the Pope, was a licenſe to the marſhal d'Humiere's daughter to marry her uncle, and a diſpenſation of the ſtatutes of the jeſuits order, that father Petre might injoy a biſhopric. It is ſaid, the archbiſhopric of York was kept vacant for him. But if the Pope and moſt of the cardinals coldly received the Engliſh embaſſador, the jeſuits made him ſome amends by ſhowing him all poſſible reſpect. At laſt, the King recalled him, being unable to bear ſo many mortifications.

All places beſtowed upon Papiſts. Gazettes. Kennet.

Notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of this embaſſy, the King was not diſcouraged from purſuing his deſign, and that with ſuch ardor and openeſs, that it could not be miſtaken. Not only all vacant preferments were confered upon Papiſts, but, without any reaſon given, Proteſtants were deprived of their places to make room for them. So, it was eaſily ſeen, that none beſide Papiſts, or Proteſtants not attached to their religion, could pretend to any imployments. The court was ſo open in their meaſures, that ſome of the principal Catholics could not forbear repreſenting to the King, that his proceedings were more dangerous than advantageous to their religion. But the King would not liſten to any but violent counſels, and ſuch as were agreeable to his temper and zeal. One may ſee in the following letter, dated the ſecond of February 1684, from a jeſuit of Liege to a jeſuit of Fribourg, the King's diſpoſition with regard to religion.

Letter from a jeſuit of Liege. Echard, Vol. III. p. 811.

" It is wonderful to ſee King James's great af" fection to our ſociety: he wiſhed proſperity to " this whole college, by the reverend father, the " provincial, and earneſtly recommended himſelf to " our prayers. Upon father John Keynes's return " to England, he gave him a moſt gracious recep" tion (while earls and dukes were commanded for " ſome hours to wait for admitance) with whom,
" in the Queen's preſenſe, he diſcourſed with all " familiarity. He aſked him, 'How many can" didates for orders he had, and how many " ſtudents?' And upon the provincial's anſwer to " his Majeſty, who was urgent with him, 'That " of the former and the latter he had above fifty;'
" he replied, 'There would be occaſion for dou" ble or treble that number, to effect what he de-" ſigned for that ſociety's performance;' and or" dered, that they ſhould be all exerciſed in the " art of preaching: 'For now, ſays he, England
" has need of ſuch.'

" I do not doubt but you have heard, that the " King writing to father de la Chaiſe, the French
" King's confeſſor concerning the affairs of the " houſe among the Walloons, declared, That " whatever was done to the Engliſh fathers of that " houſe, he would look upon as done to himſelf.
" Father Clare, rector of the ſame houſe, being " arrived at London to treat of that matter, got " an eaſy acceſs to the King, and as eaſily gained " his point. The King himſelf forbad him to " kneel and kiſs his hand, according to cuſtom,
" ſaying, 'Reverend father, you have indeed
" once kiſſed my hand; but if I had known then,
" as I do now, that you were a prieſt, I would " rather myſelf, father, have kneeled down and " kiſſed your hand.' After he had finiſhed his
" buſineſs, in a familiar converſation, his Majeſty
" told this father, 'That he would either convert " England, or die a martyr; and he had rather " die the next day and convert it, than reign
" twenty years piouſly and happily, and not ef" fect it.' Finally, he called himſelf, 'A Son " of the Society, of whoſe good ſucceſs, he " ſaid, he was as glad as of his own.' And it can " ſcarcely be expreſſed how much gratitude he " ſhewed, when it was told him, 'That he was " made partaker, by the moſt reverend our provin" cial, of all the merits of the ſociety;' out of which " he is to nominate one for his confeſſor; but " hitherto it is not known who it will be: ſome
" report, that it will be the reverend father the " provincial, but ſtill there is no certainty of " that. Many are of opinion, that father Edward " R. Petre, who is chiefly in favor with the " King, will obtain an archbiſhopric, but more " believe it will be a cardinal's cap. To him has " been granted, within this month or two, all
" that part of the palace, in which the King uſed
" to reſide, when he was duke of York, where " there is not a day, but you may ſee I know
" not how many courtiers waiting to ſpeak to his " eminence, for ſo they ſay he is called: for the King
" adviſes with him, and with many Catholic lords,
" who have the chief places in the kingdom, to " find a method to propogate the faith without " violence. Not long ſince, ſome of theſe lords
" objected to the King, 'That they thought he " made too much haſte to eſtabliſh the faith.' To " whom he anſwered, 'I am growing old, and " muſt take Large Steps; elſe if I ſhould hap" pen to die, I might perhaps leave you in a worſe
" condition than I found you.' When they aſked
" him, 'Why then he was ſo little concerned " about the converſion of his daughters, who were
" the heirs of the kingdom? He anſwered,
" 'God will take care of that; leave the con-
" verſion of my daughters to me; do you, by " your example, convert your tenants and others
" to the faith.'

" He has Catholic lord lieutenants in moſt
" counties; and we ſhall have ſhortly Catholic
" juſtices of the peace in almoſt all places. We " hope alſo, that our affairs will have good ſuc-
" ceſs at Oxford. In the public chapel of the vice " chancellor, who is a Catholic, there is always
" one of our divines, who has converted ſome of " the ſtudents to the faith. The biſhop of Ox" ford himſelf, ſeems to be a great favorer of the " Catholic faith; he propoſed to the council, whe" ther it did not ſeem to be expedient, that at leaſt
" one college ſhould be granted to the Catholics
" at Oxford, that they might not be forced to
" ſtudy beyond ſea at ſuch great expences; but it " is not yet known what anſwer he had. The " ſame biſhop having invited two of our brethren,
" together with ſome of the nobility, drank the " King's health to a certain heretic lord who was " in company, 'wiſhing his Majeſty good ſucceſs
" in all his undertakings.' Adding alſo, 'That " the religion of the Proteſtants in England, did " not ſeem to him in a better condition, than Buda
" was before it was taken; and that they were " next to Atheiſts, that defended that faith.' Many
" imbrace the true religion, and four of the moſt
" conſiderable earls had lately made public pro-
" feſſion of it. Father Alexander Keynes, the " provincial's nephew, to whom is commited the " care of the chapel belonging to the elector Pa-
" latine's envoy, is continually taken up in ſolving
" and anſwering the queſtions of heretics, who " doubt of their faith, of whom you may ſee two " or three together walking by the chapel door,
" continually diſputing about ſome point of reli" gion. As to Prince George, it is yet uncertain what " religion he profeſſes. We gradually begin to get " footing in England; we teach human learning
" at Lincoln, Norwich and York; and at Wor" ceſter we have a public chapel, protected by a " guard of the King's ſoldiers; and we are to buy
" ſome houſes at Wigan in Lancaſhire. The Ca" tholic intereſt grows very ſtrong; and at ſome
" churches, granted to the Catholics, upon holi" days, there are often counted fifteen hundred pre-

" ſent at the ſermon. At London alſo, our buſi-
" neſs is carried on with the ſame good ſucceſs:
" ſermons are preached upon every holiday, and " there are ſo many that frequent the chapels,
" that they are not big enough to hold them. Two " of our ſociety, Dormer and Bertue, preach con" tinually before the King and the Queen; father
" Eward Neville, before the Queen-Dowager;
" father Alexander Keynes, in the chapel afore-
" ſaid; others in other chapels. There are many " houſes bought in the Savoy, near Somerſet-houſe,
" which is the Queen-Dowager's palace, towards " erecting the firſt college in London, for about " eighteen thouſand Florins; and they are hard at " work to bring them to the form of a college,
" that a ſchool may be opened before Eaſter.

" A Catholic lord lieutenant is ſhortly to go " over to Ireland, becauſe the King cannot be ſa-" tisfied with any other, to eſtabliſh the Catholic " intereſt in that kingdom. The parliament will " certainly ſit in this month of February, of whom " his Majeſty is reſolved to aſk three things: Firſt,
" that by a general act all the Catholic peers may " be admited to ſit in the upper-houſe: Secondly,
" that the teſt may be aboliſhed: And thirdly,
" which is the chief point, that all penal laws
" againſt Catholics ſhould be abrogated. And that " he may the better obtain theſe things, he de-
" ſigns to let them all know, 'That he is reſolved
" to turn out all thoſe who will not heartily act for
" the obtaining of them; and likewiſe diſſolve the " parliament.' At which reſolution ſome heretics
" being terrified, came to a certain earl to adviſe
" with him what might be done; to whom he " anſwered. 'The King's mind is ſufficiently
" known; what he has once ſaid he will certainly " perform: if you love yourſelves ſubmit to the " King's pleaſure.' There is to be a great prepa-
" tion of war at London, and a fleet, of above a " hundred men of war, is to be fited out againſt
" the ſpring, but on what deſign is uncertain.
" The Dutch are under great apprehenſions, but " for what reaſon, altho' they are ſaid to make an " armament, time will beſt diſcover."

The jeſuits of Fribourg made no ſcruple to ſhow this letter to ſeveral perſons, who, taking copies of it, made it public in Switzerland and at Geneva. Dr. Burnet ſays, he copied it from one in the hands of monſieur Heidegger, a famous profeſſor at Zurich. One of the copies was ſent to monſieur Dickvelt, embaſſador of the States-General in England, who ſpoke of it to the King. Whereupon the King deſired to ſee it, ſaying, he ſhould ſoon know whether it was genuine, or forged, to render the jeſuits odious. But tho' it was put into his hands, he ſpoke no more of it to monſieur Dickvelt.

Vol. I. p. 712.

The parliament, which according to the laſt prorogation, was to meet the fifteenth of February, was farther prorogued *. Probably, the King found things not ripe enough, as he deſired, to be aſſured of the concurence of the parliament in the execution of his deſigns. He choſe rather to take another courſe, which to him ſeemed more ſhort and eaſy, in eſtabliſhing liberty of conſcience by his own authority. He was, doubtleſs, perſuaded, that it would be more eaſy to obtain the conſent of the parliament to a thing already done, than the power to do it. But he thought proper to begin with Scotland, that the example of that kingdom might influence the Engliſh. To this end, he ſent a proclamation into Scotland for an intire liberty of conſcience, with orders to the privy council to publiſh it. In his opinion, this proclamation was more than capable to convince all his good ſubjects of his great moderation, and deſire that all ſhould live in quiet. He excluded, however, out of his favor the Field Conventiclers, whom he recommended to his council to proſecute with all the ſeverity of the laws. This proclamation contained in ſubſtance:

The parliament prorogued. Gazette, No. 2206. Echard, Vol. III. p. 813.
* To April 28.

James II. An' 1686.

The King publiſhes in Scotland a declaration for liberty of conſcience. Gazette, No. 2221. Kennet, p. 446. Echard, Vol. III. p. 814. Burnet, p. 712.

" That his Majeſty being reſolved to unite the " hearts and affections of his ſubjects, to God in " religion, to him in loyalty, and to their neigh" bors in chriſtian love and charity; he had there" fore thought fit, by his Sovereign authority,
" prerogative Royal, and abſolute power, which
" all his ſubjects were to obey without Reserve,
" to give and grant his Royal toleration, to the " ſeveral profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion after " named. Firſt, he allows and tolerates the mo" derate Preſbyterians, to meet in their private
" houſes only; but it is his pleaſure that Field Con-
" venticlers be proſecuted according to the utmoſt
" ſeverity of the laws. In like manner, he tole-
" rates Quakers to meet and exerciſe in their form,
" in any place or places appointed for their wor-
" ſhip." Then the proclamation proceeds thus,
" Conſidering the ſevere and cruel laws made
" againſt Roman Catholics (therein called Papiſts)
" in the minority of our Royal grandfather of " glorious memory, without his conſent, and con" trary to the duty of good ſubjects, by his regents,
" and other enemies to their lawful Sovereign, our " great grand mother Queen Mary, of bleſſed
" and pious memory; wherein, under the pretenſe
" of religion, they cloathed the worſt of treaſons,
" factions, and uſurpations; and made theſe laws,
" not againſt the enemies of God, but their own:
" which laws have ſtill been continued of courſe,
" without deſign of executing them, or any of " them, ad terrorem only, on ſuppoſition, that
" the Papiſts, relying on an external power, were " incapable of duty and true allegiance to their " natural Sovereigns, and rightful Monarchs: we
" of our certain knowledge and long experience,
" knowing that the Catholics, as it is their prin" ciple to be good Chriſtians, ſo it is to be dutiful
" ſubjects; and that they have likewiſe, on all oc-
" caſions, ſhewn themſelves good and faithful ſub-
" jects to us, and our Royal predeceſſors, &c. Do
" therefore, with the conſent of our privy council, by " our Sovereign authority, prerogative Royal, and " abſolute power, ſuſpend, ſtop, and diſable all
" laws or acts of parliament, made or executed
" againſt any of our Roman Catholic ſubjects, in " any time paſt, to all intents and purpoſes, making
" void all prohibitions therein mentioned, pains
" or penalties therein ordained to be inflicted: ſo
" that they ſhall in all things be as free in all re-
" ſpects, as any of our Proteſtant ſubjects what" ſoever, not only to exerciſe their religion, but " to injoy all offices, benefices, and others, which " we ſhall think fit to beſtow upon them in all
" time coming.——And whereas the obedience
" of our ſubjects is due to us by their allegiance,
" and our ſovereignty; and that no law, difference
" in religion, or other impediment whatſoever,
" can exempt the ſubjects from their native ob" ligations to the crown; and conſidering, that
" ſome oaths are capable of being wreſted by men
" of ſiniſter intentions, a practiſe in that kingdom
" as fatal to religion as loyalty: we therefore caſs,
" annul, and diſcharge all oaths whatſoever, by " which any of our ſubjects are incapacitated from " holding places or offices in our ſaid kingdom,
" diſcharging the ſame to be taken or given in any " time coming, without our ſpecial warrant and
" conſent; and we do ſtop, diſable, and diſpenſe
" with all laws, injoining the ſaid oaths, teſts, or " any of them, &c." Towards the concluſion, the King reiterates former promiſes in theſe words:----
" For the incouragement of our Proteſtant biſhops,
" and the regular clergy, and ſuch as have hither-
" to lived orderly, we thing fit to declare, that it " never was our principle, nor will we ever ſuffer

" violence

JAMES II. AN' 1686.

"violence to be offered to any man's conſcience,
"nor will we uſe force, or invincible neceſſity,
"againſt any man on the account of his perſuaſion,
"nor the Proteſtant religion; but will protect our "biſhops and other miniſters, in their functions,
"rights, and properties, and all our Proteſtant
"ſubjects, in the free exerciſe of their Proteſtant
"religion in the churches."

Tho' this proclamation concerned only Scotland, I thought proper to inſert it here, becauſe it diſcovers clearly the King's intentions and principles, and conſequently, how he pretended to deal with his Engliſh ſubjects, tho' hitherto he ſtill kept within ſome bounds, with regard to that abſolute power, which England had not aſcribed to him in ſo extenſive a manner as Scotland.

AN' 1687. The council of Scotland publiſhes the King's proclamation. Gazette, No. 2221. Kennet, p. 446.

The council of Scotland blindly obeyed the King, not only by publiſhing his proclamation, but even by thanking him for it, as for a ſignal favor. This ought not to appear ſurpriſing, becauſe the council wholly conſiſted of men intirely devoted to the King; nor was there in Scotland any perſon in a public office, who was not, or at leaſt pretended not to be in the ſame principles. The parliament was compoſed in the ſame manner, and by acts paſſed, had obliged all the Scots to an unlimited obedience, ſo that no man could oppoſe the King's meaſures, under pain of high treaſon. Accordingly, the council, in thanking the King for his proclamation, might boldly ſpeak for the whole kingdom: not that they were ignorant that it was not the general ſentiment of the nation, but becauſe they knew, no perſon would have the boldneſs to contradict it. It is not therefore to the whole Scotiſh nation, that this blind obedience is to be imputed, but to their governors, who were but a ſmall part of the people.

The King publiſhes a like declaration in England. Gazettes. Kennet, p. 487. Echard. Burnet, p. 714.

The King charmed with the ready compliance of the Scots, and conſidering it as a favorable precedent for England, ſummoned his council, and told them, "it was his intention to publiſh the like "declaration in England. He grounded his reſo"lution on his obſerving, that the indeavors to "eſtabliſh an uniformity in the four preceding "reigns, had proved ineffectual, and been very "prejudicial to the nation. That beſide, it was "his opinion, as moſt ſuitable to the principles of "chriſtianity, 'That no man ſhould be perſecuted "for conſcience ſake;' for he thought conſcience "could not be forced." The council, compoſed like that of Scotland, approved of this reſolution, and magnified extremely the King's indulgence to his ſubjects. Therefore on the fourth of April the declaration for liberty of conſcience was publiſhed. It was much the ſame with that publiſhed in Scotland, except that the King ſoftened his expreſſions concerning his abſolute power, and ſaid, "he made "no doubt of the concurence of his two houſes of "parliament, when he ſhould think it convenient "for them to meet." It was however manifeſt, from the frequent prorogations of this parliament, that he was far from being aſſured of their concurence.

It is very probable, there was not in the whole nation a ſingle perſon, who thought the King deſigned to favor or eaſe the Non-conformiſts. Every one clearly ſaw, that his aim in this declaration was to eſtabliſh the Popiſh religion, upon the ruins of the Proteſtant. For how could it be ſuppoſed, that the King, from a violent perſecutor, ſhould at once become a friend to the Diſſenters? Or what aſſurance could there be, that his promiſes to the Non-conformiſts, would be better kept than thoſe he had made to the church of England? Nevertheleſs the Non-conformiſts had hitherto been treated with ſo much rigor, that it is not ſtrange, they ſhould at firſt think themſelves happy in a deliverance from perſecution. For this reaſon, addreſſes of thanks, from the ſeveral ſects, were preſented to the King for his declaration. The Anabaptiſts led the way: the Quakers followed, and next came the Independents; and laſtly, the Preſbyterians. Some of theſe addreſſes, ſpeaking of the Royal power, carried it to the higheſt degree, becauſe it was then advantageous to the Non-conformiſts to maintain the authority by which they were freed from their conſtraint. The churchmen failed not to take notice of this change. But they could not juſtly blame an exceſs into which themſelves had fallen. The truth is, the two parties neither did then, nor yet do, follow on all occaſions, their own principles, with relation to the Royal power, which they extend or contract, as the King is more or leſs favorable to them.
